Given 4 or 5 months' more training, American ground troops throughout the world will be able to take on anybody, any time, anywhere (Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Army Chief of Staff, November 3, 1949).

The reduced budget of $13,545,000,000 for the armed services offers an adequacy of defense for any situation that may arise in the next 2 years (Secretary Johnson, January 10, 1950).

If South Korea were invaded, our attitude would be that South Korea would be able to resist (Secretary of State Acheson, January 12).

The defenses of the United States are in better shape than they have ever been when the country was not at war (President Truman, March 2).

The situation is now not nearly as bad as in the first half of 1946 (President Truman, May 4).

The basic reason I have for concluding that there will not be a war soon is because of the changed nature of war (General MacArthur, May 26).

The world is closer to peace now than it has been in the last 5 years (President Truman, June 1).

As you establish here a wholesome society of steadily expanding well-being, you will set up a peaceful influence which will disintegrate the hold of Soviet communism on your fellows to the north and irresistibly draw them into unity with you (John Foster Dulles to Korean Assembly, June 19).

If we can hold out for a month, the worst will be over (Gen. Chung I. Kwun, South Korean chief of staff, June 28).

The morale of North Korean troops is reported deteriorating under the continued pressure of United States air attacks (MacArthur headquarters, July 11).

It is not hopeless, like Bataan, but it takes time. * * * You haven't got a catastrophe staring you in the face (Army General Staff spokesman, July 14).

An extensive bridgehead will be held (General Collins, July 15).

The enemy has had his great chance, but failed to exploit it (General MacArthur, July 20).

We aren't going to give up one more inch. We are going to stand and fight. There is no thought in the minds of anybody in this Army that there is a chance—even if we were so disposed—that there could possibly be a Dunquerque (Gen. Walton E. Walker, July 29).

We had hell kicked out of us this morning (General Walker, July 31).

United States Race Bias Cost Is Put at Billions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "United States Race Bias Cost Is Put at Billions," written by Edmond J. Bartness, and published in the New York Times on September 8, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES RACE BIAS COST IS PUT AT BILLIONS—INDUSTRIALIST TELLS THE URBAN LEAGUE PREJUDICE IS DRAIN ON NATIONAL BUDGET, VIGOR

(By Edmond J. Bartnett)

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., September 7.—Intolerance and prejudice are "highly expensive indulgences," costing the American people "billions of dollars annually," Dwight R. G. Palmer, president of the General Cable Corp., declared here tonight.

Mr. Palmer, a member of the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Services, said that "ordinary national self-interest demands that all our human resources be made available without delay or inhibitions."

His remarks were made in an address as he received the 1950 Two Friends Award of the National Urban League at its fortieth anniversary convention here. The award is made annually to a Negro and a white who have cooperated in an "outstanding instance of interracial teamwork for the good of the American community."

The Negro award went to John H. Sengstacke, editor and publisher of the Chicago Defender. He served on the seven-man President's committee with Mr. Palmer. In a message to the convention, President Truman said "the work of this committee will bear fruit for years to come."

POINTS TO JOB OPENINGS

Mr. Palmer, a member of the Urban League's Commerce and Industry Council, noted that more and more business concerns were opening jobs to Negroes. That, he said, was important to the American economy as a whole.

"The companies which have opened wide their doors to job-seekers, and thereafter to promotion on sheer merit, without reference to race or creed, enjoy a distinct advantage over competitors still hamstrung by prejudice," he asserted.

In the first place, he said, it means that America is beginning to tap a great reservoir of "talents and energies that otherwise would have remained inert." Prejudice, he declared, represents "a fearful drain on our national budget and a fearful strain on our national vigor."

Secondly, he declared, when the blocks to work, education, promotion, and equal opportunity are removed, more people will be aided in an escape from slums and poverty, where disease and crime are bred.

DENUNCIATION MADE

Mr. Palmer, last year's winner of the American Brotherhood Award of the National Conference of Christians and Jews, denounced industries, labor unions, and technical schools that refuse to utilize the talents of 15,000,000 Negroes and 5,000,000 Jews. He accused them of "sabotaging the military might and committing a crime against the security of the United States."

Mr. Sengstacke said the success of the President's committee "demonstrates again the moral courage of our Nation to acknowledge our frailties and to have enough common sense to tackle them. The integration of our Armed Forces was not only pertinent because it reinforced and buttressed our defense but it gave virility to the moral fiber of our Nation."

Winners of the annual Thalheimer award for essays on vocational guidance were announced tonight. First prize of $100 went to Edward Smith, of Hope, Ark., and second prize of $75 was won by Miss Jerolyn Johnson, of Corona, Queens, a sophomore at Morgan State College, Baltimore.

Irresponsible Years

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Irresponsible Years," published in the Washington Evening Star of September 12, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"IRRESPONSIBLE YEARS"

In his talk at Forest, Va., Saturday, Senator BYRD said that the period since the end of World War II "may well go down in history as the most irresponsible 5 years of the great American Republic."

The Virginia Senator offered a certain documentation in support of his contention, and, though it will not be accepted in all of its particulars by all people, there are certain things that cannot be denied. One of these is that, after spending $60,000,000,000 for national defense over the past 5 years, we now find ourselves in a war, and a minor war at that, for which we are not effectively prepared. To say this, of course, is not to tell the whole story. The Korean war is not the kind of war in which we can effectively use our B-36's and our atom bombs, into which much money has gone. Perhaps these weapons, in an all-out war, would more than justify the expense of producing them, but the fact remains that, after spending $60,000,000,000, we are barely able to hold our own in Korea and probably could not fight at all in other places where the Communists may elect to move. And in view of this, Senator BYRD was on solid ground in saying that "we have maneuvered the greatest country, the best form of government, and the finest Nation of people in the history of the world into a position where they are fiscally vulnerable from within, and perhaps so greatly extended that they may be militarily vulnerable from without."

We cannot relive the past 5 years, however; the time and opportunities lost cannot be retrieved. What we can do is to recognize that this Nation is "in the hour of its greatest peril," and resolve to do what can be done and what has to be done if we are to survive.

We can heed what Senator BYRD describes as a simple plea that we do what we know has to be done—"strip off the luxuries of sociological ventures and political bids for votes by spending public money, and get down to the sweat and toil of the work that is required to make this country fiscally sound and militarily impregnable."

Taking note of criticisms that he has sometimes voted with the Republicans in the Senate, Senator BYRD said he has set this standard for himself: "My votes in the Senate and my actions elsewhere, now, as they have been in the past, and as they will be in the future, are determined by the test of what I believe in my conscience to be the best for my country."

That is an excellent standard, one to which all of us should adhere.

Why Were We Deceived?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Why Were We Deceived," published in the Portland Oregonian of August 12, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY WERE WE DECEIVED?

In other columns on this page are printed some quotations from high governmental and military officials prior to and after the opening of the Korean war. Perhaps they will help to explain why the public was so completely in the dark about our lack of military readiness. Putting it plainly, the people were deceived.

Primary responsibility for this deception lies with the Truman administration. The President repeatedly assured us of the adequacy of our defenses, and the prospect for peace. Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson made it even more strong—and the boodled people applauded him for slashing military expenditures. John Foster Dulles, the Republican foreign expert, added his reassuring voice. The generals have played along.

These statements which now astound us were tossed out with the abandon of confirmed optimists. On what were they based? That is the question for which the people must now require an answer—and without dissembling. Why, in a free country with elective government responsible to the voters, have the officials in whom we placed the highest confidence duped us—and perhaps themselves?

Address by Hon. Brien McMahon, of Connecticut, Before Order of the Sons of Italy, West Haven, Conn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 13 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me on Sunday, August 27, 1950, before the Order of the Sons of Italy at West Haven, Conn.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends and fellow members of the Sons of Italy:

Thank you—thank you from the bottom of my heart for the high honor you have done me. This is one of the happiest hours of my life. In making me an honorary member of the Sons of Italy you have given me great pride. You have given me also a special responsibility—acting and working in keeping with the ideals and achievements of the Sons of Italy.

This responsibility will not be easy to discharge. The Sons of Italy has a tradition of great work on behalf of a great cause—bringing Italy and our own Nation ever more closely together. Tonight, my friends, and that friend of all lovers of freedom—the Vice President of the United States—honors us with his presence. With us also are distinguished Americans from all walks of life. Their attendance is proof of the esteem our Nation bears toward this great organization. The esteem is fully merited. No group has worked harder, or more successfully, in knitting more tightly together the community of freedom-loving peoples.

A gathering such as this would be impossible in the Soviet Union. In this hall are members of both political parties. This audience has assembled of its own free will, and not at the dictate of any official. No propagandist in charge of "spontaneous demonstrations" has forced you to come—nor has anyone compelled you to honor me with this award. If you had stayed home, you would not have run the risk of losing your job—or else getting a new job in a concentration camp. You may applaud or not as you choose. You may leave here saying what you please. No one has told me what to say. No censor has passed on my manuscript. No secret policeman sits in this audience and furtively transcribes my words.

Stalin could never understand—nor tolerate—a meeting of this kind. Nor could Stalin understand or tolerate an organization such as the Sons of Italy. He could never realize that the Sons of Italy demonstrates its loyalty to America by enriching our Nation with the traditions of its forefathers. Its members have an abiding affection for the country which is their ancestral homeland. It is good that this is so. I can think of nothing more unnatural or unwise than that Americans should rudely sever the affectional cord which ties them to the ancient soil from whence their fathers came.

Our national glory consists of diversity within the framework of unity. Differing national foods, folk songs, and customs—these are what give America its peculiar characteristics, its unique flavor. In our Nation, these diverse traditions blend into a harmonious whole that is greater than the sum of its parts. Today, the United States and Italy find themselves partners in a common cause. This cause is the same cause for which the men of the United Nations now fight—and die—in Korea. There are those who claim they do not know why we are fighting in Korea. All our history tells us the answer—we are fighting for the same ideals we fought for at Trenton and at Gettysburg and in Argonne Forest. We are warriors in the age-old fight of freedom against tyranny.

They now work together, the United States and Italy, for a decent world, a world of peace with justice. This joint enterprise is a partnership of equals. A few people are inclined to forget this. They look at rich America and impoverished Italy; they total the dollars we have sent in the form of Marshall aid; they count the guns we have shipped to the outpost of freedom in the Adriatic and they wrongly conclude that we bear the brunt of the load.

It is true that our Nation is blessed with unrivaled resources; our farms and factories were not desolated by war. Italy has comparatively meager resources. Its true wealth resides in the spirit and determination of its people. Italy was ravished by 5 years of warfare. So it is just and inevitable that in today's partnership we should supply the bulk of material goods.

But it is grossly misleading to measure the mutual contributions to our joint undertaking only in physical terms. America's debt to Italy can never be completely repaid. Italian genius has left its indelible mark on western civilization. In art and sculpture, in music and architecture, in the advancement and science of learning, no nation has given the world more than Italy. It has been said that it would be impossible to record the 10 greatest men of all history without listing at least 3 of Italian blood. Christopher Columbus, Michelangelo, Da Vinci, Galileo, Dante—the names of these giants will live on to the last syllable of recorded time. The Italians have been the great colonizers of the world—bringing to far-off regions that amalgam of reverence for the past and an open mind toward the future that makes up the spirit of Italy. The Italian spirit has spread over the world in a way the Kremlin never can—not by tanks and fifth columnists but by the invincible force of Italian culture. I need not dwell on what Italians have contributed to America. It is a proud and impressive tale, known to all of you.

My own work in the field of atomic energy has brought me first-hand knowledge of one signal contribution. I am thinking of Dr. Enrico Fermi—Nobel prize winner and one of the world's most distinguished physicists. To Dr. Fermi belongs credit for some of the most important discoveries ever made in science. In fact, without his genius, the riddle of the atom might yet be unsolved. He was in charge of the atomic-energy project at the University of Chicago in December of 1942, and he supervised the first controlled nuclear chain reactions that heralded the beginning of the atomic age. Throughout the war he worked unstintingly to help make atomic energy the shield of our liberties. It is impossible to measure how much Dr. Fermi's discoveries have meant to our freedom and security and the world's hopes for the future.

At the end of the war there were a few who said that Italy was through. They said it could never recover from years of rapine and unparalleled destruction. These men of little faith had statistics on their side. They could point to the gutted towns, to idle factories, the broken transport system. Here—said the doubters—were hard facts.

But the so-called hard facts overlooked one thing—the tenacity of everyday Italians. The statistics did not reflect the courage of the people of Naples or Palermo or Florence; they ignored the toughness of the farmers who tilled the recalcitrant Italian soil. The odds against them were fearful. In 1945, Italy's production was down to a third of prewar levels; the Communists who owe their allegiance not to the Italian people but to Moscow sabotaged recovery.

And yet, despite problems which would somber the bravest of men—Italy is winning through. Thanks to the Marshall plan—thanks still more to the unvarnished courage of everyday Italians—Italy is fighting its way back to a proud place in the democratic family of nations. Production is back to prewar levels—and going up. The Communist influence has been blunted and reduced.

But even more important, a new vitality—a new resurgence of spirit—is sweeping over Italy. Every American who returns from Europe speaks of it; we hear talk of Rome supplanting Paris as the leading center of European arts and letters. Italy is resuming her former role as the great colonizer of ideas. The remarkable new movies, the new literature, the impressive revival in art and sculpture—these are again making Italy a nation to be reckoned with wherever things of the mind and soul are exalted.

We can be truly proud of our role in Italy's revival. The Marshall plan, which is both the most humanitarian and the most practical undertaking of all times, is working. It is giving Italy a desperately needed economic shot in the arm; it is helping Italians help themselves.

Were it not for the Marshall plan and for our stockpile of atomic bombs, I believe that the Soviet armies would by now have engulfed all of Europe and would be poised on the English Channel. My greatest satisfaction in public life has come from the opportunity given me, in my role as chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, to help make our atomic stockpile the world's No. 1 deterrent against Soviet aggression.

A great deal is said, and properly so, of the Marshall plan and our military-assistance program. More—much more—should be said about the help that Americans of Italian descent give their mother country on their own initiative. Every CARE package, every encouraging letter, I estimate, offsets a column of Communist propaganda.

This was eloquently demonstrated in the spring of 1948. Italy hung in the balance between freedom and tyranny. Employing their familiar techniques of falsehood and coercion, the Communists threatened to take over the government. But Americans who proudly claim Italian ancestry rose to meet the threat. In over a million letters to their Italian friends and relatives, they spread the gospel of freedom. They told them that the eyes of all the world were on Italy; they promised that America would neve let Italy down. And then, on that fateful election Sunday of April 1948, the Italian voters went to the polls and dealt the Communist Party a blow from which it has never recovered.

Italy is proving that she is a trustworthy ally in the common front against Red aggression. Our Nation must, and will, continue to prove that she is worthy of this trust. Italy's economic and military position—let us not deceive ourselves—is still difficult. She has the brains, the muscle, and the spirit, but she needs more tools and more arms. It is up to us to supply that need. I will do my best to see that it is done.

Italy, as you are aware, suffers from the twin problem of overpopulation and unemployment. It strikes me as simple common sense that the underdeveloped areas of the world near Italy—areas that are now underpopulated and need development—should be opened to the skill and energy of Italian workers. The unemployed Italian wants to make his own way in the world—he must be given a chance to do it.

We must help him. We must keep open—and open even wider, if possible—the door to Italian immigrants. In 1921, 42,000 Italians were admitted to our country. By the act of 1923, this number was reduced to 8,200. I think you know of my efforts to raise the quota of Italian immigrants.

We must do yet one thing more—we must make the reality of our Nation come ever closer to that promise inscribed on the Statue of Liberty. No Italian must ever have cause to regret that he forsook the land of his fathers for the New World.

Ladies and gentlemen, Italy and the United States are in this fight together. May the sons of Italy prosper still more mightily in their great work of welding our partnership.

Monetary Policy in a Free Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 13 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a lecture entitled "Monetary Policy in a Free Economy" delivered by Mr. M. S. Szymczak, member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. This lecture was given on August 29, 1950, before the School of Banking, University of Wisconsin at Madison, Wis.

There being no objection, the lecture was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONETARY POLICY IN A FREE ECONOMY

(By M. S. Szymczak)

Today I shall address my remarks to the basic issues of current monetary policy. Any discussion of this subject must take into account certain basic principles that underlie monetary policy at any time, whether it be a period of national emergency, the course of a business cycle, or a long-run peacetime period of economic growth. I would go so far as to say that thinking and rethinking of fundamentals are of maximum importance right now, for monetary policy, intelligently and flexibly administered, can and should play an important role in helping our economy to meet our defense emergency. My remarks today, therefore, begin with consideration of basic principles. Then I shall go on to consider their application to the current situation.

HOW MONETARY POLICY FUNCTIONS IN GENERAL

Timely and appropriate monetary policy can greatly assist in leveling off booms and recessions. Thus it can help to keep the economy on a stable and smooth functioning basis. A case in point is the action of the monetary authorities in easing credit in early 1949, when downward trends in business activity, employment, and prices appeared. Monetary action that is taken before isolated unsettling economic changes set in will often avert such developments. It does this by influencing the volume of spending.

In part this influence is exerted by pressure on the volume of spending which is financed through credit extension. Monetary influence is also exerted by moderate upward or downward pressure on the value of marketable assets. A third avenue of influence is through the regulation of terms on which borrowers obtain credit. A fourth avenue of influence on spending is through the effect of credit policy on the total volume of money and other liquid assets. Monetary policy, lastly, is a potent factor for affecting the financial climate of the economy.

THE MEANING OF A FLEXIBLE MONETARY POLICY

Flexibility in monetary and credit policy means readiness to move quickly in response to changes in economic conditions. The main advantage of monetary policy over some other policies to influence economic conditions is that it can be promptly enacted and can take effect quickly. No other instrument approaches its capacity for prompt and timely action.

As business begins to slacken off, action to ease credit is usually indicated. As the economy returns to higher levels of activity, measures that permit credit to tighten are usually in order. Monetary and credit medicine is something to be taken promptly as various symptoms develop—that is, taken in moderate, timely doses. As such, it can temper inflation and deflation. In an inflation, for example, it can help to restrain price increases before they become embedded in cost structures and before they give rise to an inflationary spiral that inevitably leads to deflation and losses.

Another noteworthy feature of well-implemented monetary policy is its quick reversibility. It is susceptible to rapid changes in tempo. For example, early in 1949 the monetary authorities eased credit as business slackened off. Later in the year, they shifted their policy from credit ease to restraint as inflationary forces strengthened again.

In a free economy, flexible credit and monetary policy to prevent "booms and busts" is bound to be reflected in some change in interest rates, particularly short-term rates, which are the market's expression of the cost of credit. Thus, short-term rates have been firming since the last half of last year as the monetary authorities have attempted to restrain credit expansion. Expanding demand for credit will naturally result in higher interest rates unless additional supplies of funds are made available. Putting limitations on credit availability tends to be reflected in a firming of short-term interest rates; an easing of credit tends to soften short-term interest rates.

Certainly it is true that if changes in interest levels are prevented from occurring in response to changes in credit demands, monetary policy directed toward greater economic stability is very difficult, if not impossible, to manage.

WHAT A FLEXIBLE MONETARY POLICY CAN DO

In the 1930's it was apparent that monetary and credit ease was not adequate to lift us out of a major depression. It was an easy step for some to reach the conclusion that monetary measures had little or no influence at any time, either on expansion or contraction of credit.

In the present era, when the world is so divided between those who would control every individual decision and those of us who would maximize the area of individual choice and initiative, I believe it is appropriate to take another look at the virtues of monetary policy. We should ask ourselves what monetary action can do to help us keep our free-enterprise economy functioning fully. In what specific ways can monetary action serve to promote economic progress and stability?

One of the areas where monetary measures can have a marginal influence is in connection with decisions not to spend but to save. It is true that a large part of our saving today is made through contractual arrangements, such as by the payment of premiums on life insurance, the regular repayment of mortgage and consumer installment debt, and the bond-a-month savings plans of bank and business enterprises. On this saving, monetary policy has little effect. On other types of individual saving, tighter supply conditions for credit and higher rates of return may stimulate more saving. On the other hand, easier credit conditions and lower rates of return may lead to less saving. Business saving may also be significantly increased in total when monetary policy becomes restrictive, since some businesses may tighten dividend and profit withdrawal policies.

Can monetary and credit action have any significant effect on borrowing? The businessman's expectations are certainly affected by changes in monetary policy, if for no other reason than that these changes signal changes in the availability of credit. The fact that the money he needs is harder (or easier) to borrow, and perhaps dearer (or cheaper) is a concrete fact—a change in the business climate. He proceeds more cautiously in his working-capital commitments. From the monetary standpoint he uses less credit and does less credit spending.

Underwriters of new securities are particularly conscious of the influence of credit and monetary policies on the market for new issues. When credit policies are restrictive, for example, these middlemen between borrowers and lenders encounter difficulties in distributing new issues. They become reluctant to commit themselves on proposed new offerings.

Finally, monetary action has an important influence on lenders themselves. Total lending power of Federal Reserve member banks can, of course, be very closely circumscribed if the Federal Reserve is disposed to take such action. Bankers are aware of this and even moderate credit tightening action is carefully watched and has its impact on the amount of lending banks are willing to do.

All of the effects of restraining monetary action in particular financing areas that I have outlined here, taken together, can add up to important dimensions. If monetary measures are vigorously and appropriately applied they can be positive stabilizing forces, operating to influence the volume of spending and saving and thus to moderate sharp changes in economic activity. To all who prize a high degree of freedom in economic and political life, it is most desirable that this be done without direct Government intervention in a single individual decision. Results effected through credit and monetary policy come about through general influences on the market place, where millions of judgments can still be freely made and tested every day. Such results continue to be the composite expression of the individual decisions and wishes of all of us who buy and sell.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN MONETARY POLICY AND FISCAL AND DEBT MANAGEMENT POLICY

Monetary and credit policy has always been closely related to fiscal and debt management policy, but this relationship has been much closer and more important as a result of the huge expansion of the public debt during World War II. The Treasury has always had such monetary powers as the issuance of currency against silver, the minting of coin, and the ability to make changes in its cash balances with the Federal Reserve System. More recently, however, the magnitude of its public debt operations and the rate of interest paid on refundings have come to have a much more important effect than formerly upon Federal Reserve policies to influence the supply, cost, and availability of money to private as well as public borrowers.

The greater influence of fiscal policy on monetary policy comes about as a result of the responsibility of the Federal Reserve System to maintain orderly conditions in the market for Government securities. At times that responsibility involves some sacrifice of positive influence over the supply of bank credit. During much of the postwar period, for example, the Federal Reserve System purchased a large volume of United States Government securities. This action operated to create bank reserves which in turn tended to ease the private credit market at a time when price inflation was occurring. During some of this period, however, the Treasury had the benefit of a budgetary surplus which was used to retire bank-held public debt and thus affect the inflationary impact of Federal Reserve open market operations.

It stands to reason, in the kind of financial situation we have had since World War II, that monetary policy and fiscal and debt management policy must maintain a close liaison. Both monetary policy and fiscal and debt management policy have a primary responsibility to make a maximum contribution to economic stability. Consistency with the objectives of the Employment Act of 1946 means that these respective policies should be coordinated and tailored to the economic situation.

For example, at high levels of employment and production, when inflationary dangers are greatest, fiscal policy should aim to produce a budgetary surplus so that monetary policy may operate freely, if necessary, to restrain excessive credit and monetary expansion. Debt management policy, in these circumstances, needs to play either a neutral role or a role of supporting monetary policy by emphasizing borrowing from nonbank investors.

When economic activity recedes from high levels, another arrangement of policy may be appropriate. Fiscal policy at such times may permit a Government deficit, and debt management policy may need to stress financing through the banks. Monetary policy, while adapted to discouraging credit contraction and encouraging the expansion of credit, may at that time favor deficit financing through the banks.

MONETARY POLICY IN THE CURRENT SITUATION

On the basis of this broad background of the role of monetary policy in a free economy, what can be said regarding the role of such policy can and should play in helping to solve the economic and financial problems that have arisen as a result of the invasion of South Korea? Prior to that invasion, inflationary pressures had already gained considerable momentum as a result largely of heavy peacetime consumer and business buying. This buying was financed by a substantial expansion of credit and by an increased use of our very large supply of currency and bank deposits, as well as by high levels of current income. Following the Government announcement of a larger military program, the tempo of private spending accelerated greatly, credit demands increased substantially, and commodity prices rose sharply. From the end of June to the middle of August, the prices of basic commodities rose 17 percent and the loans and holdings of corporate and municipal securities at member banks in leading cities alone expanded by 1.7 billion dollars. Inflationary forces have become so strong that the public has clamored for effective action to stop them.

In recognition of the inflationary situation into which the Korean developments have catapulted the country, President Truman on July 18 directed the Federal agencies concerned with real-estate credit operations to tighten the terms on which federally aided credit is available. A day later he requested the Congress to authorize emergency powers to limit the use of essential materials; to regulate consumer, real estate, and commodity trading credit; and to assure adequate financing for defense production and productive facilities. Still later in the month he presented to the Congress a tax program to increase Federal revenues by approximately $5,000,000,000. When this lecture was being written, the Congress was considering in conference the Defense Production Act of 1950. This bill was intended to provide the President not only with the powers he requested, but in addition standby controls over price and wage stabilization and rationing. Legislation to raise taxes was also receiving active consideration by the appropriate committees of the Congress at that time. Indications are that the added revenue will come mainly from higher levies on personal and corporate incomes.

The two principal means that were advocated for preventing indefinite and cumulative price increases were (1) imposing a comprehensive harness of direct controls, including price and wage fixing and rationing, and (2) undertaking a vigorous credit and fiscal program to limit the total demand for goods. It is outside the scope of my talk today to embark upon a discussion of the problems involved in imposing an inclusive set of direct controls.

It is relevant to note, however, that an adequate mechanism for administering such a set of controls does not now exist. Even if the establishment of an adequate mechanism could be accomplished within a reasonable period of time, I do not believe direct controls are the present answer to our immediate inflation problems. They deal only with effects and not with basic causes. The basic cause of our inflationary problem is continuing rapid credit with monetary expansion, abetted by current Government deficits which threaten to grow larger and larger.

Some people look upon direct controls as a practically painless way of meeting the emergency financial problem. No more serious error could be made. There is no painless way of controlling inflationary pressures. Either we meet them head on and overcome them or we wage a losing rearguard action against them. If the fuel of inflation is provided, all that direct controls can do is to drive the inflationary pressures underground and to postpone some of their effect.

Therefore, even if direct controls eventually become necessary, broad, basic monetary and fiscal measures will be essential to make them effective. Price and wage fixing and rationing are much more difficult to administer in a protracted period of partial mobilization than they are in a limited period of all-out war effort. Civilian goods will still be available in large amounts but the total demand for such goods will far exceed their supply. The job that direct controls can do, which is to cushion the pressure of military demands on supplies of goods and services and distribute available civilian goods at equitable, administered prices, can only be accomplished if some of the civilian demand is drained off by higher taxation and if new private credit creation is prevented.

It is my belief that the proper method of dealing with our immediate inflationary situation is to adopt a coordinated program of monetary policy, fiscal and debt management policies, and a system of selective priorities and allocations of strategic materials. The cornerstone of our anti-inflation program must be bold fiscal measures including across-the-board increases in personal and corporate income tax rates, selective excise taxes, and taxes on war profits and speculation. Financing the expanded military budget cannot be limited to the taxation of wealthy individuals and business enterprises if it is to be useful as an effective anti-inflationary measure. It must restrict spending, and most spending is done by the vast number of individuals and families with low- and middle-bracket incomes. In an emergency situation like the present, our tax changes must be designed primarily to meet the danger of inflation.

In addition to higher taxes, the Government should make every attempt in its debt management policies to tap as large a volume of available private investment funds as possible. Concerted efforts should be made to sell nonmarketable bonds and tax savings notes to individuals, businesses, and nonbank financial institutions, thus absorbing money that would otherwise be spent on current consumption or on new private investment. Such a program would not only absorb redundant funds but would also make it possible to reduce the volume of Government financing through banks, which is highly inflationary.

Monetary and credit controls to deal with our immediate inflationary situation can and should be broad in scope, restrictive in character, and vigorously administered. They involve, for one thing, the application of effective curbs on consumer and real estate credit. There is no doubt that the recent large increases in consumer and mortgage credit have added fuel to the inflationary fires. Since the end of 1945, consumer credit has been increasing by about $3,000,000,000 a year. The increase in May and June of this year was about a billion dollars, the largest on record for those 2 months. Home mortgages made by all lenders in the first half of 1950 exceeded $6,500,000,000. By the end of June, total home mortgage debt outstanding exceeded $40,000,000,000, a new peak and more than double the volume outstanding at the end of the war.

In addition to effective consumer and real estate credit regulations, general measures to curb the availability of credit to other types of borrowers are called for. On August 4 a joint statement was made by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Home Loan Bank Board, and the National Association of Supervisors of State Banks urging that banks and all other institutions engaged in extending credit exercise special care in their lending and investment activities. Somewhat earlier the American Bankers Association had issued a similar statement, and more recently President Peterson of that association has further urged bankers to cooperate in restricting nonessential credit. I should like to underscore the importance of your own support of these efforts to encourage voluntary restraint in bank and other lending.

On August 18, the Federal Reserve System took further restraining action in the area of monetary and credit policy. The Board of Governors then approved an increase in the discount rate of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York from 1½ to 1¾ percent, and within a few days approved a similar increase at other Reserve banks. Also, on August 18, the Board and the System's Open Market Committee issued a joint statement indicating that both bodies were prepared to use all the means at their command to restrain further expansion of bank credit consistent with the policy of maintaining orderly conditions in the Government securities market. On the same day, the Treasury announced that it had temporarily increased the volume of series F and G savings bonds available to nonbank financial institutions.

It is to be hoped that all these efforts may prove effective in curbing loans to businesses and individuals which might be used for speculation or other purposes that would have adverse effects on our defense effort. If they are not, monetary policy will need to resort to even more restrictive use of one or more of the general instruments of credit control at its disposal, namely, open-market operations, changes in the discount rate, and changes in bank-reserve requirements. In case these measures prove inadequate, the Congress might very well need to consider the desirability of authorizing additional powers over bank credit expansion in some form of supplementary reserve requirements. Such powers might include a secondary or special reserve requirement similar to that the Federal Reserve requested in 1947, or some ceiling or dual reserve plan about which I have spoken to this group on previous occasions.

SUMMARY

My remarks today reflect a sincere belief that monetary and credit measures, taken together with appropriate fiscal measures, are invaluable weapons in our economic and financial arsenal for use in the battle to maintain economic stability within the framework of a free enterprise system. This is true not only over the long run when we look forward to normal peacetime activity again, but also in the short run when military and inflationary pressures seem almost overwhelming. Fiscal measures, particularly higher taxes, must be our main line of defense, but monetary and credit action is also necessary to restrict private credit expansion and, moreover, can be applied more promptly to hold the line until fiscal measures take effect. Financial instruments therefore must be among our major weapons against economic instability as long as we value our freedom.

Why United States Bears Brunt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Why United States Bears Brunt," from the Christian Science Monitor.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY UNITED STATES BEARS BRUNT—A MOTHER'S QUESTION ABOUT KOREA—AND AN ANSWER

(Joseph C. Harsch, chief of the Washington News Bureau of the Christian Science Monitor, recently received a letter from a reader asking, in effect, why her son might be sent to Korea. Since both question and answer are of universal interest, the letter and Mr. Harsch's reply are printed below.)

BELLE PLAINE, KANS.

JOSEPH C. HARSCH,
Chief, Washington News Bureau, the Christian Science Monitor.

DEAR SIR: I follow the current events in the Monitor, especially all of your comments. It gives me the only reason for anything and everything. These questions haunt me, likely because I am concerned about my 20-year-old son enlisting, etc. Who gave the President the power to send our men to Korea all of a sudden? If this is a United Nations problem, why are not the other nations taking the responsibility of the gigantic operations? Why must we send our men to slaughter, to a seemingly lost cause and effort? Could it be true that the United States is protecting personal interests?

I am a true American, and I realize the growing threat of communism. In fact, I could see the threat of it when many of my neighbors and friends laughed about it when I mentioned it to them.

I must know more of the cause of the United States lone participation in this pitiful struggle in Korea. I also know of the thirty-eighth parallel agreement and the aggression, but why is my country involved in the fight? It looks to me that we might have been the trigger-happy country this time.

I shall appreciate your direct answer to me. I am grateful for the Monitor. It gives me all I need to know about world events. I appreciate your most sound and wise journalistic expression to the American people, and to the foreign peoples as well. America needs more enlightening representation. Erwin D. Canham's call for America's awakening and to articulation is the need of the hour.

Sincerely yours,

MRS. JAMES BARNER.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
WASHINGTON NEWS BUREAU.

MRS. JAMES BARNER,
Belle Plaine, Kans.

DEAR MRS. BARNER: The responsibility you put upon me by your question is heavy. I can attempt to answer it only in humility and with the knowledge that my words cannot be adequate.

This is the way I see the picture in which the fighting in Korea is one part:

The Russians of today, like the Germans before them in our lifetime and the French a century and a half ago under Napoleon, are engaged in attempted imperialistic expansion. Today, as in those other times, the possible victims of such expansion are seeking in their various ways to form an effective defense. Today, as also in those other times, they are having their difficulties agreeing on the division of the burden.

Korea is only one incident in this pattern. Others of our allies are doing a great deal at other places around the rim of Russian power.

The French have a ground army of 10 divisions, which is the same as ours. Five of their 10 divisions are in Indochina, as 5 of ours are in Korea. Those five French divisions are taking heavier casualties in Indochina than ours are in Korea. They have been sustaining this heavier rate of casualties for some 3 years.

The British are engaged in a similar war in Malaya which has been going on for more than 2 years. They also are indirectly sustaining the whole line from Singapore to Suez.

All the west European countries are on the front line in Europe, where another blow might come at any moment. In terms of proportion of national income being spent in this common effort to contain Russian imperialism, several of the European governments are spending more on the common defense than we are.

In spite of these heavy responsibilities at other places in the common effort, the others are making some contribution to the battle in Korea. At the outset of the Korean campaign General MacArthur was given command of a British naval force larger than the original American naval force at his disposal. An Australian air unit is at the front. British ground troops are in Korea, and Australian ground troops are on the way. The South Koreans themselves have been holding nearly half of the line.

It remains true that we are carrying the major burden of the task in Korea. But that is because Moscow struck at a point of the line which was our primary responsibility. We are the occupation power in Japan; Korea is on the Japanese doorstep. If the attack had happened to come against Burma or Thailand, the burden would have been just as disproportionately on the British as it is now on us. Considering the extent of British involvement on other fronts, I regard it as remarkable that they have agreed to do as much as they have in Korea.

The right of the President to send American troops into Korea is explicit in the Constitution. As commander in chief of the Armed Forces, he has both the right and the duty to use the Armed Forces at his disposal in whatever way seems necessary to protect the security of the United States.

Similar use of United States Armed Forces without any declaration of war by the Congress has occurred on many occasions. To my knowledge, the earliest occasion was the expedition against the Barbary pirates between the Revolution and the War of 1812. There also was a 5-year "undeclared war" with France during the same early period. The sending of marines to Latin America happened on many occasions on Presidential order.

It is not accurate to call Korea a "lost cause." On the contrary, our military campaign there has been successful beyond expectations. Our forces have scalled a powerful and well-organized offensive by much larger forces, they have established a defense perimeter which is now holding well, and they are gathering forces for a counteroffensive. All of this comes to nought if the Russians and Chinese enter the battle.

But there is no present sign of such a development. The prospect at the moment appears to be for a successful counteroffensive this fall. The odds against us in this campaign were greater than they were in Greece. In spite of that, there is a chance of resolving it more quickly.

There are slackers in this common cause. The Latin-American governments are not making any notable contribution to the common defense. Some are trying to make money out of us in the process. But our European allies can hardly be called slackers. Their contribution is high in terms of their energy and capacity.

However, there are two reasons they hesitate to commit much force to Korea itself.

The first is that if Russia strikes next in Europe, the burden will fall on the Europeans. They must retain strength in Europe against that danger, and we wish them to do so.

Secondly, in every previous issue of this kind it is the others who have shouldered the major burden, while we sheltered in comparative security behind their efforts. We waited from 1914 to 1917 to help them against the Kaiser, and from 1939 until Pearl Harbor to join them in the line against Hitler. I am sure that many of them have the feeling that this time it is fair that we take more of the initial shock of the attack.

The evidence is strong that Korea was intended to be only one of a series of attacks outward from the Russian realm. If the Communists had gotten away with this one unopposed, we may be reasonably sure they would have followed it up by others around the rim. In that case, we probably would have ended up fighting Russia with our backs to the wall, with few or possibly even no allies, and with all the advance military positions in the hands of the Russians.

As it is, we seem to have given them cause to hesitate and reconsider. There is a growing belief among the observers of Russia that the Russians have decided to slow up on other attacks until they see how the land lies. If this is borne out by time, then we could conclude that our vigorous action in Korea had in fact spared us from the greater horror of a general war with Russia.

Surely, if we can avoid world war III by courage in Korea, our efforts there will not have been in vain. That is the hope and intent, of those who accepted the gage of battle in Korea.

I hope that this letter will be of some help to you.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH C. HARSCH.

United States Policies Confuse Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "United States Policies Confuse Europe," written by Karl H. Von Wiegand, and published in the San Francisco Examiner on September 3, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES POLICIES CONFUSE EUROPE

(By Karl H Von Wiegand)

LONDON, September 2.—An apocalyptic atmosphere of great uncertainty, ominous expectations, fear, and confusion hangs heavily over Europe.

There is a very general feeling that an avalanche of unprecedented destruction and human suffering is gaining speed and force as it sweeps onward and ever nearer. There seems to be no man big enough in the west or the east to stop it.

The tragedy is that those who see it can do nothing to hinder it, and those who are materializing the catastrophe and bringing it on do not see it.

The delusion of Lake Success—it should be robaptized "Lake Failure"—still obsesses the minds of many.

OMINOUS OMENS

The ominous foreboding concerning pending events began with the Korean war, thickened with America's setbacks and sharp Anglo-American differences over Formosa, and was intensified by the talk of plans for west German rearmament and Adenauer's demand for a defense corps for west Germany.

It came to a peak in the confusion of public thought and anxiety with United States Secretary of the Navy Francis Matthews' calling for something like a Pearl Harbor surprise assault upon Soviet Russia in an American aggression for peace, and solidified by the split on far-eastern policy between President Truman and Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

Large sections of the peoples of western European countries from Scotland, Sweden, and Norway in the north to Italy and Greece in the south just do not know what to think. It is all too confusing, too complicated, too contradictory in the camp of the leading western nations with their quarrels and disagreements which form a belt of disunity around the globe.

To add to speculation and to the confusion of thought, there are persistent reports in London, Paris, and Rome that Secretary of State Dean Acheson will retire before the end of the year and be succeeded by Averell Harriman.

It is also reported that Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson will be succeeded after the congressional elections by W. Stuart Symington, Chairman of the National Security Resources Board.

Other reports speak of a leading industrial executive, a man of exceptional ability and capacity, as being considered for the post of Secretary of Defense.

The open rift between Truman and MacArthur over Formosa overshadowed all else this week.

Interest in the Korean war had waned generally almost into indifference but was suddenly and strongly revived by what is called in some quarters the Formosan war between the United Nations Commander in Chief and the President of the United States.

Interest is added in official circles in all European capitals as well as among the public by the view taken in numerous quarters that MacArthur's statement and Truman's rebuke are the "beginning of the 1952 Presidential campaign."

A well known former European statesman who recently returned from the United States remarked:

"There is nothing that the Democratic Party leaders in Washington fear more and want less than that General MacArthur return home a great popular hero. It was the consensus of all with whom I talked that that would mean the end of the five consecutive terms—20 years—of Democratic administrations in Washington."

Through the British Socialist Labor Government's strong opposition to America's pro-Chiang Kai-shek Formosan policy and differences that have arisen between Truman and MacArthur, interest in the Korean war is shifting to Formosa and China to the detriment of Korea.

It has been no secret in London, Paris, and Rome diplomatic circles that MacArthur, Truman, and Acheson do not see eye to eye on America's far-eastern policy, and Formosa has not been the only point in their divergence of views. There are also points of difference in regard to peace terms for Japan.

SECOND TIME

For the second time within 10 years MacArthur is in a similarly difficult position.

The present situation recalls to me those days in Manila in December 1941.

MacArthur's warnings and calls for reinforcements had gone unheeded. I had given Vice Admiral Glassford secret information from Tokyo that the war would start at any hour after midnight December 6, if there was no peaceful settlement in Washington by November 26.

The Pearl Harbor attack came at dawn of December 7.

In Manila I was told to file no more dispatches. They would not be accepted.

The reinforcements promised MacArthur never came. To save Manila from destruction, he evacuated the Philippines capital and retreated into Bataan. There was nowhere else to go. No help came.

MacArthur was ordered to leave the Philippines by Roosevelt and go to Australia. Wainwright took over.

The sacrifice of American soldiers in the Bataan jungle from bullets, shells, bombs, dysentery, malaria, and other tropical diseases was all in vain.

Over a radio I had concealed I heard Wainwright's pathetic order to American and Filipino troops to surrender. MacArthur's relations with Roosevelt could not be called cordial at that time.

MacArthur's independence of attitude and action during and since Japan's capitulation and his disposition to place America's strategical interests in the Far East in the foreground has aroused some ill feeling against him in London during those years and now.

BEST RECORD

Gen. Douglas MacArthur knows oriental mentality and psychology better than any other American soldier or statesman. On the battlefield and in statesmanship he has proven himself to be America's best soldier-statesman of the first half of this century.

MacArthur has always stood for a strong, clear-cut American foreign policy, firmly carried out.

Speculation and reports that President Truman may retire him are not taken seriously at this time. As he has been appointed "United Nations Commander in Chief" in the war against the North Koreans, request for his removal would have to come from the United Nations Security Council.

If the Council made such a demand at Washington's request, it would be evidence to the Soviets for their charges that the United Nations is the instrument of the United States.

Navy Secretary Matthews' demand or proposal that America immediately begin a "preventive war" and become the "world's first aggressor for peace," with an atomic assault on Soviet Russia "to force peace," shocked Europe and placed in the hands of the Russians propaganda material as "evidence of America's war intentions" and "plans to attack Soviet Russia" such as Moscow has never before been given in one lump.

MOSCOW RADIO

And how the Moscow radio is using that throughout Asia and Europe.

It probably was the most unfortunate and, in a sense, most irresponsible statement to be made by a member of the President's Cabinet in decades.

The Navy Secretary's public demand tended to confirm reports from Washington in diplomatic circles in London and Paris 2 weeks earlier that some members of the National Security Council were increasingly urging "preventive war" against Russia.

In London, a Fleet Street letter which is privately circulated said on August 17:

"Propositions for preventative war in which the United Nations, clad in United States uniform, would assault the Red fortress with atomic bombs before being destroyed themselves, have begun to win a sober hearing in the National Security Council which advises President Truman."

DOUBLE DANGER

The danger in the Matthews statement and in such reports is twofold:

1. It gives Moscow material for its vast radio propaganda in Europe and Asia, and especially the Russian people, that the United States is intent upon war.

2. It provides a possible and plausible pretext and justification for Soviet Russia to strike first with its own "preventive war" to prevent America's alleged "preventive war."

Happenings in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 13 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD program No. 33 in the series entitled "Happenings in Washington," which I have been broadcasting to the citizens of Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON

(Program No. 33)

My fellow Pennsylvanians, this is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital, and bringing you another discussion of happenings in Washington.

As the second session of the Eighty-first Congress comes to a close I speak to you in this broadcast with a heavy heart.

I want to tell you frankly that I am extremely worried about how things are going in our country at this most critical period. And I know that many of you are just as deeply concerned.

One of the things that worries me most is the apparent failure of the American people to recognize the seriousness of the situation confronting us.

The danger that we face today from Communist aggression does not seem to have aroused the same patriotic fervor that swept the Nation in previous times of crisis.

How can this be explained? The reason is simple enough.

At a time when the future of our country is at stake—when the survival of freedom hangs in the balance there is uncertainty at Washington where there should be decisive action. There is conflict where there should be unity and weakness where there should be strength. There is concealment where there should be truth and frankness.

At a time when the blood of our finest young men is being spilled in far-off Korea and when thousands of others are being called into the armed services the people have a right to expect strong, capable, determined leadership at the head of their Government.

But I regret to state, developments are proving that such leadership is lacking. Instead there is confusion, bordering on chaos.

How could it be otherwise with the policy makers in Washington and the military leaders in the field working at cross purposes and pulling in opposite directions?

And above all there seems to be a deliberate refusal to tell the people the truth. The blunders of the leadership are concealed behind a camouflage of words.

In brief, the administration at Washington does not trust the good sense and understanding of the people and will not take the people into its confidence.

After watching events at close range in the National Capital I have come to the conclusion that the administration is frequently so mixed up it does not know what to tell.

President Truman's order to General MacArthur to withdraw his statement to the Veterans of Foreign Wars convention was one example of that kind of mix-up.

In his statement General MacArthur explained, from a military standpoint, the prime importance of Formosa to our defense position in the Pacific.

General MacArthur stated—and I quote:

"As a result of its geographic location and base potential, utilization of Formosa by a power hostile to the United States may either counterbalance or overshadow the strategic importance of the central and southern flank of the United States front-line position."

It is difficult to understand the President's indignant rebuke to General MacArthur when it is recalled that Mr. Truman on June 27 made virtually the same statement in these words which I now quote:

"The occupation of Formosa by Communist forces would be a direct threat to the security of the Pacific area and to the United States forces performing their lawful and necessary functions in that area."

It should be recalled also that President Truman did not display the same indignation a few months ago when his Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, announced publicly that Formosa had no special military significance for the United States and should be regarded as a problem to be settled by the Chinese Communists and the Chinese Nationalists.

Let me give you another example:

Recently when the Secretary of the Navy, a member of the President's Cabinet, made a speech in Boston suggesting that the United States might be willing to start a war to establish lasting peace the President told him to shut up.

Secretary Matthews did not mention Russia in his speech, but it threw the State Department into wild excitement.

Even at this late date Dean Acheson and his boys seem to be fearful of offending Joe Stalin and his band of international bandits.

After all our experience of the past decade in seeking to appease the Communists, has the administration embarked once more upon a crusade of appeasement? Do they think this time it will be different?

But the Russian propaganda mill pulls no punches. In their press, their broadcasts to the world, out of the mouths of their diplomats at the United Nations and from their satellite Communist countries, the United States is being attacked with vicious lies and slanders. The Russians call us the aggressors in the Korean war.

But we answer these charges timely, fearing to say Russia when we mean Russia.

Can this be the kind of leadership which our people want from Washington? I believe the apathy and the bewilderment which our people suffer is but a reflection of the incompetence of many in high places in our Nation's Capital. The facts show that time and again, the top leadership of this country has guessed wrong, estimated wrong and forecast wrong. This is what we are paying so dearly for today.

On November 3, 1949, Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Army Chief of Staff, announced: "Given 4 or 5 months more training, American ground troops throughout the world will be able to take on anybody, any time, anywhere."

Then, on March 2 last, President Truman said:

"The defenses of the United States are in better shape than they have ever been when the country was not at war."

And more recently the Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson, announced:

"If the enemy attacks at four, we will counter-attack at five."

With all of these fine words from our highest authorities it naturally was a great shock to the Nation to learn how miserably unprepared we were. Our people had been taxed billions of dollars for defense in the postwar years only to discover that we did not even have enough manpower and equipment to fight North Korea.

Do you remember that on January 12, 1950, the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, declared in a speech:

"If South Korea were invaded, our attitude would be that South Korea would be able to resist." And then Mr. Acheson went on to add that we certainly would not get mixed up in any wild adventures in the Far East.

Well, within a very few months, the invasion came. South Korea was not able to resist and we did get involved in that so-called wild adventure.

Perhaps you remember the famous remark of the President of the United States who told the Nation on June 1, of this year:

"The world is closer to peace now than it has been in the last 5 years."

My fellow Pennsylvanians, these are words of your leaders in Washington.

And, as I said earlier, the administration does not trust the American people. It is your blood and the blood of your sons which must flow in this war. The wages earned by the sweat of your brow will be taxed away to pay the bill. But your leaders do not tell you the truth.

On July 19, your President declared to the Congress, and I quote:

"We must recognize the possibility that armed aggression may take place in other areas. The world situation requires that we increase substantially the size and material support of our Armed Forces over and above the increases which are needed in Korea."

Notice the word "substantially." What does it mean? Does it mean we must get ready for world war III? If it means that, why don't we have all-out preparation?

Just the other day, at the request of the President, the Senate Armed Services Committee killed the bill to establish universal military training. The committee said it would consider the matter next year.

You will recall that the request for universal military training came from the Secretary of Defense. And he didn't ask for it next year. He asked for the enactment of the bill now. Yet the President ordered it killed.

That is not only a fine example of our failure to adequately prepare, but also another example of the confusion within the administration.

Preparation for full-scale war calls also for real controls to maintain the national economy on a sound basis. Such controls should be instituted now on prices, wages, and scarce materials.

But the President demanded from Congress—and was given—a rubber-stamp control bill which empowers him to impose whatever controls he wants whenever he wants them. And he has said he doesn't want price and wage controls now.

What can this mean except that the administration does not trust the people in this congressional election year? The administration does not want to tell them how serious the situation really is and what controls should be placed in effect—until after the election.

That is a shocking, shameful thing to do when the Nation's life and future may hang in the balance.

The administration, it appears, is still gambling with the safety and security of this Nation of 150,000,000 men, women, and children—gambling that we can escape world war III. That is recklessness. It is not the leadership the people have a right to expect.

My fellow Pennsylvanians, we have been living under a great delusion. We have been led to believe we had new miracle weapons, super bombs, super planes, and other things with which to defend our country without the use of properly trained ground soldiers.

Misled by the administration, the people have only now awakened to the fact that these were weapons on paper, bombs on paper, tanks on paper, planes on paper, and an army on paper.

A paper defense for the billions upon billions spent in the past 5 years.

We are outnumbered in Korea.

We have lost prestige throughout the Far East.

We have lost prestige in western Germany.

We have lost prestige in western Europe.

The American people are learning now the lesson they must learn—that money alone does not win wars. They are learning that sweat and blood and proper training and equipment are the tools of victory.

And they are beginning to wake up. They are demanding to see our balance sheet. The American people want to be trusted and taken into the confidence of their leaders.

The American people want to know the military and economic commitments of the United States over the world. This news may startle the Nation but unless the truth becomes known we cannot expect our people to become aroused to their full strength.

It is up to the administration to tell our people the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth about these matters. Let us not be deceived into thinking that a war in which we are suffering thousands of casualties is nothing but a little police action.

My fellow Pennsylvanians, this war will not be won by soft-hearted diplomatic maneuvering. It is a rough, tough clash of armed men and machines in the flaming hellfire of battle.

It calls for the best we have in military genius, in bold and courageous leadership and heroic sacrifices on the battlefront.

It calls for strength, determination and sacrifice on the home front.

It demands that we raise our moral and spiritual standards to the highest levels of righteousness and obedience to the laws of God and man.

That, my friends, is the foundation of the patriotic service which each of us owes to our country.

Let the call go forth to every corner of our land, to the cities, the towns, the farms and the countryside.

"Wake up, America!" The time for action, the time for truth, the time for real leadership is now.

If our leaders give us a bold, courageous plan and policy, and we all do our full duty, living in righteousness, world war III will be prevented.

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital. I will be with you again in 2 weeks. Thank you for your attention.

Political History Around the Capitol

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I desire to include the following article written by Paul J. McGahan and published in the Washington Sunday Star of September 10, 1950.

The article follows:

THREE DECADES OF POLITICAL HISTORY AT CAPITOL

(By Paul J. McGahan)

The approaching demise of the Eighty-first Congress closes three decades of control political history in American life. They have been decades of war and peace, depression and prosperity, mirrored nowhere more indelibly than in the minds, memories and minutes at those who have moved through the stately halls of the Capitol building, that magnificently imperturbable command post of democracy.

There have been great changes in American life in these 30 years and a great flow of new faces in the Halls of Congress. But there have been other things which have not changed—the American love of freedom and our devotion to the parliamentary processes which exist in such lusty fashion in the old Capitol building. And there have been individuals, a surprisingly large number, who have throughout all these 30 years participated directly as or observers in this making of history.

In the Sixty-sixth Congress which came in on March 4, 1919, the House of Representatives consisted of 435 Members and the Senate of 96 Members, as in the present Eighty-first Congress. In 1920 the Congressional Press Gallery consisted of 217 correspondents representing the news services and newspapers. Today the Congressional Press Galleries have a roll of 771 correspondents. Then 217 newspapers and press associations were represented. Now 470 newspapers and news services are represented. In addition the periodical press and the radio have press galleries which are apart.

MANY STILL ACTIVE

The newspapermen have a better longevity record than the congressional group. Still active on the press gallery list are 20 scribes who covered the Capitol in 1920, while only 13 congressional figures have withstood the march of time. One other scribe played both roles during the period.

In the House of Representatives ADOLPH SABATH, Democrat, of Illinois heads the list of the seven Members of that body who were serving there 30 years ago. Mr. SABATH came to the House on March 4, 1907. In the Senate, KENNETH MCKELLAR, Democrat, of Tennessee, is the sole survivor of the Senate of 1919. But three of his colleagues, TOM CONNOLLY, Democrat, of Texas; M. M. NEELY, Democrat, of West Virginia, and CARL HAYDEN, Democrat, of Arizona, were Members of the House then. In this same category is Vice President BARKLEY, Democrat, of Kentucky, who is now Vice President.

Other House Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, now in the Eighty-first having served continuously are Representative ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, Democrat, of North Carolina; Speaker of the House SAM RAYBURN, Democrat, of Texas; CARL VINSON, Democrat, of Georgia; DANIEL A. REED, Republican, of New York. Two members then, but their continuous service interrupted, are ROY O. WOODWARD, Republican, of Michigan, and EARL C. MICHENER, Republican, of Michigan; Representative JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Republican, of New York, was a Member of the Senate in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Press Gallery members still representing the same newspapers now that they did at the time of the Sixty-sixth Congress include: Walker S. Buel, Cleveland Plain Dealer; Mark Foote, Booth Newspapers of Michigan; Jay G. Hayden, Detroit News; Arthur S. Henning, Chicago Tribune; David Lawrence, of David Lawrence Associates; Gould Lincoln, the Washington Star and the Boston Globe; John Lorance, the Springfield (Mass.) Daily News; Paul J. McGahan, the Philadelphia Inquirer; Lorenzo W. Martin, the Louisville Times; Hal H. Smith, the New York Times; Stanley H. Smith, the Daily Traffic World; Bascom N. Timmons, the Houston Chronicle, and Paul Wooten, the New Orleans Times-Picayune.

LUDLOW SEATED

The newspaper veterans of the Sixty-sixth Congress now in the Press Gallery but representing other newspapers are: George Rothwell Brown, King Features Syndicate, then of the Washington Post; Sam Bell, the New York Herald Tribune, then of the Philadelphia Public Ledger; George W. Combs, the Baltimore Evening Sun, then of the Lynchburg (Va.) News; Winifred Mallon, the New York Times, then of the New York News; William Philip Simms, Scripps-Howard Newspaper Alliance, then of the International News Service; Lewis Wood, the New York Times, then of the Columbia (S. C.) Record, and James L. Wright, Buffalo Evening News, then of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Thus of the 20 newspaper folk working the Capitol run in 1920, 12 still represent their original papers, while the 8 others have changed jobs, but have unbroken gallery service, Mr. Brown of King Features is the dean. He became a gallery member in 1902.

The one newspaperman who played both the role of correspondent and of Congressman during the 30-year period is Louis Leon Ludlow, now back in the gallery representing the Indianapolis Star after 10 terms as a Member of the House, representing the Eleventh Indiana Congressional District.

Mr. Ludlow was the first newspaper correspondent to go directly from the Press Gallery to a seat in the Congress. He was first a Washington correspondent in 1901, and until his election to the House, which he entered on March 4, 1929, he represented the Columbus Dispatch.

Mr. Ludlow is a former president of the National Press Club, a role he has in common with several of the 30-year veterans of press gallery service. He served in 1927. The others are Bascom Timmons, president in 1932; Mark Foote, president in 1934 and 1935, and Paul Wooten, president in 1946.

Among the graduates from the Press Gallery to politics are two of President Truman's secretaries, Charles G. Ross, formerly of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, is now secretary to the President, handling the press relations. The other Presidential secretary is William D. Hassett, who 30 years ago represented the Washington Post.

Previously three members of the Press Gallery of the Sixty-sixth Congress had become Presidential secretaries. These were Judson C. Welliver, who represented Echo de Paris and later served with President Harding; Theodore Joslin, then of the Boston Evening Transcript, who served with President Hoover, and Stephen T. Early, then of the Associated Press, who was secretary to President Franklin D. Roosevelt. He is now Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Of the Members of Congress then who were later destined to serve as Presidential secretaries were Everett Sanders, Republican, of Indiana; Walter H. Newton, Republican, of Minnesota; and C. Bascom Slemp, Republican, of Virginia. Mr. Sanders and Mr. Slemp served with President Coolidge, and Mr. Newton with President Hoover.

THREE BECAME DIPLOMATS

Of the Press Gallery group at least three became American diplomats. These were Leo R. Sack, of the Cleveland Press, who was Minister to Costa Rica; John D. Erwin, of the Nashville Tennessean, who was Ambassador to Honduras, and Charles C. Hart, of Boise News, who was Minister to Persia.

Of the congressional group of the earlier period, Senator Walter E. Edge, Republican, of New Jersey, became Ambassador to France; Alanson B. Houghton, Republican, of New York, and Frank B. Kellogg, Republican, of Minnesota, went to the Court of St. James's, as Ambassador, and Senator Miles Poindexter, Republican, of Washington, served as Ambassador to Peru. Earlier the doughty Senator George H. Moses, Republican, of New Hampshire, had been Minister to Greece.

Thirty years ago the indestructible William J. Donaldson was—as now—the superintendent of the House Press Gallery. Holding forth then as superintendent of the Senate Press Gallery was the practically inexhaustible fount of information, James D. Preston. Now Jim Preston is installed as registration clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, in the confines of which he has spent practically his entire lifetime.

Thirty years ago when the Sixty-sixth Congress held sway, the American public very largely relied on the members of the Congressional Press Gallery for their news about national affairs. The gallery membership and newspapers and news services represented have increased tremendously but the character of their service to the public has remained basically unchanged.

Radio Press Galleries of both branches of Congress have come into being and today 150 radio broadcasters and news commentators, representing some 78 radio stations and network services cover what transpires so that all who hear can listen.

WOMEN MAKE GAINS

Another addition to news coverage has been the creation of the Periodical Press Gallery, whose membership of about 200 men and women writers chronicles the happenings and gossip for the country's leading magazines and trade publications. In this gallery are two veterans of former newspaper service who were in the Press Gallery itself 30 years ago. One of these is Carter Field, of the McGraw-Hill Publications, then of the New York Tribune, and a former president of the National Press Club. The other is T. N. Sandifer, of the Penton Publications and then with the International News Service.

The distaff side of the picture in both the Press Galleries and the Congress develops an interesting picture of the manner in which the women folks have come into the foreground. There were woman members of the Press Gallery long before women attained congressional dignity.

In the Sixty-fifth Congress the first woman—Jeannette Rankin, Republican, of Montana—had been elected to the House, the first woman to be elected to Congress. But in the Sixty-sixth Congress there were no feminine members, while the records reveal that the Press Galleries boasted nine newspaperwomen. The group included Miss Winifred Mallon. The others were Mrs. Carolyn Vance Bell, Newspaper Enterprise Association; Roberta V. Bradshaw, Buffalo Evening News; Elizabeth Miner King, New York Evening Post; Mrs. Katherine C. Lacy, Newport News Daily Press; Annabel Lee, Chicago Herald-Examiner; Edith McDowell, Daily Oklahoman; Mrs. George F. Richards, Worcester Gazette and other New England papers, who was the dean of women; and Cora Rigby, Christian Science Monitor.

In the present term of Congress there are 85 accredited women correspondents in the Press Galleries. The White House News Photographers Association and the Radio Press Gallery and the Periodical Press Gallery have many more.

On the congressional side the women have made substantial gains.

In the Senate there is MARGARET CHASE SMITH, Republican, Maine, who is starting on a 6-year elected term, and is a graduate of the House. Other women have served in the Senate in the interval of the intervening 30 years both by appointment and by election.

In the House of Representatives there are now 9 women Members. The dean of the group is Mrs. MARY T. NORTON, Democrat, New Jersey, who came in 1925, and is retiring at the end of this Congress. A few months later, Mrs. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, Republican, Massachusetts, became a Member succeeding her deceased husband, John Jacob Rogers, who had been a Member of the Sixty-sixth and other Congresses. The other Congresswomen now serving include Mrs. FRANCES P. BOLTON, Republican, Ohio; REVA BECK BOSONE, Democrat, Utah; Mrs. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS, Democrat, California; KATHARINE ST. GEORGE, Republican, New York; CECIL MURRAY HARDEN, Republican, Indiana; CHASE GOING WOODHOUSE, Democrat, Connecticut; and EDNA F. KELLY, Democrat, New York.

The Congress itself has undergone a very complete make-over since the days of the Sixty-sixth Congress. It is now a decidedly more efficiently organized body than it was then. But then, as now, it had its partisan difficulties.

The Senate of 30 years ago consisted of 48 Republicans and 47 Democrats, with Hiram Johnson, of California, listed as Republican and Progressive. Today the Senate boasts 54 Democrats and 42 Republicans. But the ailing Woodrow Wilson had just as much trouble with his lawmakers as Harry Truman is now having with his.

The House 30 years ago had 236 Republican members, 190 Democrats, and 4 minority party Representatives. Today it has 263 Democrats and 171 Republicans, together with 1 American Laborite.

Three decades ago there were so many committees in each body that a minority party member could be, and often was, a committee chairman. The Senate boasted of 74 committees, with each of its 96 Members belonging on from 5 to 7 of these groups. Today it has been streamlined to 15 committees, with each Senator holding membership on two major committees and not more than an aggregate of three. The House then, had 63 committees, and some Members belonged to 4 or 5. Today the House has 19 standing committees, and each Member, with a few notable exceptions, serves only on one committee.

LODGE WAS DEAN

The Sixty-sixth Congress was notable among those in the history of this country. Both in the House and the Senate were Members who have left an imperishable record in the annals. Tariff laws, revenue bills, treaties with foreign nations, and a host of other matters of importance came before it.

Dean of the Senate was Henry Cabot Lodge, Republican, of Massachusetts, who then had been a Member since March 4, 1893. The baby member was Carter Class, Democrat, of Virginia, elected only 2 years before. Among the Senators were William E. Borah, Republican, of Idaho; Porter J. McCumber, Republican, of North Dakota; Boies Penrose, Republican, of Pennsylvania; Atlee Pomerene, Democrat, of Ohio; Oscar W. Underwood, Democrat, of Alabama; James E. Watson, Republican, of Indiana; Francis E. Warren, Republican, of Wyoming; John Sharp Williams, Democrat, of Mississippi; Furnifold M. Simmons, Democrat, of North Carolina, and dozens of others of great renown.

Heading the House membership was the onetime Speaker of the House Joseph G. Cannon, Republican, of Illinois, "Uncle Joe" of affectionate regard who had first come to the Forty-third Congress on March 4, 1873. He served 22 terms before he retired on March 4, 1921, with the expiration of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and died some years later. Elder statesmen of the House included Frederick H. Gillette, Republican, of Massachusetts and Champ Clark, Democrat, of Missouri, who came to Congress in 1893. Both became Speaker and Mr. Gillette also served in the Senate later.

In 1919 as the Sixty-sixth Congress took over, there was a freshman class of 106 members. Today, as the Eighty-first Congress holds sway, there are only half a dozen Members with a record of continuous service. But in that earlier House membership of 30 years ago the names are recalled of James W. Fordney, Republican, of Michigan; Claude Kitchen, Democrat, of North Carolina; Andrew J. Volstead, Republican, of Minnesota; Thomas S. Butler, Republican, of Pennsylvania; James R. Mann, Republican, of Illinois; Julius Kahn, Republican, of California; George S. Graham, Republican, of Pennsylvania; Frank W. Mondell, Republican, of Wyoming; Willis C. Hawley, Republican, of Oregon; William R. Green, Republican, of Iowa; Finis J. Garrett, Democrat, of Tennessee; Martin B. Madden, Republican, of Illinois; Philip P. Campbell, Republican, of Kansas; John J. Esch, Republican, Wisconsin; Edward W. Pou, Democrat, of North Carolina; and Gen. Isaac R. Sherwood, Democrat, of Ohio.

By curious circumstances the Sixty-sixth Congress (1919–21) is the definition line of venerability in the national legislative Halls, especially when its survivors are contrasted to the aggregate memberships of the present House and Senate

Congressman Adolph J. Sabath, Democrat, Illinois, entered the House on March 4, 1907, in the Sixtieth Congress; Robert L. Doughton, Democrat, North Carolina, became a Member March 4, 1911. Speaker Sam Rayburn, Democrat, Texas, came on March 4, 1913; and Carl Vinson, Democrat, Georgia, on November 3, 1914. Schuyler Otis Bland, Democrat, Virginia, arrived on July 2, 1918. Daniel A. Reed, Republican, New York, and Earl C. Michener, were elected for the first time to the Sixty-sixth Congress. Robert D. Crosser, Democrat, Ohio, and Roy O. Woodruff, Republican, Michigan, currently Members, had been Members prior to the Sixty-sixth Congress. Thus seven Members of the House have been in service continuously since the Sixty-sixth Congress of 30 years ago.

Vice President ALBEN W. BARKLEY is the odd figure in the picture. He was a Member of the House from March 4, 1913, until March 4, 1927, when he was elected to the Senate. He served in the opening period of the current Eighty-first Congress in his role as a Senator from Kentucky, and the majority floor leader. Then he assumed the Vice Presidency to which he had been elected in November 1948.

Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR, Democrat, Tennessee, the dean of the Senate, began his service there on March 4, 1917. Previously he had served in the House, to which he was elected to fill a vacancy on November 9, 1911. At the time of the Sixty-sixth Congress, two present Members of the Senate were then Members of the House. These were CARL HAYDEN, Democrat, Arizona, who began his House service on February 10, 1912, and TOM CONNALLY, Democrat, Texas, who served in the House from March 4, 1917, until his election to the Senate for the term starting March 4, 1929.

Senator HAYDEN, Democrat, Arizona, has an unusual background. He was elevated to the House and assumed his seat as the at-large Representative on February 10, 1912, when Arizona was granted statehood. He served in the House until he entered the Senate on March 4, 1927. He is now the third senior Member of the Senate. His only seniors in congressional service are Senator MCKELLAR and Congressmen SABATH and DOUGHTON.

The legislators who served in Congress 30 years ago and their successors through the three decades have left an indelible record in the annals of the United States. Vice President Thomas R. Marshall was the presiding officer of the Sixty-sixth Senate, and Wilson was finishing out his term of office in the White House. On the House side, Joe Cannon and Champ Clark were basking in the past glories of 16 years previous that they had served as Speaker of the House.

Then House Members, Mr. Gillette, who also became a Senator; Nicholas Longworth, Republican, of Ohio; John N. Garner, Democrat, of Texas, destined to be Vice President;

Henry T. Rainey, Democrat, of Illinois; Joseph W. Byrnes, Democrat, of Tennessee; William B. Bankhead, Democrat, of Alabama; and Sam Rayburn were destined later to serve as Speaker of the House. Joseph W. Martin, Republican, of Massachusetts, the only other to serve as Speaker in the 30-year period, did not enter the legislative Halls until the Sixty-ninth Congress in 1925.

In the corresponding period eight Senators were to attain the dignity of President pro tempore of the Senate. These were Albert C. Cummins, Republican, of Iowa; George H. Moses, Republican, of New Hampshire; Key Pittman, Democrat, of Nevada; William H. King, Democrat, of Utah; Pat Harrison, Democrat, of Mississippi; Carter Glass, Democrat, of Virginia; and Kenneth McKellar, Democrat, of Tennessee. The only other Senator to serve in this office in the 30-year period was Arthur H. Vandenberg, Republican, of Michigan, who began his senatorial service on March 31, 1928. In prior years to 1919 short terms as President pro tempore had been served by the senior Henry Cabot Lodge, Republican, of Massachusetts; Frank B. Brandegee, Republican, of Connecticut; and Charles Curtis, Republican, of Kansas.

The Senate of the Sixty-sixth Congress was destined to figure importantly in the national politics of the Republic in the ensuing years. From its ranks Warren G. Harding, Republican, of Ohio, moved on the presidency. And Charles Curtis attained the vice presidency.

SOME MOVED UP

On the House side, John Garner and ALBEN BARKLEY were destined to become Vice Presidents of the United States.

Two Senate Members of that period— Robert M. La Follette, the Wisconsin Progressive, and Hiram Johnson, alternatively a Progressive and a Republican—were presidential candidates in later years. And as unsuccessful candidates for the vice presidency, Charles R. McNary, Republican, of Oregon, and Joseph T. Robinson, Democrat, of Arkansas, took a fling at the Nation's highest office.

The Sixty-sixth Congress produced six Cabinet members in the succeeding years. Earlier, Philander Chase Knox, Republican, of Pennsylvania, had served as Secretary of State. Cordell Hull, Democrat, of Tennessee and James F. Byrnes, of South Carolina destined first to become Senators, ended their public careers later as Secretary of State. Of the then Senators, four became Cabinet officers at later dates. Included were Albert B. Fall, Republican, of New Mexico, who became Secretary of the Interior; Frank Kellogg, who became Secretary of State; Harry S. New, Republican, of Indiana, who became Postmaster General, and Claude Swanson, Democrat, of Virginia, who became Secretary of the Navy.

The House of Representatives of that 3-decades-ago period was a fine training school for graduation to the United States Senate. Among the then Representatives to be subsequently elected or appointed to the Senate were Alben W. Barkley, Democrat, Kentucky; James F. Brynes, Democrat, South Carolina; Thaddeus H. Caraway, Democrat, Arkansas; Porter H. Dale, Republican, Vermont; Tom Connally, Democrat, Texas; Simeon D. Fess, Republican, Ohio; Frederick H. Gillette, Republican, Massachusetts; Frank H. Green, Republican, Vermont; J. Thomas Heflin, Democrat, Alabama; Cordell Hull, Democrat, Tennessee; William B. McKinley, Republican, Illinois; Matthew M. Neely, Democrat, West Virginia; Thomas D. Schall, Republican, Minnesota; Frank L. Smith, Republican, Illinois; Hubert D. Stephens, Democrat, Mississippi; William S. Vare, Republican, Pennsylvania; John M. Robsion, Republican, Kentucky; and Wallace H. White, Jr., Republican, Maine.

An astronomical number of words have been uttered by the Nation's legislators in debate and discussion in the Senate and House Chambers. These are preserved to posterity and the historian in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

But there is a trio of veteran "official reporters of debate" who have listened to the oratorical flood for the past 30 years and are still going strong. These are James W. Murphy and John D. Rhodes of the Senate group and Allister Cochrane of the House contingent of shorthand experts.

Thinking It Over

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PAUL B. DAGUE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the following article which appeared in a recent issue of the Parkesburg (Pa.) Post and was called to my attention by a valued constituent, Mr. Louis B. Hampton:

THINKING IT OVER

(By A. Parke)

EMPTY VICTORIES

Whether or not we're willing to admit it, the effectiveness of the U. S. S. R. technique has been brilliant. The methods we may abhor, the ultimate objectives we can condemn, but the skill behind Soviet procedure we must admire. Not only can this over-all effectiveness be admired, but it should be recognized as ample field for our own learning. For example, the Soviets have, with few exceptions, expanded on all fronts since the end of World War II. They have forced us to spend billions of dollars to hold the line against Russia. They can call the tune anywhere in Europe or Asia and we are forced to dance—with money, arms, men, and blood. Korea is but a temporary example. Tomorrow it may be Iran, Red China, Indochina, Yugoslavia, Germany, or what have you. They decide the battlefield—diplomatic or military—and they select the area or action. We tag along behind.

How can the Kremlin regulate the affairs of all nations and so consistently concern the minds of all citizens so effectively? It would pay Washington to analyze the technique, adopt its good points and get on the offensive. Holding the line is acceptable over short periods, but one doesn't advance by building barriers.

Communism has prospered and is winning the minds of millions for several reasons. Outstanding are these two: It has an ultimate long-range strategy in any and all diplomatic or military operations. (We haven't.) It has recognized the value of propaganda in world relations. (We haven't.)

The United States answer to Soviet methods has been to go along and treat each new tactic as it arises. As a result we're inevitably slammed by the opening punch and sorely battered with each succeeding propaganda haymaker. In Korea we might safely assume that Russia launched the Communist offensive with complete plans in the event of (a) Communist victory, (b) Communist defeat. No matter which of these evolves, Russia will see to it that the people who count—those folks in Asiatic territory, get her side of the question so often and in so many ways that they begin to believe it. When the military decision arrives in Korea, Moscow will roll out the appropriate procedure to be followed—a procedure polished, refined, and perfected down to the most minor details. She has plans—long-range plans—and even if she loses the battle of bullets she wins the war for men's minds.

Consider our own conduct over Korea. Whether it was the fault of the State Department or of our Intelligence the fact remains that we were caught flat-footed. Everyone was surprised and momentarily stunned. Deciding we must act, we expedited mobilization and rushed men and guns to Korea. That's it. Period.

What of tomorrow? Ask Washington and they'll tell you, "To blazes with tomorrow, we've got a war to win." Agreed. But how about the thirty-eighth parallel where the whole mess started? Will we stop there? Do we just chase the Commies back home and wait a few months until thy're ready to start fighting again? Do we go on into North Korea in the name of the UN and slap a few hands? How about Korea when it's all over—do we keep it, station an armed protective force there, or give it to Japan? If Washington has any future plans on such matters it will be most unusual and a most unexpectedly pleasant surprise. Chances are that no one has even thought about it. The Russians would have.

The only complication in this United States arrangement is that America ends up holding an empty peacetime sack to show for commendable wartime accomplishments.

That we have no long range plan is amply demonstrated by Air Force conduct. Whole cities are being bombed off the South Korean map. After the Commies are driven out you and I will be financing a type of Korean Marshall plan to rebuild the uselessly destroyed rubble. In those cities are homes as well as military targets—but bombers flying at high altitudes can't be too particular. In those homes live South Korean civilians and noncombatants. No matter how you look at it, war or no war, killing innocent folks without need is murder. Those very folks are the people to whom we intend to sell the happiness of democratic living. Admittedly, military targets must be destroyed, but if we are to win the peace those people must see that America respects the individual. We should make every effort to hit railroads, enemy supply lines, etc., yet it is not reasonable, indeed it is stupid to wipe out a whole city (which you must later rebuild) merely to destroy its rail yards or its bridges. Air power is most effectively used in low level tactical support. The Navy and Marine Corps have both argued for this point. If Korea doesn't prove them right nothing will. The Air Force remains adamant and continues to bomb towns and cities from way up in the wild blue yonder. When it's over with, the American taxpayer inherits the mess—a mess much bigger than it should be.

Think of this the next time your newspaper shows droves of B-29's dumping hundreds of tons of bombs on Korean towns.

Our dissemination of the American viewpoint (propaganda is the word) leaves much to be desired. Congress bickers and squabbles over funds for the Voice of America, but happily votes millions to keep farmers smiling and to store eggs. We pay $100,000 a day to subsidize peanuts, but act like mute misers when it comes to selling freedom. In the UN our delegate, Warren Austin, has truth on his side. He's won all the fine points in debate with Russia's Malik—but Malik talks more often and speaks longer when he does. Every word he says is for Asiatic consumption—and Russia will see to it that the Asiatics hear. "Brutal American bombing—," that makes sense to an Asiatic who's family has been wiped out. We win the fine points in debate but don't even bother to let the world know our viewpoints.

Television's fine; but Americans are already sold on democracy. Asia and Europe need to know our arguments. Russia crows her story 24 hours a day—and millions are listening.

We should have long-range diplomatic planning—plans for conduct during and after a war. We should fight now to win the peace and not the war alone. While we're at it we'd do well to spend a buck to tell the little people of the world our side of the story. Otherwise we'll go on winning wars and losing the victories.

Building Commissioner Reynolds Declares: "Dignity, Simplicity, and Efficiency Attended by Low Costs Are the Qualities Especially Sought in the Design of New Federal Buildings"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, there is probably no column written and published which gives me more pleasure than does the column written by the nationally known writer, John White, and carried locally in the Washington Times-Herald.

With rare and keen insight, John White seems to have a never-ending catalog of persons about whom he can tell the most interesting and fascinating things, and do so in a manner which intrigues the mind and fires both the imagination and admiration for the subject of the article.

Mr. Speaker, I remember years ago when on some occasion or other our great Senator John Bankhead, Sr., the father of our beloved speaker, Will Bankhead, once said to me:

Frank, my boy, the President and the Cabinet officers * * * who are Secretaries charged with the administration of the various departments of Government, may come and go * * * but * * * generally way back in some office is a man whose name may not even be written on the door but who is, in fact, the driving force of all the action programs projected in that particular department of Government.

Frank, it is the civil-service workers, the technical men, the economists, the architects, the engineers, the scientists in governmental departments * * * obscure though they be who have builded the Government services of this country to the heights which they now have attained.

Mr. Speaker, prominent among those who have done so much to build this country great is your good friend and my good friend, W. E. Reynolds, Commissioner of Public Buildings in the General Services Administration.

Mr. Speaker, it is because I know Bert Reynolds that the article which John White wrote about him held such a deep interest for me, for out of all the wide circle of my friends, there are few whom I admire more ardently and whose friendship I cherish more than I do the friendship of Bert Reynolds.

Mr. Speaker, there are very few agencies or departments in the Federal Government that are as old as is the agency now called Public Buildings Service, formerly the Public Buildings Administration. Moreover, there are very few agencies who can boast of personnel the tenure of whose service is as distinguished as is the personnel of that agency. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, there is no better administrator in all of Government service than the Honorable W. E. Reynolds, Public Buildings Commissioner, who has been associated to Public Buildings for the last 20 years.

My long membership on the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee of this House together with my private building activities in Washington, D. C., even before I came to Congress have brought me into very intimate, close contact with Mr. Bert Reynolds and his able assistants. In his appearances before our committee he has never failed to impress us as other than a man devoted to his task, ever and always on the alert to accomplish the things which would bring more and ever-continuing efficiency and economy in the administration of the Department which he has headed up these many years.

It was, therefore, no surprise to note John White's article telling of Bert Reynolds' ideas of improving Federal building practices—which he has personally been struggling to achieve for these past 20 years.

Mr. Speaker, when I read the short article about Commissioner Reynolds' ideas, I called him on the phone to ask for a copy of his remarks in full for my further perusal and study.

Congressman—

He said—

I am sorry, but it was not a prepared statement. It was just some extemporaneous remarks which I made together with a few observations that would look to lower capital investment per foot as well as increased efficiency and lowered operating costs with respect to the construction and operation of the buildings built by the Government of the United States.

Telling me that his remarks were brief, he said they were entirely covered in a news item published in the Bulletin of the Washington Building Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in his conversation with me, Mr. Reynolds pointed out that subsequent to July 1, 1950, the Public Buildings Administration would be operating about 100,000,000 square feet of space, and that to reduce the cost of operating by merely 1 cent a foot per year a savings of $1,000,000 annually could be effected. He stressed the splendid cooperation that had been extended him since the Public Buildings Administration was covered into the General Services Administration headed up by the Honorable Jess Larson, and said that he looked further to even more splendid work than had been accomplished in the long years it had acted as an independent agency under the Treasury Department.

Mr. Speaker, there are very few buildings within these United States with the exception of veterans' hospitals and several of the newer post offices that are not monuments to the engineering, architectural, and other skills of the civilian employees of the Public Buildings Administration.

I at one time heard it said that there was no architectural office in the whole world that could even begin to rank with the ability and skill possessed by the men who labor over the drafting boards designing public buildings for these United States. Certainly there are no buildings in the United States, the solidity and type of construction of which, both as to functional architecture and the quality of materials used, will excel those used in the construction of our Federal buildings, during the long years that have passed.

Modern design which comprehends the use of improved materials, power-driven tools, and skilled, specialized workmanship contribute to the change that is evolving in building construction, equally as much as do all factors that have affected other changes noted in this—the atomic age.

Always ahead of the times, Bert Reynolds now tells of further changes that should be made in Federal buildings applicable to their function, capital investment, management, servicing, and operating costs.

It is because of the interest of this House in this subject of efficiency and economy of operation that I ask the unanimous consent of my colleagues to extend my remarks, include therein and insert into the Congressoinal RECORD two articles.

One, written by John White, and entitled "Did You Happen To See W. E. Reynolds, Commissioner of Public Buildings." The other article entitled "Reynolds Tells About Federal Building Practices," has been clipped from the Washington Building Congress Bulletin. They follow:

DID YOU HAPPEN TO SEE W. E. REYNOLDS, COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS

He believes that Government buildings should feature dignity, efficiency, and simplicity, and he has a lot of ideas about how those desirable qualities may be had. For instance, says he, Government structures should have air conditioning, because that increases workers' efficiency, they should have big shallow elevators, for quicker loading; they should have windows washable from the inside; they should have rounded corners, for easier cleaning; they should have recessed entrances, for rainy-weather protection; and lighter doors, for easier opening.

They should not have outside steps, because they are not necessary and people fall down them and sue the Government.

They should not have parapets. "It is silly," says Reynolds, to edge a roof with a parapet which holds some water, leaks some, and must be repaired.

They should have as little ornamentation as possible.

They should have no connecting doors between offices. "If an office worker has a job to do, he should not be running back and forth anyway," Reynolds believes.

They should have as few windows as possible. Reynolds frankly admits he would do away with practically all windows, except that people would complain of claustrophobia.

They should be painted in light tones—ceilings white and furniture nearly white.

Light goes farther in such surroundings. Furthermore, if restrooms are painted in light tones and brightly illuminated, loafing there is reduced, says Reynolds.

They should be, but go down and inspect the new Federal-courts building for the District at Third and Independence, or the new section of the GAO, if you want to see Reynolds' ideas in operation.

Those buildings don't embody all of the new notions of Mr. Reynolds and his Public Buildings services, but they are a notable improvement on older Federal piles around here.

And while you are scouting around those places notice how they have uplifted the neighborhoods surrounding them. For it is one of Reynolds' greatest satisfactions how the simple act of plumping a fine white dignified Federal building down into a ramshackle section can make that section change itself into a thing of beauty. Look at what happened to the streets around Social Security.

Reynolds is an Iowan who took his B. S. from Iowa State College in 1911, his civil-engineering degree in 1919, and was a draftsman and engineer and teacher before joining the Government. He is a good all-around man. In 1932 the RFC asked him if the projected huge San Francisco-Oakland Bridge would pay for itself in tolls. He said it would, so it was built, and it did.

He is also a good fisherman. Some people say he holds the record for the biggest channel bass ever caught in the Chesapeake—40 pounds—and he has an eye for beauty; he would like nothing better than to knock down our ghastly "temporary" buildings.

JOHN WHITE.

REYNOLDS TELLS ABOUT FEDERAL BUILDING PRACTICES

In a talk at the May 8 meeting of the Building Congress, Commissioner of Public Buildings, W. E. Reynolds stressed the fact that the cost of upkeep and operation of Government buildings is one of the important factors in determining their design. Speaking on Improving Federal Building Practices, Mr. Reynolds said, "That PBA leaves actual research on building materials and products to the laboratories of large private companies, but it has acquired a wealth of information from constant studies of its experience in building, operating, and repairing Federal buildings."

He pointed out that if a way can be found to reduce the cost of operating 1 cent per square foot a year, $750,000 a year can be saved. After July 1, 1950, PBA will be operating about 100,000,000 square feet of space. It has been demonstrated that quality materials save money in the long run.

Dignity, simplicity, and efficiency are the qualities especially sought in the design of new structures. The tendency is toward block-type structures with all parapets, outside steps, and excess ornamentation eliminated.

AIR CONDITIONING

Air conditioning is now being specified for most new Government offices. Formerly it was not considered necessary in such locations as New York and Boston, but the greatly increased efficiency of employees which results from comfortable summer temperatures, has proved its worth. Taking the average of the salaries of the Government as a whole, it was found that the cost of air conditioning, including amortization and replacement, is 1½ percent of the average salary per employee, per year. On the basis of 480 minutes a day working time, if 7 minutes a day can be saved, the cost of the air conditioning and its upkeep is soon paid for.

VERTICAL TRANSPORTATION

Studies have shown that larger elevators are the most efficient as long as there are sufficient to serve each floor. At one time 3,500 pounds was considered large. When the cost of the operator was figured in, the most economical size immediately jumped to 4,500 pounds. Wide, shallow elevators can be loaded and unloaded in half the time required by narrow, deep ones. The cost of operation goes down when elevators are grouped together in banks. Studies on automatic controls within elevator banks are in progress.

Escalators are being used more and more. In the General Accounting Office they will go up five floors. The Hancock Building in Boston is using them to the eighth floor.

COLUMN SPACING

Study of the relation between building design and space utilization has paid real dividends. The average space per person in Government buildings in Washington is now under 110 square feet. If this can be reduced by 6 square feet, a space equivalent to the Commerce Building will be saved.

Outside bays should not be deeper than 18 feet. Those parallel to the face of the building can measure 25 feet. This permits them to be divided into 8- or 12-foot offices. It makes possible private offices with 172 square feet instead of 400 square feet often found at present.

On the new General Accounting Office, PBA is experimenting with flat-slab construction with all of the ducts suspended beneath that. Suspended ceilings of uniform height, and using no beams, make the space more flexible and permit better lighting. It is estimated that this method of building will cost less than any other type of construction. Careful cost data are being kept through 100-percent cooperation with the contractor. The information should prove valuable in determining future building design.

WINDOWS

If it weren't for causing claustrophobia, Mr. Reynolds would prefer buildings with no windows at all. The cost of washing is one of the most important items in determining the type of windows to be used. PBA is now generally using windows which can be washed from the inside, which should cut the cost of washing by 40 percent.

ENTRANCES AND CORRIDORS

Recessed entrances which provide waiting space in bad weather are preferred. Very large, heavy doors are no longer used. Outside steps are eliminated wherever possible. Corridors will have rounded corners, and all fountains, telephone booths, etc., will be recessed. Mr. Reynolds commented that more money is being spent on corridors than formerly.

LIGHTING

Ease of reading rather than the intensity of light on the working plane is the prime consideration. Mr Reynolds emphasized the effect of color on lighting efficiency. All ceilings are now being painted white, which gives a reflective factor of 80 percent. Most ceilings are only 30 percent. The brightness ratio should be no more than 3 to 1. The tops of desks and equipment are finished in light colors to reduce the contrast between the working surface and the papers on it.

PANEL HEATING

This is recommended for outside steps, drives, and approaches, to remove snow and ice. While there have been some objections to present installations, the problem is one of improving the engineering design and it will be worked out.

TOILET ROOMS

Ease in cleaning is the paramount requirement. Some wall-hung fixtures have been used, but they cost too much to be used generally.

Mr. Reynolds said that it had been discovered that if the intensity of light is as great as in an office, people do not stay as long in toilet rooms. He could not explain why this occurred. To prevent clogged drains, no mirrors are placed over washbasins in women's restrooms.

Other items mentioned briefly were the elimination of transoms and communicating doors between offices. Stairs are no longer built of expensive material; all over one story are completely enclosed. No foreign materials are used. Vacuum cleaning systems are installed in buildings with areas of 50,000 square feet and up; in smaller buildings movable equipment is cheaper though not as efficient.

In summing up, Mr. Reynolds emphasized the need for beauty, dignity, and functional efficiency in public buildings, as well as continued emphasis on economy in operation to spread the taxpayers' dollars as far as possible.

Coffee Swindle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 13 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Coffee Swindle," published in the Portland (Oreg.) Daily Journal of September 5, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COFFEE SWINDLE

We American coffee drinkers have been taken.

But good.

We've been taken in one of the greatest international squeeze plays ever devised in the world's commodity markets.

This squeeze play begins in the coffee-growing countries of South and Central America, particularly in Brazil and Colombia, largest coffee producers in the world. There government-controlled cooperatives and exporting cartels set up artificial shortages by (a) limiting production, (b) restricting exports, and (c) buying and holding or actually destroying surplus coffee.

It extends to the Pan-American Coffee Bureau, a nonprofit cooperative with offices in New York. This bureau represents South and Central American governments which control the coffee deal. It is dedicated to increasing coffee consumption, but is charged with putting out hints of $1 coffee and inaccurate information concerning coffee crop conditions—hints and information that have caused panic buying and cost United States coffee consumers countless millions.

It also extends to the big American importers and roasters, some of which help support the Pan-American Coffee Bureau and some of which (A. & P. and Maxwell House) were given preferential deals by Brazil in 1948 and 1949.

Finally the squeeze play extends down the line, from American roaster to distributor to retailer—each employing the percentage markup system on each price hike—until the payoff: Coffee as high as 88 cents to consumers of Portland.

Just how far-reaching the great coffee swindle of 1948, 1949, and 1950 has been is officially revealed by the United States Senate subcommittee, GUY M. GILLETTE, chairman, which recently completed its investigation of price spreads in coffee. It found that:

"The speculator, exporters and importers seem to be the ones who profited by the rise in coffee prices.

"Repeatedly witness after witness has stated that there has not been a shortage of coffee at all during recent years and none appears likely over the current year 1950."

In short, publicity releases from Brazil and Colombia and from the Pan-American Coffee Bureau, indicating serious weather damage to coffee crops, were either greatly exaggerated or pure fabrications. But they served to hike green coffee prices 250 percent between April and November of 1949, inducing scare buying by American roasters and hoarding by American consumers. Says the Senate committee:

"The consumer fell unwittingly into the trap, and thus aided the price spiral."

That's the whole sordid coffee story. At last.

It wouldn't be quite so bad if the growers of Brazil and Colombia and Central America were making the money. But they aren't. Because of tricky and unrealistic foreign exchange they have been realizing only 50 percent more income (on an American dollar basis) while green coffee prices are now 10 times their 1902 low.

Can the great coffee squeeze be halted?

It can be and it should be.

The Senate committee has some pertinent suggestions, and we would add some of our own. Here they are:

Slap a stiff capital-gains tax on alien individuals and foreign corporations doing business in the United States.

Place coffee trading under the control of the Commodity Exchange Act and eliminate the tricky deals in coffee futures.

Require foreign coffee interests to dispose of stocks warehoused in the United States through regular trade channels instead of holding them for speculative profits.

Instigate criminal investigation (by the Department of Justice) of possible violations of the antitrust laws in the United States and employ civil suits against foreign manipulators operating in the United States.

Refuse further allocation of dollars (by ECA) for the purchase of coffee.

Assist the Brazilian and Colombian Governments to readjust their exchange rates so the coffee farmers, rather than the Government and the coffee speculators, will realize more equitable returns.

Develop our own (reliable) statistics on coffee production and consumption and on weather damage in coffee-growing countries.

If Brazil, Colombia, and other coffee-producing countries won't cooperate, encourage coffee growing in other areas.

Persuade American coffee roasters, distributors, and retailers to abandon the practice of percentage markups and apply a more reasonable rate of return on a pound basis.

If all this doesn't work, switch to sassafras or slippery-elm tea—ugh!

The New Social Security Law—A Great Achievement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, one of the outstanding achievements of this Eighty-first Congress is the enactment of a law expanding and bringing up to date our social-security system. This law extends security in their old age to 10,000,000 additional Americans as a matter of their earned right, not as a matter of charity or a public dole. It raises social-security benefits to conform with higher costs of living.

I believe that our social-security system should be extended even further, so as to cover all working men and women, and I have introduced legislation to accomplish this. But the new law passed by the Eighty-first Congress is a great step forward, and I was proud to cast my vote for it.

In view of the widespread interest in this law I think it will be helpful to set forth the changes in our social-security system which it brings about.

MAJOR CHANGES SUMMARIZED

Summarized in a few sentences, the major changes are:

First. Larger benefits: The nearly 235,000 Californians now receiving social-security payments will find that in the checks to be mailed out October 3 their benefits will be, on the average, roughly 75 percent greater than they have been. For those who will retire after June 1952, benefits will be twice what they are now, on the average.

Second. Broader coverage: On January 1, 1951, over 750,000 people in the State of California, who up to now have not been covered by social security, will come under the system. For the first time the nonfarm self-employed—persons in business for themselves, such as grocery store, retail store, or gas-station owners—will have the opportunity to earn security in their later life under the social-security system.

Third. Easier eligibility: In general, it will take fewer years of social-security coverage before you are eligible to draw benefits. Specifically, persons who are now 65 or over, and who have had six quarter-years—a year and a half—of social-security coverage can and should apply immediately for benefits. Any retired worker as well as survivors and dependents will be able to earn $50 a month—as against the present limit of $15—without losing their benefit payments.

Here, in more detail, are the answers to questions I think will be of most general interest:

HOW MUCH LARGER BENEFITS?

First. How much larger will benefits be under the new law? Benefit increases will go to two main groups of people: (a) Those who are currently receiving benefits, or who will begin receiving them before 1952; and (b) those who will reach retirement age after June 1952—these are called "new starts." Let me explain more fully how the new bill affects each of these groups.

IMMEDIATE INCREASES AVERAGE 77½ PERCENT

There are nearly 235,000 people in the State of California who are now receiving social-security benefits. In the checks which they will receive early in October—their September payments—they will find that their payments will be, on the average, 77½ percent greater than they have been up to now.

The table below shows what the increases will be for an insured wage earner without any dependents, and for a married couple:

Retired wage earner without dependents		Retired wage earner and wife
Now	New law	Now	New law
$10	$20.00	$15.00	$30.00
$11	22.00	$16.50	33.00
$12	24.00	$18.00	36.00
$13	26.00	$19.50	39.00
$14	28.00	$21.00	42.00
$15	30.00	$22.50	45.00
$16	31.70	$24.00	47.55
$17	33.20	$25.50	49.80
$18	34.50	$27.00	51.75
$19	35.70	$28.50	53.55
$20	37.00	$30.00	56.50
$21	38.50	$31.50	57.75
$22	40.20	$33.00	60.30
$23	42.20	$34.50	63.30
$24	44.50	$36.00	66.75
$25	46.50	$37.50	69.75
$26	48.30	$39.00	72.45
$27	50.00	$40.50	75.00
$28	51.50	$42.00	77.25
$29	52.80	$43.50	79.20
$30	54.00	$45.00	81.00
$31	55.10	$46.50	82.65
$32	56.20	$48.00	84.30
$33	57.20	$49.50	85.80
$34	58.20	$51.00	87.30
$35	59.20	$52.50	88.80
$36	60.20	$54.00	90.30
$37	61.20	$55.50	91.80
$38	62.20	$57.00	93.30
$39	63.10	$58.50	94.65
$40	64.00	$60.00	96.00
$41	64.90	$61.50	97.35
$42	65.80	$63.00	98.70
$43	66.70	$64.50	100.05
$44	67.60	$66.00	101.40
$45	68.50	$67.50	102.75
$46	68.50	$69.00	102.75

These same increases apply to anyone who retires before June 1952.

The following table shows the benefits that will appear in the September checks of a widow with two children who is currently receiving benefits:

Widow with two children

Present benefit: $20; new benefit: $40.
Present benefit: $25; new benefit: $46.
Present benefit: $30; new benefit: $53.
Present benefit: $35; new benefit: $59.
Present benefit: $40; new benefit: $67.
Present benefit: $45; new benefit: $76.
Present benefit: $50; new benefit: $92.
Present benefit: $55; new benefit: $110.
Present benefit: $60; new benefit: $117.
Present benefit: $65; new benefit: $122.
Present benefit: $70; new benefit: $128.
Present benefit: $75; new benefit: $133.

INCREASES SENT AUTOMATICALLY

You do not have to apply for the increases; they will be sent to you automatically. If, for any reason, the increase fails to show up in your October check, it will show up very soon, in full. Recipients are asked not to start writing in for information because the more letters that have to be answered, the slower the program will be in getting under way.

BENEFITS DOUBLED IN 1952

For anyone who retires after June 1952 a new formula may be used to compute benefits, which will yield, roughly, twice the benefits now being received. You can begin to use this new formula just as soon as you have worked for six quarter-years—or a full year and a half—under the social-security system after January 1, 1951.

The following table shows, roughly, how much the benefits will be according to this new formula:

Average monthly wage	Single	Married
$100	50	75
$300	80	120

The minimum primary benefit has been raised from $10 to $25 in most cases, and the maximum family benefit has been raised from $85 to $150. These changes are long overdue in bringing our social-security system into line with high living costs.

WHO WILL BE COVERED NOW?

Second. What new people will be covered under the new law? On January 1, 1951, over 750,000 people in the State of California (nearly 10,000,000 in the Nation as a whole) will come under the social-security system for the first time.

THE NONFARM SELF-EMPLOYED

The largest and most important group to come under the system are the nonfarm self-employed—numbering about 424,000 in California. For the first time the druggist, the grocer, the gas station owner, and thousands of other persons who are in business for themselves can look forward to security in their later years as an earned right, to which they have contributed during their working lifetime.

Farmers are still not included under social security; nor are many professional people, such as doctors and lawyers.

ELIGIBLE FOR BENEFITS MUCH SOONER

At this point, I should emphasize, for the benefit of these businessmen, as well as all those who will come under the social-security system now, it will be much easier for you to become eligible for benefits under the new law. If you are 62 or over on January 1, 1951, and begin your social-security coverage on that date, you will need to work only a year and a half under the system in order to be fully insured and eligible for benefit payments upon retirement. That means that you will begin to draw benefits just as soon as you reach the retirement age of 65.

AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Some 130,000 agricultural workers in California will come under the social security program on January 1. This includes not only persons who regularly work on farms, but also the so-called borderline agricultural workers—those who work, say, in raising livestock or fur animals; or in processing or delivering crops to storage or to market; or those engaged in household work on a farm. Employees of commercial handlers of fruits and vegetables are included in this borderline group, as are employees of farmer cooperatives.

Those who regularly work on farms must work for one farm operator for 3 months before their social security coverage even begins. After that, they must work for him for 60 full days and earn $50 in cash during each 3-month period. If they change employers, they must work regularly for 3 months before their work with the new employer begins to count for social security.

DOMESTIC WORKERS

About 58,000 California domestic workers in nonfarm homes will join the system next January, provided they work 24 days for one employer and receive cash wages of at least $50 during each quarter-year.

VOLUNTARY COVERAGE FOR STATE AND LOCAL EMPLOYEES

With regard to the inclusion of employees of the State, and of cities, towns, or counties, this is the situation: Sometime after January 1, the State of California may, if it wishes, enter into an agreement with the Federal Government. That agreement will set forth specifically which groups of employees of the State, or of cities, towns, or counties, will be covered under social security. Any State or local employee who is covered by an existing retirement system cannot be included in such an agreement. In this way, existing retirement systems will be fully protected. If any group of State or local employees is included in the agreement, then social security coverage for all members of the group will be automatic. There are in California about 130,000 State and local employees who are not covered by existing retirement systems who might be included in the social security system.

Employees of the Federal Government in California who are not presently covered by a Federal retirement system, will be included under social security.

EMPLOYEES OF NONPROFIT INSTITUTIONS

Employees of nonprofit institutions (hospitals, churches, schools, and the like) will be covered only if the employer agrees to pay his share of the tax contribution and if two-thirds or more of the employees favor social-security coverage.

Ministers and members of religious orders will continue to be excluded.

SALESMEN AND TRUCK DRIVERS INCLUDED

The new bill will also include all full-time life-insurance salesmen, certain full-time traveling salesmen (other than house-to-house), many delivery truck drivers and home industrial workers who satisfy certain conditions.

HOW LONG TO QUALIFY?

Third. How long will you have to work under social security before you can start drawing benefits?

One of the greatest advantages of the new social-security law is that although the retirement age is still 65, in the future you will not have to work under the social-security system nearly as long before you are fully insured and eligible to draw benefits upon reaching the retirement age of 65.

The following table shows how many quarter-years of coverage under social security you will have to have under the new law, as compared with the present law. Simply look at the figure next to your age on January 1, 1951.

Quarter-years of coverage required to be fully insured

Age reached in first half of 1951	Present law	New law
76 or over	6	6
74	10	6
73	12	6
72	14	6
71	16	6
70	18	6
69	20	6
68	22	6
65	28	6
64	30	6
63	32	6
62	34	6
60	38	10
59	40	12
58	40	14
57	40	16
45 or under	40	40

All of the time you have worked under social security up to now still counts toward meeting your "coverage" requirement.

This change means three main things.

MANY AGED 65 CAN GET BENEFITS IMMEDIATELY

First, any insured worker who is now 65 or over, and who has had 6 quarter-years (or a full year and a half) of social-security coverage, can draw benefits immediately. He should apply for them at the nearest Social Security Administration field office.

In California, these offices are located in Bakersfield, Eureka, Fresno, Glendale, Hollywood, Huntington Park, Englewood, Long Beach, Los Angeles, Oakland, Pasadena, Redding, Sacramento, San Bernardino, San Diego, San Francisco, San Mateo, Santa Barbara, Santa Monica, Santa Rosa, Stockton, and San Jose. Your local post office should be able to tell you how to address your request.

Second, any worker who is 62 or over on January 1, 1951, even if he only starts his social-security coverage next year, will be eligible to begin drawing benefits just as soon as he reaches the retirement age of 65, if he has had six quarter years (a year and a half) of coverage.

ELIGIBILITY MUCH EASIER FOR THE NEWLY COVERED

Third, and most important to the thousands who will become eligible to join the social-security system next year, it will be possible for them to begin drawing benefits upon retirement (at age 65) with much less social-security coverage than now. The table above shows the tremendous improvements brought about by this law.

BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS AND DEPENDENTS

The fourth main question of general interest is: How much will dependents and survivors receive under the new law?

The "primary benefit" is the basic payment made to an insured wage earner who has no dependents. Generally speaking, dependents and survivors will receive the same part of the "primary" as at present. This means that their benefits will also be about 75 percent higher than at present, up until 1952, and double the present levels after that.

MAJOR CHANGES LISTED

The major changes in dependents' and survivors' benefits are:

(a) A retired worker's wife who is under 65 can receive benefits if she has a child in her care.

(b) The benefit for a dependent parent has been raised to three-quarters of the "primary" benefit of the wage earner (it has been one-half).

(c) Lump-sum death payments, though reduced to three times the "primary benefit" of the wage earner, are now payable to the family of every insured worker. Formerly, these payments were made only when no other member of the family was entitled to survivors' benefits at the time of the wage earner's death.

(d) Retired workers, survivors, or dependents may now earn $50 a month (as against $14.99 under the present law) without losing their benefit privileges.

NEW LAW A LANDMARK IN SOCIAL LEGISLATION

This new social security law is a landmark in the field of social legislation. The improvements in our social insurance system which it brings about are long overdue. In my opinion, they do not go far enough. I believe that our insurance system should include the permanently and totally disabled, who are entitled to security as a matter of right, and not a matter of charity. I believe that the system should extend to all working men and women—for old age is a problem shared by all Americans alike. I believe that the retirement age for women should be lowered from 65 to 60. I believe that all insured workers should receive a minimum benefit of $75.

All of these provisions are contained in a social security bill which I introduced early this year.

We have taken a great step forward, but there is still room for progress and improvement. There is still a challenge for the future.

"The Span Thus Built of Priceless Parts, of Love Divine in Human Hearts, Has Strength No Evil Force Can Sever—the Bridge of Kindness Lasts Forever"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it was an inspiration to read in the August 1950 issue of the magazine American Engineer a poem written by Dr. David Barnard Steinman, internationally known bridge engineer and author of many books on bridge design, construction, and direction.

It is significant indeed that this message on the spiritual ingredients of a bridge "to span the gap from man to man" should have come from the pen of a man who has participated in the design and construction of such imposing structures as the Triborough and Henry Hudson Bridges in New York City, the Cologne-Mulheim Bridge over the historic Rhine; the Florianopolis of Brazil, largest suspension bridge in South America; the Thousand Islands International Bridge over the St. Lawrence River—bridges, in fact, in five continents of our troubled world.

Dr. Steinman, honorary life member of the New York State Society of Professional Engineers, has given us a beautiful and timely message in his poem, The Bridge, and I ask that it now be made a permanent part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the Members of this and the other body, together with the countless readers of our proceedings, may have the benefit of reading it.

THE BRIDGE

(By Dr. D. B. Steinman)

(Editor's Note: Below is a poem written by Dr. D. B. Steinman, internationally known bridge engineer, and first president of NSPE.)

In days gone by, a valiant band,
With consecrated heart and hand,
Set out as pilgrims, seeking ways
To pierce the wilderness of fear,
To bring the distant places near,
To build new roads to brighter days.

Through field and forest, hill and vale,
They cleared a path and blazed a trail.
In heat and frost, they toiled each day
To make more smooth and safe the road,
To ease the heartache and the load
For others who would come that way.

One night the pilgrims reached the rim
Of canyon deep and torrent grim,
With alien tribes on farther side.
The need was clear—a mighty span,
A link of peace uniting man,
Built high above the swollen tide.

The pilgrims built a bridge of wood:
In massive strength the great span stood.
But ere the bridge with load was strained,
A fiery spark fell on the span
And flames consumed this work of man—
Then naught but glowing ash remained.

The pilgrims labored to atone:
This time they built a bridge of stone.
But ere the builders' thrill had waned,
A sudden earthquake heaved the ground
And felled the bridge, with crashing sound—
Then naught but rubble heap remained.

Imbued with unabated zeal,
The pilgrims built a bridge of steel.
But as their eyes aloft were trained,
A thing of terror, hurtling past,
Dissolved the bridge in fission blast—
Then naught but vapor glow remained.

The pilgrims now were sad of heart
Their best was spent of skill and art,
Yet all their work had come to naught.
What part was missing in their plan?
How could they build a lasting span
To reach the goal their toil had sought?

While hearts were heavy with despair,
There came an answer to their prayer.
As clouds rolled back before their gaze,
A radiant vision met their eyes—
A rainbow span across the skies,
Resplendent in its glowing rays.

And as they gazed with wonder high,
They heard a voice speak from the sky:
"To span the gap from man to man,
Construct a bridge not made by hands,
Not wood or stone or iron bands—
Of human kindness build the span!"

The pilgrims' hearts with hope were fired;
With prayer they turned to task inspired:
By overcoming human blindness,
By giving loving thought to others,
By treating all men as their brothers,
They built the bridge of human kindness.

And there the span of spirit stood,
Conjoining men in brotherhood,
Uniting men in love eternal.
Fierce storms may rage and lightning flash,
Wild floods may swirl and earthquakes crash—
But naught can shake the span eternal.

The span thus built of priceless parts—
Of love divine in human hearts—
Has strength no evil force can sever.
The dream of heaven-inspired sages,
The prayer of mankind through the ages—
The bridge of kindness lasts forever.

Indeed, It Is Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD H. VELDE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Peoria Journal of September 11, 1950, entitled "Indeed, It Is Time."

INDEED, IT IS TIME

Addressing the convention of the Illinois department of the American Legion in Chicago last week, Governor Stevenson presented a plea for a cessation of criticism of the administration of President Truman.

"It is time now to close ranks and put an end to strikes, to recriminations, to political charges and countercharges," he said. "It is time to stop fighting each other and start fighting the common enemy."

The governor thus echoed the administration line that decries any criticism of its bungling as an attack upon the whole country. Mr. Truman and Governor Stevenson expect the people of the United States to blindly and uncomplainingly follow the blundering policy that has placed this country needlessly in a most precarious position.

Indeed, it is time for a closing of ranks and a determining to face up to the "common enemy" and to actually begin doing something to defeat that enemy. It is time that the administration that Governor Stevenson attempts to defend began delivering the goods and giving the people of the United States something they can support instead of fumbling along and plunging the Nation totally unprepared into a bitter, bloody war. It is time for the leaders the governor wants us to follow to stop coddling and ignoring the Communists within their ranks and to begin doing something to oust them from positions where they can carry on their destructive work.

Governor Stevenson and the Democratic politicians seem to believe that anyone who doesn't agree entirely with them is working against the best interests of the United States. They believe that unless we swallow down without gulping the colossal bungling indulged in by such men as Secretaries Johnson and Acheson and the even greater mistakes of Harry Truman that we are sabotaging the effort to preserve America.

Loyalty to the United States and support of the Government do not remove the right and the duty to criticize and assail stupid blunderers and disloyal agents of the enemy who are leading the way straight to destruction. Indeed there is more loyalty in the man who has the courage to stand up and cry out against the selfish efforts of petty men in high places to gain political advantage at the expense of their country, than there is in the submissive acceptance of incompetence and skulduggery in the upper levels of government urged by the governor.

It is time for the people of America to rally to the support of their country. Governor Stevenson, but it will never be the time for them to cease their efforts to curb the fumbling and bungling of incompetents like Truman, Johnson and Acheson who have brought about the needless deaths of untrained and unequipped American boys half way around the world. A man who asks them to silence their criticism is doing his Nation no favor. He is merely putting partisan politics ahead of patriotism.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, with the retirement of the gentlewoman from New Jersey at the conclusion of this session of Congress, the membership will lose one of its most distinguished and most respected colleagues. Few of us had the pleasure of her acquaintance when she first entered the House of Representatives more than a quarter of a century ago, yet everyone who remembers the dark days following 1929 will recall with appreciation her persistent efforts to raise the standard of living for the millions of Americans who suffered most in that period of depression and destitution. Mrs. NORTON was a predominant figure in the long battle to obtain the deserved benefits which our working men and women eventually came to realize, and it was she who personally sponsored and guided legislation for higher wages and shorter hours after she assumed the chair of the Labor Committee in 1937.

As a resident of a mining, industrial, and farm district, I was acutely conscious of the progress that came about through the work of such outstanding legislators as Mrs. NORTON. Not until my election to Congress and my subsequent appointment to the Labor Committee, however, could I comprehend the magnitude of her task. And only then could I understand the struggle that was required to prevent revocation of those laws responsible for labor's progress. Time and again Mrs. NORTON experienced severe criticism for her continued deferment of antilabor legislation during war years; on every occasion she chose to accept undeserved censure rather than yield to demands contrary to her principles and to those of her people. Such courage of conviction has won for Mrs. NORTON the admiration of the entire Congress and of the wage earners of the Nation, regardless of political affiliation.

I should also like to point out that in succeeding the gentlewoman from New Jersey as delegate to the International Labor Organization, I found that representatives of the many other countries throughout the world were highly aware of her ability, respectful of her judgment, and appreciative of her friendship. And I assure you that it was most gratifying to know that the esteem which we here have for Mrs. NORTON is not confined to America alone.

Helicopter Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to include in the RECORD some information about helicopters:

CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD,
Washington, September 8, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, House of Representatives,
Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I should like to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated August 30, 1950, concerning a recent discussion on the floor of the House with respect to helicopter operations. During that discussion a comparison was made between the cost of transporting mail by truck and by helicopter, and the question was raised as to whether the latter service was too costly. In your letter you request information which would explain the expenditures for helicopter services.

In this connection I believe the most pertinent information is contained in the Board's opinion in the Chicago Helicopter Service Case (copy attached) from which I should like to quote the following two paragraphs appearing on pages 689 and 690:

"On the basis of cost figures obtained from the Post Office Division of Motor Vehicle Service, the report indicates that a fleet of nine Government-owned trucks could perform a service approximately equal to the helicopter service at an annual over-all cost of $74,605, or $2.44 an hour. It is, of course, clear that the operation of trucks to provide mail service in lieu of the proposed helicopter service could be conducted at a substantially lower cost to the Government than the helicopter service. However, there are, we believe, considerations of broad national interest which justify the inauguration of the proposed helicopter service on an experimental basis. The establishment of this service in the Chicago area offers an additional opportunity for providing answers to the air transport industry as to the utility and efficiency of a relatively new type of aircraft in scheduled commercial operations. Moreover, further development of the helicopter and the experience to be gained from the operation is desirable in the interest of the national defense.

"The recent war and the present trend of events demonstrate that it is of considerable public interest that new types of scheduled air transportation be fostered when circumstances portend a reasonable expectation of success. In many respects, military and commercial fields of air transportation are one. At the present time military versions of the helicopter are similar to commercial types. The interest of the military in the operation is abundantly clear not only from its active participation in this proceeding but also by reason of the fact that military helicopters were made available to the Post Office Department for conducting a test operation in the Chicago area. The Air Force and the Navy urge certification of the service, emphasizing the value of the helicopter in military operations and the assistance which the operation would give by providing a valuable background of experience and building a nuclei of trained helicopter flight, maintenance, and engineering personnel as part of an emergency reserve for defense. Chicago has a varied climate the year round and from an operational viewpoint the experiment also would give the military weather experience with the helicopter in addition to that afforded by the Los Angeles operation. Upon the basis of the foregoing considerations we find that the operation of helicopter service for the transportation of mail in the Chicago area is required by the public convenience and necessity."

It is clear from the above that the Board recognized the savings in cost if the service were performed by truck, but concluded that there were overriding considerations, mainly of a national-defense nature, which justify the authorization of this experimental service. In connection with the national-defense aspects of this case, I should like to refer you to footnote 6 of the attached opinion (appearing on p. 690) which contains excerpts from testimony by the military services, giving strong support to the helicopter experiment. In reaching its decision in this case the Board gave substantial weight to such testimony.

In the event they may be of use to you, I am enclosing sets of financial and mileage and traffic recurrent reports for feeder carriers for the 12 months ended March 31, 1950. On page 4 of these reports will be found statistics for the two helicopter services now in operation, Los Angeles Airways and Helicopter Air Service. It may be of interest to note that during the 12 months ended March 31, 1950, Helicopter Air Service transported 1,163,151 pounds of air mail and received $191,237 in temporary mail pay, and that Los Angeles Airways transported 3,790,639 pounds of air mail and received $419,237 in temporary mail pay. Assuming that each pound of air mail contained 25 pieces (on the basis of Post Office Department estimates), the cost for the helicopter service in Chicago, which had been in operation less than a year, was equivalent to $0.0066 per letter, and the cost for the service in Los Angeles, which had been in operation two and a half years, was equivalent to only $0.0044 per letter. These amounts compare with revenue which would approximate $0.06 per letter. It would seem that the unit cost to the Post Office Department per piece of air mail for helicopter service is not very substantial in comparison with the air mail postage revenues derived by the Department, and in addition it should be reasonably expected that unit costs may decrease as a result of further operating experience. Under these circumstances, and in view of the many national-interest aspects of the helicopter operations, we believe the authorization of this experimental service can be fully justified.

Please let me know if I can be of any further assistance in connection with this matter.

Sincerely yours,

OSWALD RYAN,
Acting Chairman.

The Brave Men of No Name Ridge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I include herewith an article from Life magazine by James Bell entitled "The Brave Men of No Name Ridge"

It was the privilege of Representative LATHAM and myself during active-duty service with the Navy to participate in a very small way in one of the phases of this engagement. I have never seen braver men and every marine is prepared to fight and to take and hold ground. I hope this statement will not be construed as propaganda. The best Marine propaganda I know is a marine, and that kind of propaganda is not almost as good as Joe Stalin's, it is better.

THE BRAVE MEN OF NO NAME RIDGE

THE MARINES ENGAGE THE ENEMY IN A HIDEOUSLY BRUTAL BATTLE THAT RECALLS PELELIU, TARAWA, AND IWO JIMA

(By James Bell, Time-Life correspondent)

This little ridge was hardly worthy of the term. It ran north and south, paralleling the Naktong River 10 miles west of Yongsan. It was the southern end of an enemy salient in the Changnyong area where for 10 days United States troops had been trying to shove a North Korean bridgehead back across the sluggish stream. It was just a little hump three-quarters of a mile long and less than 300 feet above the green valley floor. But this ridge with no name, undignified even by a primitive trail, will not be forgotten by the United States Marine Corps.

What historians will call it I have no idea. Perhaps it will be known simply as objective one, as it was designated on the map Brig. Gen. Edward Craig, commander of the First Provisional Marine Brigade, held in his lap as he sat in a bean field. But no one is going to forget it any more than he will forget Bloody Nose Ridge at Peleliu or Mount Suribachi at Iwo Jima or the sand dunes at Tarawa. Here took place the most brutal battle in the first 2 months of the Korean campaign.

"This," said one of Ed Craig's senior officers as he watched the long line of litters coming out of the valley below No Name Ridge, "is the toughest we've hit. This is like Iwo."

The Marines, having won the objective assigned them south of Chinju, were thrown into the Changnyong bulge after 1 night's rest. With the Nineteenth Regiment and a regimental combat team they set out to drive an estimated 12,000 Commies from positions which were a menace to Pusan. No Name Ridge was the first assault point. The Marines had to take it before the combat team could move ahead in the center. Intelligence figured the enemy had around 600 troops well dug in along the ridge.

During the night of Wednesday, August 16, the Marines moved into position on another ridge just east of there. Early on Thursday morning American artillery hammered No Name Ridge for 5 minutes. Then for 15 minutes Marine Corsair fighters raked it with bombs, rockets, and machine guns. Then came another 10 minutes of artillery. Finally as the 8 a. m. jump-off hour neared, the Corsairs moved back in for their final strafing runs, and No Name Ridge was smoking with dust and cordite.

Then the Marines started down into the valley, and the seemingly lifeless ridge suddenly became alive with the enemy. From the left rear of the assault force came the angry eruption of a machine gun. Another machine gun opened up from the valley floor to the right. From the top of the hill came more machine-gun fire, interlaced with bursts from automatic weapons and mortars. Hell burst around the leathernecks as they moved across the valley and up the ridge. Everywhere along the assault line men fell.

But, glory forever to the bravest men I ever saw, the line did not break. It went forward in spurts. The casualties were unthinkable, but the assault force never turned back. It moved, fell down, got up and moved again.

"God!" exclaimed a veteran Marine officer as he watched. "How brave can men be?"

"I never saw men with so much guts," said General Craig watching through glasses. His hand shook slightly, but his mouth was a firm line and his cold blue eyes did not cloud.

For more than an hour the assault force stumbled and struggled forward. The enemy mortar was knocked out by artillery, but the machine guns and automatic weapons never let up. As the Marines neared the crest, their line ripped apart, the North Koreans came out of their positions throwing grenades. They were cut down, but the grenades did terrible work.

The Marine line wavered, paused, withdrew a bit and waited. Then, with a final thrust, an estimated 10 Marines reached the crest of the ridge. They never came back.

The rest were ordered to withdraw. Men too exhausted to cry crawled back down the ridge. For all the terrible sacrifice the position stayed in enemy hands.

The ridge became quiet. Corpsmen, leading stretcher teams of South Koreans, who never flinched at sniper fire which raked their trail, began crossing the valley to pick up the wounded. They took them to an aid station just beyond the bean field where General Craig sat sweeping the ridge with his field glasses. I sat beside him all choked up and wondered if the stream of litter bearers would ever stop coming up out of that damned valley.

Craig, a kind and sensitive man, tried not to look at his torn kids. Finally he said, with sad pride, "I haven't heard one of the wounded cry. We'll take this piece of real estate, but the cost is going to be terrible."

Artillery began plastering the Communist positions. Then the Corsairs came roaring out of the sky with a terrible anger. They seemed to be live creatures mad for revenge. Their gull wings almost touched the tops of the low bushes as they screamed in on all sides. Their rockets hardly left their wings before they blasted into the targets with searing orange flame. The pilots, knowing the kids down there had had a horrible time, jerked their planes out of dives and pulled away in turns that were almost too tight, eager to make another run.

The wounded on the litters were carried past their general, who sat with a terrible calm waiting for his second assault wave to come up the winding mountain road. Near General Craig the bearers gently lowered the litters and rested for a brief moment. Troops nearby and correspondents watching the battle gave the wounded water.

I asked Corpsman Charles Scribner, of Rochester, Mich., who had just come off the ridge, what is was like over there.

"Sir," he said panting, his fatigues dripping with sweat and his arms so weary they dangled at his side, "over there is much shot and much hell. We are doing the best we can. We'll get 'em out."

Scribner could not remember how many trips he made across the valley. He had a record of the wounded he brought out. It indicated he made more trips than seems humanly possible.

Scribner waited until his South Korean litter bearers had loaded the men they had just brought up onto a jeep. He shook himself, said "Come on, characters," and started down into the valley again. The South Koreans followed without a word. No one knew their names. They were just "Scribner's characters," and they were good characters to have on your side.

The new assault wave moved up and they watched the wounded going in the other direction. They were unsmiling, and there was fear in their faces. The faces were so young.

As they got ready to jump off, the last of the wounded were coming out of the valley. General Craig came down from the edge of the bean patch and watched. Finally he walked to a litter and touched a badly wounded boy on the shoulder.

"Nice work, son," he said very softly. "Thank you." Then he returned to the bean patch. The boy did not hear what the general said. It is probably just as well.

It is nice to report that the second assault wave carried the ridge with no name and that the marines continued their advance. But it will never be nice to remember those kids who were being carried out of that valley. The only good of it all is the wonderful knowledge that there are good, brave Americans still about.

As Thick as Fleas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD H. VELDE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Peoria Star September 12, 1950, entitled "As Thick as Fleas":

AS THICK AS FLEAS

The list of persons arrested as wartime or postwar Communist spies, and charged with perjury for denying Communist connections, added to former Communists who confessed their past activities, has grown bewilderingly long. And it continues to grow.

It becomes more obvious all the time that there has been no place in the United States which Communist spies could not easily penetrate, whether it was a laboratory doing top secret work on atomic fission or the Department of State, where foreign policy was being made.

Last week, on the same day, one scientist was arrested and charged with being a Communist and another was convicted of perjury. Both had access to jet propulsion secrets at the California Institute of Technology. One was Dr. Hsue-shen Tsien, an alien who has been in this country since 1948 and was head of the Guggenheim jet propulsion center at Caltech. The other is Dr. Sidney Weinbaum, a physicist who worked at the same jet propulsion laboratory. A jury found Dr. Weinbaum guilty of perjury in denying that he was a Communist in order to remain at work in the laboratory.

There was another physicist who worked in California in 1943 and was accused of passing atomic secrets to a Russian spy, but the Department of Justice is mysteriously reluctant to present his case to a grand jury. For a time he was known only as Scientist X. September 30, 1949, the House Committee on Un-American Activities identified him as Dr. Joseph Weinberg, assistant professor of physics at the University of Minnesota. The committee turned its evidence over to the Department of Justice and asked that Dr. Weinberg be prosecuted for perjury on the grounds that he lied when he testified that he was not a Communist and did not know Steve Nelson, Communist agent. It has been 11 months and 12 days since the Department of Justice received this recommendation from the House committee. Why the long delay?

The committee also named four other scientists who are alleged to have attended a meeting with Steve Nelson in Weinberg's home. They were Giovanni Lomanitz, once professor at Fisk University; David J. Bohm, physics professor at Princeton University; Irving David Fox, assistant instructor at the University of California; and Max Friedman, now Ben Max Manfred, who a year ago was studying for a doctor's degree at California.

There is not now, nor has there been any real security for the Nation's top secrets, nor very much danger of punishment for betrayers of those secrets.

What Is Going on in Germany?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, this week the spotlight shifts for one moment from the terrible events in the Far East to events in Europe which can prove even more terrible in the future. This week the Secretary of State will meet with the Foreign Ministers of Britain and France to discuss the momentous question of rearming Germany.

Barely 5 years have passed since we crushed the military might which the Nazis and the militarists and industrialists who supported them turned loose on the world.

When Germany surrendered in 1945 we swore that never again would the same cliques of totalitarians be allowed to control the potential military, financial, and industrial power of a resurgent Germany. We are now facing momentous decisions on whether and under what circumstances German armed strength is to make its reappearance in world affairs. Our Government is proposing to place armed strength in the hands of Germans only 5 years after the highest officers of our Government declared that it would be 25 to 40 years before Germany as a nation could be trusted to take its place alongside the democratic nations of the world. That, in itself, is a dangerous proposition and one not to be undertaken lightly.

But, Mr. Speaker, shocking though that decision may be, there is another which is even more shocking in its implications for the future safety of the United States and the peace of the world.

At the very moment of decision, without any apparent rhyme or reason, our High Commissioner for Germany is permitting spokesmen and representatives of the ultra-nationalist and ultra-militarist backers of the Nazis to assume a dominant position in the new Germany. Within recent days the Brotherhood of German Officers, with an insolence which could scarcely be matched by any but a German military clique, has issued an ultimatum to the Government of the United States, laying down the conditions under which they will continue to obey the laws which the United States has enacted to govern the occupation of our zone in Germany. I had expected that this outburst would bring an immediate crack-down from our High Commissioner, the Honorable John J. McCloy. I have found nothing in the papers voicing any objections by our High Commissioner to the conduct of the German officers. Instead, I have read a statement by Mr. McCloy that he supports the idea of rearming Germans for their own defense.

Mr. Speaker, this is not an isolated incident. Day after day we are piling up evidence that the same groups which dominated Germany under the Nazis are keeping everything in a turmoil, shaping future events so that there can be but one outcome: Nazi domination of Germany and German domination of Europe. The result of all this well-planned confusion, engineered by the worst elements in Germany, is that our Secretary of State is occupied and our High Commissioner is occupied, but Germany is not.

A few days ago I was shocked to read in the papers that High Commissioner McCloy had ordered the release of eight more war criminals: Top Nazi bankers and industrialists who had been convicted in 1948 of furthering and profiting from the Nazi war effort. These war criminals have now been released, long before the completion of the sentences imposed upon them, on the ground of good behavior in prison. These men, who were among those who "spark-plugged" the rise of the Nazi Party, are presumably to be given the right to resume their positions of power and influence in the new Germany. When I protested, I received a reply from the Honorable Jack McFall, Assistant Secretary of State. This reply is so unresponsive to the spirit of my protest that, under leave, I am inserting both my telegram and the reply in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, these separate events are merely the shadows of things to come. As I noted in my telegram of protest, I have already examined an advance copy of an astounding new book which will be published on September 18 by Little, Brown & Co., of Boston. This book, All Honorable Men, by James Stewart Martin, tells the inside story of how the bankers and industrialists who supported the Nazis have defeated all efforts to control their postwar activities. This book names men on both sides of the Atlantic who have carried out a conspiracy of planned forgetfulness, overriding the safeguards which the American people have consistently demanded ever since Germany surrendered. Here is the blow-by-blow account showing how these Nazi "bigwigs," with the help of friends on this side of the Atlantic, frustrated every effort to institute reforms and safeguards which could have prevented Germany from resuming her former position as the Black Widow of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, under leave, I am also inserting in the RECORD a copy of a letter to the Secretary of State, furnished to me by Mr. Martin, together with the unresponsive reply from the Department of State.

Mr. Speaker, what is going on in Germany? The present meeting of the foreign ministers presents a good opportunity to ask that question. Have we no right to expect an answer? Have we been so carried away by the cold war and the Korean situation that we will accept without question, blindly, any ally at all, even including the Nazis and their financial backers, if only they will tell us by word of mouth that they are opposed to communism?

Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more dangerous to our own security and to the peace of the world. I suggest that we look into this in all seriousness before it is too late.

Text of telegram dated August 18, 1950:

This morning's New York Times informs the American people that eight dangerous Nazi war criminals are being released August 25 in approximately 2 years less than their assigned sentences, through a most amazing computation of good behavior credit of 10 days a month, amounting to a reduction in sentence of one-third by flat of the High Commissioner of Germany.

The only possible explanation of this depresing information is that these Nazis, convicted in a duly consituted court of revolting crimes against humanity, are to be restored to power in postwar Germany.

Since the extermination of working men and women by various means of cruel death was the basic crime of these monsters, I hardly need point out to you that organized labor in the United States is going to resent this amnesty to the murderers of labor. I am certain that you had no prior knowledge of this peculiar means of rewarding dangerous criminals for eating their meals without protest while their fellow sinners fought for crusts.

It has been my privilege to read advance proofs of a new book by James Stewart Martin to be published September 18 under the title of "All Honorable Men" which, in a scholarly and legal presentation of the economic crimes of Hitler Germany, tells something of the vicious history of these men.

Even more of their direct guilty for the death of millions of human beings, in battle and in death camps, is made clear in the documents presented by Mr. Martin to the House Monopoly Subcommittee.

Friederich Flick and his fellow criminals have served less than one-third of the time in which they rose to the Nazi wave of triumph.

To release them now is not only small punishment for brutal crimes, it is an insult to the memory of 20,000,000 human beings of ever nationality, including our own American soldiers who died that nazism might be rooted out from our world.

I hope you will use the authority of your high office to see that these criminals are not rewarded for their crimes.

ARTHUR G. KLEIN, M. C.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 28, 1950.

The Honorable ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KLEIN: Your telegram to the President concerning the release this week of certain war criminals imprisoned in Germany has been referred to this Department for reply.

As your telegram notes, the release of the prisoners in question results from a decision to increase the credit for good behavior allowed to war criminals. This decision was the result of full discussion within the office of the United States High Commissioner for Germany and with leading prison authorities.

The revised credit for good behavior was designed to bring the practice of the High Commission closer to that followed in the United States. For example, the correction law of New York State, as amended in 1948, authorizes the reduction of 10 days for each month of the original sentence for good conduct and efficient and willing performance of duties assigned. Similarly a prisoner convicted of offenses against the United States and confined in penal or correctional institutions for a definite term other than for life may be credited with as much as 10 days for each month, depending upon the length of the original sentence, if his record of conduct shows that he has satisfactorily observed all the rules and has not been subjected to punishment.

You may be interested in knowing that Mr. McCloy has appointed a clemency board to review cases of war criminals under his jurisdiction. This board consists of Frederick A. Moran, chairman of the New York State Parole Board; Judge David W. Peck, of the Supreme Court of New York; and Conrad E. Snow, assistant legal adviser for this Department. It is understood that the members of this board were consulted before the decision was made to increase the good behavior time.

Sincerely yours,

JACK K. MCFALL,
Assistant Secretary.

For the Secretary of State.

ANNAPOLIS, MD.,
August 17, 1950.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Dispatches from Germany dated August 16, 1950 state that on August 25 eight more leading backers of the Nazi regime previously convicted of war crimes are to be released from prison after having served a fraction of their sentences.

A fair appraisal of the record will show that these defendants got off with ridiculously short sentences in the first place. Nevertheless, the High Commissioner, Mr. John J. McCloy, is reported to have issued new regulations cutting by one-third the original sentences imposed on Friedrich Flick, the Nazi-made steel man; Karl Rasche, head of the Dresdner Bank; Fritz Ter Meer, I. G. Farben's poison gas man; Heinrich Lehmann, Krupp's slave labor boss; and four others scarcely less distinguished for their service to the Nazi cause.

These men are to be rewarded for their good behavior while under sentence. Their good behavior has consisted in remaining quietly warm and dry in prison and eating three square meals a day while serving sentences for participating in and profiting from the murder of more than 6,000,000 human beings.

Under this new order, these men will leave prison next week instead of about July 1, 1952. Unless some positive action is taken, they will come back in time to assume positions of powers and influence in the rearmament of Germany.

These men were more than participants in murder and loot. Flick and Rasche were among the 20 secret contributors of funds who made it possible for Hitler to take over in 1933. The activities of the Krupp and I. G. Farben managements are too well known to need further comment. The record of all these men, and the complicity of certain prominent American businessmen in their world-wide intrigues, were exposed during the first years of the occupation of Germany.

I have detailed these facts from documentary evidence and personal observations in my book All Honorable Men. Since the book will not be released for public distribution until September 18, I am asking the publisher, Little, Brown, & Co., to forward to you by airmail an advance copy in the hope that something can be done to review this ill-considered action before the men are turned loose on August 25.

The record of the occupation to this date has been that of repeating, one by one, the errors made in dealing with Germany after the First World War. At this critical time it will be indeed unfortunate if the foreign policy of the United States becomes confounded with the Nazis' plans for postwar revival under cover of the confusion which the Nazi leaders have done so much to create.

Respectfully yours,

JAMES STEWART MARTIN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 31, 1950.

Mr. JAMES S. MARTIN,
Annapolis, Md.

MY DEAR MR. MARTIN: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter dated August 17, 1950, in which you have expressed your views concerning the release of eight Germans convicted of war crimes prior to the expiration of the full prison terms.

The release of these prisoners has resulted from a decision of the United States High Commissioner for Germany to increase the credit for good behavior allowed to war criminals and was designed to bring the High Commissioner's practice closer to that followed in the United States. For example, the correction law of New York State, as amended in 1948, authorizes the reduction of 10 days for each month of the original sentence "for good conduct and efficient and willing performance of duties assigned." Similarly a prisoner convicted of offenses against the United States and confined in penal or correctional institutions for a definite term other than for life may be credited with as much as 10 days for each month, depending upon the length of the original sentence, if his "record of conduct shows that he has satisfactorily observed all the rules and has not been subjected to punishment."

You may be interested to know that Mr. McCloy has appointed a clemency board to review cases of war criminals under his jurisdiction. This board consists of Frederick A. Moran, chairman of the New York State Parole Board; Judge David W. Peck, of the Supreme Court of the State of New York; and Conrad E. Snow, assistant legal adviser of this Department. It is understood that the members of this board were consulted before the decision was made to increase the good behavior time.

Your courtesy in requesting your publisher to provide the Department with a copy of your book All Honorable Men is appreciated.

Slave Labor in Stalin's Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ROBERT L. RAMSAY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article which appeared in the September issue of the American Federationist, an official publication of the American Federation of Labor, entitled "Slave Labor in Stalin's Russia," and written by Toni Sender:

Why are western Europe and the western world shut off from the Soviet Union by the iron curtain? What is hidden behind it? Is it the need for concealing the enormous rearmament and other war preparation, knowledge of which would destroy the smoke screen of the internationally organized "peace" propaganda? Or is it to hide the shockingly low standard of living of the average Russian worker and its contrast with the standard of the Soviet ruling group, the members of the managerial class?

Or is the foremost reason for the iron curtain the desire of Russia to hide the horror of the appalling conditions of slave labor, knowledge of which throughout the world would destroy the illusions of workers and fellow travelers about the "Socialist" state of the Soviets?

It was the American Federation of Labor which first drew the attention of governments to the following facts: In the Soviet Union millions of men and women, natives and foreigners, are working far away from their homes, separated from their families, under conditions of starvation and torture. They are clothed in rags. They are deprived of sanitation and medical care. The utter disregard for the dignity of the human person in Russia's slave-labor camps of today is much worse than in the ancient days of slavery.

The charges of slavery in Russia are supported by documents and witnesses and surviving victims. World War II gave some of the victims a chance to escape from the Soviet Union. They are haunted by the pathetic pleas of their cosufferers, left behind in Stalin's crowded slave-labor camps:

"Do not forget us. Will you give testimony for us? Was not your suffering also ours?"

At the end of World War II, when the unbelievable horror of the Hitler concentration camps became known to the world, these crimes against humanity were brought before the Nuremberg tribunal, the criminals were sentenced, the principals to capital punishment. Is there a dual measurement? Are forced labor, deportation and cruelty crimes when committed by a defeated enemy but sanctioned when practiced by the victor?

Soon it will be 3 years since the American Federation of Labor first brought the facts on forced labor in the Soviet Union before the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. It required persistence and prodding on the part of the A. F. of L. consultant to the UN not only to have the item put on the agenda of the Council but to have it discussed and action taken.

During 1948 forced labor was carried on the agenda, but the delegates still hesitated to start the discussion. Many of them were afraid that the A. F. of L. would not be able to make a strong case with sufficient facts to prove the accusation.

During the passing months the material in the possession of the A. F. of L. grew. Documentary evidence was adding up. It was the weight of this documentation which finally forced the discussion, first in the session of the Economic and Social Council of February, 1949. Since then no Council session has been held without the subject of forced labor in the Soviet countries appearing on the agenda and being discussed.

In the February, 1949, session testimony from dozens of victims was presented and the volume of affidavits was put at the disposal of the delegates. These affidavits were given by persons from all walks of life—workers, peasants, Red Army officers, a foreign trade expert and widows of former Comintern leaders who had been executed.

The presentation of this shocking evidence of Soviet slavery stirred public opinion throughout the civilized world beyond anything that had ever been before the Economic and Social Council previously. Members of the Council as well as visitors to the Council chamber listened with strained attention. Everyone felt that these facts were a definite statement of the return to the most barbarous days of human history.

While the Russian delegate was highly embarrassed by the volume and content of the incriminating material, there was only one defender of the Soviets—the World Federation of Trade Unions. Playing the innocent, the WFTU stated that it had never received complaints in this connection from any of its affiliated national unions. For once, one may be inclined to believe the WFTU.

The discussion ended with the adoption of a resolution inviting the International Labor Organization to give further consideration to the problem of forced labor in the light of all possible information, including the memorandum of the A. F. of L. and the records of the Council's discussion. The Council also requested the Secretary General of the UN to approach all governments and to inquire in what manner and to what extent they would be prepared to cooperate in an impartial inquiry into the existence of forced labor in their countries, including the reasons for which persons are made to perform forced labor and the treatment accorded them. The Russians opposed this action of the Council.

In conformity with the resolution adopted by the Council, the Secretary General approached the various governments about their readiness to cooperate in a fact-finding effort. The Russians, in reply, merely referred to the speeches of their delegates. The majority of the governments, however, declared themselves ready to cooperate. Some, like Britain, stated that they would do so only on condition that other governments, especially the U S S R., would do likewise.

This result was submitted to the next session of the Economic and Social Council in July 1949, in Geneva. The great surprise of this session was new evidence submitted by Britain. The British delegate presented photostatic copies of the Russian Corrective Labor Codex together with English and French translations. This document was a full confirmation of the accusations as expressed by the A F. of L It showed.

Forced labor is inflicted in Russia on so-called hostile elements as well as on so-called unstable elements among the workers—in other words, for reasons of political dissent.

It may be inflicted by a decree of an administrative organ—in other words, outside a court of law and without due process of law.

The institution of forced labor serves as a highly mobile manpower source for industrial enterprises, particularly for projects in remote regions.

Incitement to utmost exertion is introduced by setting norms of production for paying of wages, namely, by using hunger and starvation as a means for exploitation.

To the supervisory command are appointed persons convicted of ordinary crimes.

Sources of financing the system of corrective labor and the industrial establishments they serve are income from the productive activity of the corrective labor institutions and deductions from the wages of persons performing corrective labor.

The Soviet delegate at this session had the task of meeting this new challenge. No longer was the denial of the existence of forced labor possible. So he claimed that mistakes had been made in the translation of the document—quite irrelevant in view of the fact that the British delegate had attached the full Russian text to the document.

But the United States was willing to go a step further in the desire to come to practical results. The United States presented a resolution asking for the appointment of an 11-man commission authorized to take testimony and hold public hearings under such rules as it would itself establish. The commission would report to the Economic and Social Council as well as to the ILO, with recommendations to each as might be appropriate.

Unfortunately this resolution did not obtain a majority. Another, presented jointly by Brazil, Denmark, and India, was adopted. This resolution asked the Secretary General to request governments which had not yet stated that they would cooperate in an inquiry to consider whether they could give a reply to that effect.

The question of forced labor was kept alive. Again it appeared in the Council session of February 1950.

The A. F. of L. consultants had succeeded in obtaining further and still more revealing documentation on the practice of arrest and forced labor in the U. S S. R. Information from reliable sources indicated that the Soviet secret police (MVD) have slave labor projects of such major importance as to form an essential part of Soviet economic planning, in some economic sectors MVD production dominates, if not actually monopolizes, the field. The 5-year plan's share in production from forced labor amounted to one-tenth to over one-half of the total production of the U. S. S R in some industries.

The Soviet delegates in the United Nations had argued that all persons held in Russia's forced labor camps were criminals. Documents obtained by the A F. of L. of a strictly secret character, photostats of which were presented to the Council, contain a listing of the categories deported from the Baltic countries to Russian forced-labor camps. Among them figure "persons who had occupied prominent positions in the civil or communal service," "prominent members of the anti-Communist parties, Social Democrats, Liberals, small farmers, active members of Jewish organizations, such as Bund and Zionist organizations," "industrialists, wholesale merchants, owners of large houses, shipowners, owners of hotels and restaurants, persons who have been in the diplomatic service, relatives of persons who have escaped abroad." Thus it is stamped a crime to belong to certain professions or to be related to a person who has succeeded in escaping to a free country.

Again a very profound impression was made by the presentation of these most revealing facts. However, with the Russians absent from the Council as a result of their walkout, the majority did not see fit to come to a final conclusion and to action. The matter was postponed until the session of February 1951.

Meantime, however, the matter was brought before the governing body of the ILO by the workers' representative of the United States of America. As a result, it was already in the July-August 1950 session of the Council that the item appeared on the agenda.

A new development had taken place. The United Kingdom was willing to start action. Unfortunately, the matter was left to be dealt with almost at the very end of the session. There were still a few governments hesitant to take action in the Russians' absence. Also some delegates, whose attitude in favor of action is well established, wished to have a more thorough preparation before starting proceedings, which did not seem possible in such a rush as is inevitable on the last days of a session.

Nevertheless, the United States and Britain insisted on starting the debate. The delegates of both countries presented a new series of facts. The British delegate submitted two volumes of laws of the U. S. S. R and Czechoslovakia, confirming to the letter all the accusations that had been previously made by the A. F. of L. They also presented a resolution which reads in its operative part:

"Decides to invite the International Labor Organization to cooperate with the Council in the earliest possible establishment of an ad hoc Committee on Forced Labor of no more than five independent members to be appointed jointly by the Secretary General and the Director General of the International Labor Office with the following terms of reference:

"'(1) To survey the field of forced labor, taking into account the provisions of International Labor Convention No. 29 and inquiring particularly into existence, in any part of the world, of systems of forced or "corrective" labor which are employed as a means of political coercion or punishment for holding or expressing political views, or which are on such a scale as to constitute an important element in the economy of a given country;

"'(2) to assess the nature and extent of the problem at the present time; and

"'(3) to report the results of its studies and progress to the Council and to the governing body of the International Labor Office.'

"Requests the Secretary General and the Director General to supply professional and clerical assistance necessary to insure the earliest initiation and effective discharge of the ad hoc committee's work."

After the accusing speeches of the American and British delegates, it was the Canadian delegate, making it very clear that he wished the investigation to take place, who proposed postponement to the twelfth session of the Council in February 1951, in order to have sufficient time for thoroughly preparing the action desired. This proposal was adopted by eight votes for and seven abstentions. Thus the question will come up again. And it may not be deleted from the agenda until final action has been taken.

We are now a step further. The above-mentioned motion will have to be voted on 6 months from now. Forced labor will be on the agenda of the free world until it ceases. Because our freedom is not secure as long as millions of helpless creatures are dying miserably behind barbed wire.

One Hundred and Fifty Years Devoted to Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER E. BREHM

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, on October 10, 1950, an event will occur in Chillicothe, Ohio, which possesses national significance. I refer to the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth birthday of the Chillicothe Gazette.

This paper was founded and first issued at Chillicothe, the first capital of Ohio, in 1800, which was 3 years before Ohio was admitted to the Union as a State. The Gazette is the oldest newspaper in the United States west of the Alleghenies. In the century and a half since its first issue, no notable event has gone unrecorded in its columns. It has recounted the growth of a Nation from a struggling group of States until now when that Nation has become the greatest power in the world.

In commemoration of their one hundred and fiftieth birthday the Gazette will issue a special sesquicentennial edition and it is my intention to secure copies of this edition and to have them displayed not only in the Congressional Library but also in the main reading room just off the House floor in the Nation's Capitol. Due to the remodeling of the Capitol it will not be possible to display it in the latter reading room until the new Congress convenes next January.

Mr. Speaker, I desire herein to extend sincere congratulations and best wishes not only to Mr. J. K. Hunter, the present publisher of this fine paper, but also to the other members of his staff for the ethical manner in which they conduct the policy of this paper. I am proud to represent the congressional district in which this splendid paper is published and sincerely hope and pray that it may continue to faithfully record events of the future as it has those of the past.

Fine Fighting Qualities of South Koreans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I can attest to the fighting qualities of the South Koreans. Once given the proper support on the ground and in the air they have proved themselves to be fine fighting men. The South Korean Navy has sunk more ships than they have ships of their own and have virtually prevented all movement of the enemy by sea. The South Korean marines once marched 80 miles in 3 days and inflicted casualties on the enemy greater than the total number of marines involved. They are first-class fighters.

Under permission granted, I include herewith an article by Robert P. Martin appearing in the Manila Bulletin of September 4, 1950.

GI's Revising Opinion of Their Impassive-Faced South Korea Allies

(By Robert P. Martin)

Somewhere in Korea: In less than a month of combat, hundreds—perhaps thousands—of GI's have radically reversed their opinion of the slender, impassive-faced South Korean soldier.

When the first United States infantry arrived in Korea, the American-trained South Korean Army was in full flight, its men desperately afraid of the Communist tanks and artillery. The GI's—and a number of generals—dismissed the South Koreans as men of little courage and proceeded to fight the war by themselves. Then the GI's broke and ran when they too found themselves unable to stop the North Korean tanks, ran out of ammunition, or were cut off from the rear. It was a humiliating experience to Americans, but it taught a lesson that may prove of incalculable value in Asia—that a man isn't a coward or a fool just because his skin is other than white.

This correspondent was among those who predicted, quite inaccurately, that the South Koreans could be dismissed as a factor in the war, that the Americans would have to depend on themselves to win the war. The South Koreans are not, and probably never will be, in a position to beat the Communists by themselves. But they are proving valuable allies under certain battle conditions. They are not as great as enthusiastic public relations-minded Americans make them out to be. They still have a tendency to break under pressure, but they perform certain jobs magnificently.

Recognition of their peculiar qualities came when Gen. Douglas MacArthur ordered that South Korean soldiers be incorporated into American combat groups, as regular replacements in platoons and companies. The South Koreans were given equal standing with the GI's. They wear the same uniforms, eat the same chow, and fight the same battles. Nothing has yet been said about possible bonuses or whether they will be eligible for benefits under the GI Bill of Rights.

The experiment was ordered by General MacArthur to see if the nucleus of a real UN army, to be reinforced by British, Australian, Filipino, and other troops, could be created. But the experiment will have more materialistic benefits.

In the past, the GI's have been fighting under a heavy handicap. Few of them could speak Korean; the terrain was strange. They were unable to distinguish between friend and foe, between guerrilla and refugee. The South Korean soldier, living with and fighting beside the GI, will be able to help his ally, guide him across country, protect him from unrecognizable enemies, and serve as a buffer between the American who dislikes the Korean and the Korean who fears and hates any foreigner. More prisoners may be taken if the GI's can restrain the volatile South Korean from killing every enemy soldier he sees.

Until recently, the Koreans fought as separate units. They were given entire sectors to defend. They did it well, once they had proper equipment, plenty of ammunition, and artillery support. They were also used to protect the flanks of American attacking units. They could move much more easily among the hills, and through the roadless valleys. Now, however, the American and the Koreans will fight side by side, and the experiment will be worthwhile if it has no other result than to get the two acquainted.

Given the same fire power, the South Korean is as good a soldier as his Communist brother. In this war, half modern and half medieval, the South Koreans have shown considerable adaptability. They will leave their lines with a couple of balls of rice wrapped in seaweed, some dried fish, and a back-bending load of ammunition. They fight for days, with only the most antiquated transportation and a virtually nonexistent medical service. And they keep going, trotting across the stony ridges or down the sun-baked valleys, while the GI's puff their way to the nearest bit of shade.

The South Koreans fight a primitive war. Like the Communists, they do not set their mortars on the reverse side of the hill, using communications and observers to direct fire. The man who fires the mortar is his own observer. He is dug in on the highest hill, protected by infantry. He shoots visually, and keeps on shooting until the position is overrun.

"It isn't the way we use mortars," an American officer marveled, "but they lay them right in the enemy's hip pocket."

One does not know which of the many stories about the South Koreans to believe. But the Air Force swears by this one. Mustang pilots were bombing and strafing enemy positions about 150 yards ahead of the South Korean lines. One pilot failed to pull out of his dive and crashed into a hill about 500 yards behind the Red lines. A company of South Koreans, according to the story, came out of position, without orders, and shot their way through the Red lines to rescue the pilot.

And there was the unforgettable moment when a South Korean officer, his leg swollen with gangrenous pus, came out of the hills near Pohang, leading 17 Americans who had been ambushed and cut off by a Red attack. There was no interpreter present, and we could ask no questions. But an interpreter was not needed to express the gratitude of the rescued Americans, or the delight of the South Korean at his successful feat.

The language barrier has caused misunderstandings and ill feelings. But this is changing as one sergeant said, "We can't understand them and they can't understand us. But we get on fine, and they are good guys to have with you in a fire fight; none better."

Important Legislation Should Be Completed Irrespective of Reports of Plans for Adjournment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I am including in my remarks a statement issued Wednesday evening by 32 Republican Members of the House representing congressional districts in 16 States. The statement and signatures follow:

A soundly prepared excess-profits tax law should be enacted by Congress at the earliest possible date. We urge that the House Ways and Means Committee schedule this for immediate action.

The Democratic leadership apparently intends that Congress shall adjourn without acting on an excess-profits tax law.

We shall oppose and vote against any such adjournment. Some of us intend even to vote against sending the pending tax bill to conference unless the Democratic leadership gives positive assurance that Congress will not adjourn before voting on an excess-profits tax bill.

It is intolerable to send American youth into battle, or even to freeze wages and prices, without at the same time removing the excess profits resulting from war.

Ed Dodd

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED MARSHALL
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to speak a word of commendation to a real American and an outstanding figure in the field of agriculture, Ed Dodd, former Under Secretary of Agriculture and now Director-General of the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations.

Ed Dodd approached this work with his usual energy, and is today one of the best informed men in the world on the problems of agriculture. There is little of vague theory about Ed; he has a down-to-earth, practical approach.

Pipe dreams are not acceptable to him; he wants to see plans work in reality for the purpose for which they were intended. Ed is not afraid to get his shoes dirty by going out into the fields to see what is going on. He feels at home among people of all occupations.

The United States is making a substantial financial contribution to the Food and Agricultural Organization. As Members of Congress, we can feel more confidence in this program when we know that men of the caliber of Ed Dodd are at the wheel.

Our efforts to make the world a better place in which to live can be successful only if we approach these problems in a practical and realistic manner. It is a task that requires vision, understanding, and practical knowledge. It is a tremendous task but a task well worth the effort. This program is making progress.

Americans can be glad that our representative in that effort is Ed Dodd. The assistance will be lasting and will be understood by the people of the world. It will be sound because it is under the direction of a man who recognizes the human value of the people with whom he is working and who knows the social and economic problems under which they are trying to exist. Ed Dodd can meet a problem squarely with the intelligence and energy necessary in our present complex international situation. We can only hope that he will continue to give his guidance to the program in the critical period ahead.

Radio Purge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post on Sunday, September 10, 1950:

RADIO PURGE

More and more the techniques of the Communists are being embraced by those who profess to be fighting communism. Self-appointed policemen of Americanism tend increasingly to insist upon a rigid, stereotyped conformity, striving to suppress as disloyal any opinions that deviate a hairbreadth from their own. If they have their way, they will destroy the diversity that is the genius of American life. They aim, like the commissars of Moscow, to silence dissent and to dictate the forms and observances of what they consider patriotism.

They have enjoyed a rather frightening success of late in the entertainment industry. Puffed up over their success in destroying the careers of Paul Draper and Larry Adler, a group of them has now undertaken a systematic purge of radio. The index for its purge seems to be a book called Red Channels, purporting to show Communist infiltration in the broadcasting business; it amounts actually, of course, to nothing more than a listing of the group's personal dislikes and has about as much validity as Elizabeth Dilling's silly Red Network of some years ago. Nevertheless, it has already scored a shoddy triumph in depriving the television actress, Jean Muir, of her leading role in the program known as The Aldrich Family. This is a triumph closely akin to that of the Russians in disciplining the composer, Shostakovich, and in silencing every voice that does not faithfully follow the Communist Party line.

Whatever Miss Muir's political opinions and associations may be, the plain fact is that she has been made the victim of a form or organized thuggery. Her name was listed in Red Channels. As a result, the sponsor of her program, General Foods, received a series of telephoned protests, deliberately mobilized no doubt. And the sponsor, desiring understandably to avoid offense to any potential customer, at once canceled her contract on the ground that she had become a controversial personality. No attempt has been made to find out if there was any warrant for the listing of Miss Muir in Red Channels, although she has indignantly denied any Communist sympathies. At present there is no tribunal to which she can turn for a hearing or for vindication, but alarmed representatives of the radio and television industry are considering formation of a body to investigate such complaints against performers. We hope their efforts will succeed.

There is no nicer name for what was done in Miss Muir's case than blackmail. Advertisers being naturally sensitive to controversial personalities are generally subject to this kind of pressure. Unless repudiated by a concerted effort, it can be repeated in the case of any entertainer whose opinions the blackmailers dislike. But it represents an intrusion into American life of methods that have hitherto been considered distinctly communistic. They are methods that are unlikely to contribute to the defeat of communism. They can result only in bitter disunity and a destruction of American values.

The Way To Stop Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL F. WHITE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 8, my colleague, the Honorable E. C. GATHINGS, of Arkansas, placed a letter from Mr. W. C. Dawson, of Lepanto, Ark. I found Mr. Dawson's letter so interesting that I have taken the time to answer it. Feeling that there may be others who found Mr. Dawson's letter interesting and who would likewise be interested in my reply, I include my reply in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 11, 1950.

Mr. W. C. DAWSON,
Lepanto, Ark.

DEAR MR. DAWSON: I have read with interest your letter which our mutual friend, Congressman GATHINGS, placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

First, may I compliment you on some deep thinking. Most people are too indifferent, or are not gifted with enough talent, to go into our complex economic system as deeply as you have.

I have spent most of my adult life as an international trader in commodities and foreign exchange, so in addition to these things being an interesting avocation to me, they have also been my principal source of income.

In my humble opinion, you have certainly reached the correct conclusions when you say that surpluses cause unemployment and economic dislocation; and that the main source of the trouble is that the consumers do not have the money to buy the products.

In those last 11 words you have struck upon the main cause of most of the trouble in the world. But, if you will pardon my saying so, you do not offer the proper remedy because you say: "If all the money was put through the hands of the consumers there would be no need for labor laws, because in this case there would be enough buying power in the hands of the consumers to buy all we produce."

Well, my dear friend, that is a big "if." Who are the consumers? Certainly not us capitalists—we don't amount to 5 percent. The consumers are mostly the people who work for us and their families. The only way to get money into the hands of the consumers is to pay good wages, and the only way we are ever going to pay good wages is to have labor laws. We tried it from 1776 to 1935 without them. The more machines continue to displace men, the more men's wages must be raised and their hours shortened, in order to keep them employed at living wages and with enough buying power to buy the products you mention. As an employer, and as a 50-year-old observer who has studied these matters all his life, it is my humble opinion that, in general, wages will not be raised nor hours shortened without the labor laws to which you seem to object.

The main reason that our country is stronger than the rest of the world is that we pay good wages and they don't. We cannot stop communism with bombs and bullets and the temporary giving of money and economic aid. We must insist that any nation to which we extend economic aid shall force its employers to pay wages equal in purchasing power of food and clothing, to wages paid in this country for similar work.

Then the foreign countries will create their own markets by doing just what you suggested in your letter—putting money into the hands of their consumers which, may I add, are mainly the workers and their families. Then those foreign countries could not, and would not have to ship their cheap goods over here and put our people out of work.

In looking at the labor problem and the economic picture in general, I am afraid you have left out the effect of the scientific changes in the world since Adam Smith's day. As I see it, that is a common error of most modern economists. In the days of Adam Smith, or let us use an American, George Washington, over 90 percent of our people were engaged in agriculture. As long as crops were good, times were good because nearly every family raised all its own food, cut down trees and built its own house, and spun its own clothes off its own sheep's backs. But through the adoption of labor-saving machinery like the combine harvester, the corn picker, the cotton gin, the 18-bottom plow and tractor, etc., our Nation has been transformed into a nation of specialists in agriculture with only 19 percent of our people farming instead of the former 95 percent. And that measly 19 percent, through the use of these modern machines, can produce a veritable avalanche of surplus products that will wreck our economy and bring depression and war. Yes, all wars are of economic origin. Wars originate from human suffering, and most of the human suffering comes from economic dislocation which has come about through social change not keeping pace with scientific change.

Generally speaking, the same scientific changes (without comparable social changes) which have taken place in the agricultural industry have also taken place in other industries. Through the use of machines one man now can do the work that several men did in George Washington's time. This makes shorter hours and higher wages absolutely necessary.

In addition to having labor laws to force us to pay living wages, we must also have laws to regulate the volume of production to fit the estimated demand.

I don't like labor laws. I have a cotton compress and warehousing business and I fight with the union to which my employees belong. But I say thank God for labor unions. For if we did not have them, we employers could, and would, break the price of labor. When you break the price of labor you break the price of everything and bring on a depression.

I have also operated some farms for several years and I don't like Government regulation. But I prefer it to bankruptcy. Distasteful as it is to me to have Government regulation of farm production, bank credit, and labor laws, I prefer it to communism, and that evil system is just what may engulf the world if we have another depression like 1932. Communism thrives on depressions.

Maybe I am all wrong. Glad to compare views with you.

Sincerely yours,

CECIL F. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

United States Repeating Errors of 1938, Baruch Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I have supported the Baruch plan for national preservation from the beginning, and I call attention to Mr. Baruch's latest warning and to seven important recommendations, which I heartily approve. The importance of a policy for peace cannot be underestimated and Mr. Baruch's seventh point to the effect that we should state our peace terms to the Russian people highlights a failure of policy on the part of our administration which has not yet been guaranteed. Under permission granted, I quote the article, as follows:

UNITED STATES REPEATING ERRORS OF 1938, BARUCH SAYS

NEW YORK, September 11 (UP).—Bernard Baruch said today that the United States was making the same mistakes it did in 1938 shortly before Hitler unleashed his Panzer divisions across Europe.

The elder statesman, writing in Look magazine, warned that the Korean war was "not a one-alarm fire." He said the Kremlin had challenged this country to choose between "guns or butter, discomfort, or defeat."

"So far," Baruch said, "we are failing that challenge."

The man who has advised a half dozen Presidents urged this country to adopt the following points:

1. Mobilize now, all out. Place one central agency in charge to see that our defense production matches Russia's. "If we lose, we lose forever," Baruch said.

2. Halt inflation now, by clamping price-wage-rent controls.

3. Eliminate profiteering by raising taxes. Put defense spending on a pay-as-you-go footing.

4. Rearm western Europe fast—"so we can reach our allies before they are overwhelmed."

5. Revitalize the National Security Council into "a genuine general staff for peace."

6. Enact universal military training or revamp selective service so that pools of trained men are quickly available.

7. State our peace terms to the Russian people, "drawing a line between Russia's legitimate aspirations and the aggressive aims of her leaders."

"The Soviets learned the lesson of the last war," Baruch said. "We did not."

"When the last war ended, the United States was the mightiest arsenal of military and productive power in all history. Instead of holding that power together until peace was won, we scuttled and ran.

"We clamored to bring the boys home, cut taxes, lifted controls.

"Our neglects in the past leave no easy course. Let us do what must be done as quickly as possible."

Upper Colorado River Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, the problems attendant to the conservation and use of water throughout the Nation, but especially in the West, are most technical and are not easily understood by those of the West, let alone the people of the East who are not conversant with arid lands and the procedures of irrigation. Recently John Geoffrey Will, secretary and general counsel for the Upper Colorado River Commission, presented an exceptionally well-written treatise on these matters to the President's Water Resources Policy Commission. I am having the statement of Mr. Will placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the hope that the Members of the House and Senate will give sincere and thoughtful consideration to this most worth while explanation of the use of water in the West.

UPPER COLORADO RIVER COMMISSION,
Grand Junction, Colo., July 13, 1950.

Hon. MORRIS L. COOKE,
Chairman, The President's Water Resources Policy Commission,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COOKE: The Upper Colorado River Commission is glad to respond to the request of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission for an expression of its views and recommendations with respect to Federal responsibility for and participation in the development, utilization, and conservation of water resources, including related land uses and other public purposes directly concerned with water resources. I have been authorized, by unanimous vote of the Upper Colorado River Commission, to transmit these views to the President's Water Resources Policy Commission.

In the light of the background (hereinafter set forth) of its creation and of its functions, powers and duties, it would seem that the views of the Upper Colorado River Commission should be accorded great weight.

The Upper Colorado River Commission is a creature of article VIII of the Upper Colorado River Basin compact which was executed by commissioners for the States of Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming on October 11, 1948, and which was thereafter ratified by the legislature of each of such States and consented to by the Congress.

The Commission consists of five Commissioners, each of whom has a vote, as follows: one Commissioner representing the State of Colorado, one Commissioner representing the State of New Mexico, one Commissioner representing the State of Utah, one Commissioner representing the State of Wyoming; and one Commissioner representing the United States of America. Because of its comparatively slight land area in the Upper Basin, Arizona is not represented on the Commission and does not participate in the expenses of its administration. Arizona has taken, however, and will continue, the Commission is assured, to take a keen interest in the proceedings of the Commission.

The powers of the Upper Colorado River Commission are broad. In addition to the usual and routine powers with which an administrative body must necessarily be equipped, the Commission is particularly empowered to establish and construct, operate and maintain, water gaging stations to make estimates to forecast water run-off on the Colorado River and any of its tributaries; to engage in cooperative studies of water supplies of the Colorado River and its tributaries; to collect, analyze, correlate, preserve, and report on data as to the stream flows, storage, diversions, and use of the waters of the Colorado River, and any of its tributaries; to make findings as to the quantity of water of the Upper Colorado River System used each year in the Upper Colorado River Basin and in each State thereof; to make findings as to the quantity of water delivered at Lee Ferry during each water year; to make findings as to the necessity for and the extent of the curtailment of use required, if any, in order that the flow at Lee Ferry shall not be depleted below that required by article III of the Colorado River compact; to make findings as to the quantity of reservoir losses and as to the share thereof chargeable under article V to each of the States; to make findings of fact in the event of the occurrence of extraordinary drought or serious accident to the irrigation system in the upper basin, whereby delivery by the upper basin of water which it may be required to deliver in order to aid in fulfilling obligations of the United States of America to the United Mexican States arising under the treaty between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, of February 3, 1944, become difficult, and to report such findings to the Governors of the upper basin States, the President of the United States of America, the United States section of the International Boundary and Water Commission, and such other Federal officials and agencies as it may deem appropriate to the end that the water allotted to Mexico under division III of the treaty may be reduced in accordance with the terms of such treaty.

The powers of the Upper Colorado River Commission partake of a semijudicial character, in that they pertain to the obligation of the Commission to make findings as to certain matters of vital importance, such as quantity of use of water, quantity of deliveries at Lee Ferry, the need, if any, for curtailment of use of water, and the justification, if any, for reduction of deliveries to Mexico.

The powers and functions of the Commission partake also of an engineering character in that they deal with various hydrological investigations required in order to estimate and to forecast runoff and to determine consumptive uses of water and man-made depletion of stream flows. The construction of numerous large storage reservoirs will be essential if the Upper Colorado River Basin is to attain the development which is clearly indicated by present trends in the growth of its population, agriculture, and industry. Many engineering and economic problems will inevitably arise in the design and operation of such reservoirs. This is clear in the light of the multiple uses which should be made of the storage capacity provided by these reservoirs, and when there is envisaged the need to harmonize interests of the several States and of the Federal agencies which will be affected by these uses, to the end of bringing about the most profitable and economic conservation and utilization of the most vital of our western natural resources. The Upper Colorado River Commission expects to have a major share in the planning, coordination, and harmonization involved. It proposes that development of the water resources of the upper basin shall proceed on a comprehensive basis that takes into account the legitimate concerns of all--domestic, agricultural, and industrial water users, forests and reforestation programs, national parks, monuments, the protection of fish and wildlife, and recreation.

Finally, in article I (a) of the Upper Colorado River Basin compact, it is laid down, in part, that one of the major purposes of the compact is to "secure the expeditious agricultural and industrial development of the upper basin * * *." The Commission has adopted a program designed to achieve that purpose. In working toward that objective, the Upper Colorado River Commission fulfills the desire of the people of the Upper Colorado River Basin for an agency that will interpret the needs of the upper basin for prompt and sound development.

While it is believed that the views and recommendations hereinafter presented may well be found to be useful generally in the consideration of problems affecting the development, utilization, and conservation of water resources in the Nation as a whole, and especially in the 17 Western States, they are intended to apply particularly to such development, utilization, and conservation in the upper basin portions of those States which are parties to the Upper Colorado River Basin compact. The Upper Colorado River Commission recognizes that geographic, economic, and other differences between areas may well call, as they have in the past, for differences in approach to the solution of problems affecting the development, utilization, and conservation of their water resources. Each area should, in the judgment of the Upper Colorado River Commission, have the fullest opportunity, consistent with its relationship to other areas, and, of course, with Federal interest, to work out its particular destiny in these respects.

The Federal Government has, in the light of the commerce, general welfare, and treaty clauses of the Constitution, major responsibilities in connection with the development, utilization, and conservation of water resources. The States likewise have important responsibilities in the same fields. Experience in the West has proven that the exercise by each jurisdiction of these responsibilities can be accomplished without serious conflict. In the judgment of the Upper Colorado River Commission, therefore, the Federal Government should, in view of its responsibilities to the Nation as a whole, prosecute vigorously a Nation-wide program looking to the continued development, utilization, and conservation of water resources. Such a program should be well balanced and should consist of the authorization and construction of works for the improvement of navigation, for the control of floods, for river regulation, and for the development, storage, conservation, and use of waters for all beneficial purposes, including particularly the fulfillment of domestic, agricultural, and industrial needs and the development of hydroelectric power, the improvement and protection of national parks, monuments, and recreational areas, the protection and improvement of conditions favorable to fish and wildlife, the fulfillment of obligations of the United States to Indian tribes.

The character of Federal Government participation in major water-resources programs should follow the general pattern developed to date. That is to say, the Federal Government should investigate and report from time to time on proposed projects, following the policies and procedures laid down in section 1 of the act of December 22, 1944, commonly known as the "Flood Control Act of 1944." Authorized projects should be constructed by or under the direction of the Federal Government. Projects should be operated by or under the direction of the Federal Government to the extent necessary to assure fulfillment of the broad national purposes which they are designed to serve. The operation and maintenance of works that have primarily local significance should be confided, to the fullest practicable extent, to local organizations, under contracts that will assure the fulfillment of legitimate Federal objectives to be served thereby.

The need and justification for the maintenance of an ever-expanding national economy are such as to indicate that curtailment to any considerable extent of a national program for the worthy purposes heretofore enumerated would constitute not merely a tragic failure of the Federal Government to carry out a vital function, but economic folly as well. It should be borne in mind that projects for the development, utilization, and conservation of water resources, in addition to their other virtues, enrich and strengthen the Nation by providing expanded opportunities for agricultural and industrial development. They constitute investments that return many times their cost. Although the Upper Colorado River Commission recognizes the need for development on a comprehensive basis and advocates comprehensive planning, it does not believe that the development of individual projects should await the final completion of basin-wide plans. After all, basin-wide plans are subject to expression in general terms. Their details are perfected over the years.

The question then arises: Where shall appraisals as to the relative priority of water resource programs, from the standpoint of economic and social need, be made? These appraisals are made today in the legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government. In the judgment of the Upper Colorado River Commission, existing jurisdiction should remain undisturbed, subject only to some improvement in the mechanics utilized by the executive branch in connection with the analysis of proposed projects and to the consideration of the extent to which conflicts between existing Federal agencies can be eliminated. The Bureau of the Budget should confine itself to the relation of proposed projects to the National budget. It is, in our judgment, inadequately equipped to make detailed analysis of such projects. This is said without intending criticism and merely for the purpose of recognizing a fact. Furthermore, attempts on its part to perform such a function would result in inevitably in duplication that ought to be avoided. Finally, the need for the performance of such a function would be obviated, for the most part, by the application of uniform principles in determining the economic justification of projects. In this connection, your Commission might well give consideration to the May 15 report of the Subcommittee on Benefits and Costs of the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee. Basically, the question ought to be whether the amount paid by the direct beneficiaries plus the amounts made nonreimbursable because of the national interests involved exceeds the estimated cost of the project. The direct beneficiaries are those who derive an immediate benefit through the provision of a supply of water, the creation of a source of electric energy, and the improvement of local business conditions. The amounts which they can repay are usually susceptible of reasonably accurate determination Difficulties sometimes arise in determining the extent of the national benefit which justifies the Federal Government in making an investment of funds derived from tax sources. Certain purposes for which such an investment of funds should be made have been recognized for many years. They are accepted by the American people as a whole. They include: navigation improvement, flood control, the protection of fish and wildlife. Investment for these purposes should be continued. Consideration should be given to the extent to which additional purposes, of broad national interest, should be added by laws of general application.

Questions of allocation of costs inevitably arise as an incident of the economic justification of projects. Allocations should, in our judgment, be made in accordance with formulae capable of general application. If an allocation of costs is fairly and openly made, then the relative status of each function to be performed by a project will be clear.

It is economically sound, in certain instances (such will be the case in connection with the upper Colorado River storage project, for example), to group together a number of projects in a river basin. For certain areas, the use of water for domestic and agricultural purposes is the principal basis of their economy, and yet the users of water for agricultural purposes are not able to repay the total cost properly allocable to such purposes. It is eminently appropriate in such cases that aid should be derived from power revenues to fill the gap between what agricultural water users can repay and the amount allocated to agricultural purposes.

The Congress itself has dealt ably with the problem of evaluating priority needs for and the feasibility of proposed projects, notwithstanding that, in particular cases, it has been faced with difficulties stemming from conflicts between agencies in the executive branch of the Government and apparently overlapping committee jurisdiction.

Greater by far than the need for modification and adjustment of the Federal Government's water resources policies is the need for a better understanding of existing policies, of their historical background and of their gradual evolution, from the days when public works in the nature of river and harbor improvements were first confided to the United States Army engineers, to the day when such works were broadened in conception to include flood control and when the measure of the desirability of such works came to lie in whether their benefits, to whomsoever they might accrue, exceeded their estimated costs; from the day when the Federal reclamation program was designed primarily as an aid to settling the West to the day when it became a means as well for a broad scale attack on the multiple problems of navigation improvement, flood control, municipal and industrial water supply, agricultural production, the fulfillment of treaty obligations, recreation, the protection of fish and wildlife, the generation and distribution of hydroelectric power, and other purposes. If the background of the development of Federal policy to date and the extent to which such policy has evolved to meet the needs of society were better understood, there would, in our judgment, be fuller appreciation of the extent to which existing policy results generally in the reasonably efficient accomplishment of worthwhile national objectives and there would be manifested a less ready tendency to substitute for the status quo virtually untried policies and administrative schemes.

Much has been heard in recent years, for instance, about Federal policy with respect to the generation and distribution of hydroelectric power and some criticism has been leveled at the policy which permits application of the interest returned on the Federal Government's power investment in reclamation projects toward the return of the costs of such projects. Much has been heard also about repayment policy and about the so-called excess land policy. Much that has been heard about all of these things evidences a lack of knowledge regarding their objectives, their historical background, their intrinsic merits and the fact that comparatively minor improvements, where required in certain fields, will adjust them well to present day needs. The wiping out of these policies and the substitution for them of anything untried or approaching mere executive fiat would be destructive work, fraught with serious dangers to a free people.

The generation of hydroelectric energy as an incident of Federal water resource projects and the disposition thereof, "giving preference to municipal purposes" was first authorized as far back as April 16, 1906, in an act of Congress entitled "An act providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the Reclamation Act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes" (34 Stat. 116), and, shortly after that, the Comptroller of the Treasury held that receipts from the sale of such power should be classified as repayment. Therein lie the beginnings of a policy which has been elaborated through the years, as required to meet the needs of society, until today, under the Federal Reclamation laws, power plays an increasingly vital function both in the physical and in the financial aspects of water resource projects. With existing general Federal reclamation law on the subject of authorization, construction, operation and maintenance of hydroelectric power plants, including transmission lines, and governing rate-making and the distribution of power (and subject to its modernization and modification in certain respects such as to provide, among other things, for the establishment of a basin account), the Upper Colorado River Commission is satisfied. If other regions believe that they require different treatment of the subject, then they should, of course, have an opportunity to demonstrate the desirability of legislation that will permit such treatment there. The present state of Federal reclamation law on this subject, is, however, in general, well suited to development of the Upper Colorado River Basin.

This is so, because the present state of such law, while recognizing fully the vital role of power in itself, protecting against the monopolization of its benefits, affording preferences to municipalities and other public corporations, to REA's and other nonprofit organizations, also recognizes the vital role that power plays in the financing of water resource projects as a whole, making feasible from the financial point of view many desirable and worth-while projects that much otherwise fail to measure up to standards of feasibility. Long-delayed development of the water resources of the Upper Colorado River Basin depends in large measure upon the application to that development of the established policy of the reclamation law that power plants shall be constructed as an incident thereof wherever the generation of power proves feasible; that preference in the distribution of such power shall be accorded to municipalities and REA's; and that power revenues, in excess of those required to meet operation, maintenance, and amortization costs of the power plants, shall be available to help pay off the other costs of water-resource projects. In this connection, the suggestion has been made in certain quarters that REA cooperatives, for instance, ought not to have to pay for power a rate in excess of that required to operate, maintain, and return the cost of the power generation and distribution plants themselves. Such a conception fails to take account of the fact that, in the Western States, at least, the farmers in the main owe their very existence to water-resource development projects which could not, in turn, exist without power as a paying partner. So far as the Upper Colorado River Basin is concerned in any event, it appears clear that even the large-scale irrigation development which is in the offing will not require financial assistance through any special component of power rates, but that interest returned on the power investment will be sufficient therefor. In other words, those irrigation costs of our prospective development that are beyond the reasonable ability of prospective irrigation water users to repay within a reasonable period of years can be financed through revenues derived from the interest component of power rates as provided by existing reclamation law, and, so long as the traditional policy of application of such interest revenues to return of costs permits, the REA cooperatives and others are assured of reasonable rates for power In this connection, it should be borne in mind that the interim report on development of the water resources of the Upper Colorado River Basin (a report the salient features of which have been favorably commented upon by the five upper basin States) envisages the establishment of a basin account that recognizes the financial interrelationship of projects participating and that provides for financial assistance from power revenues. This basin account recognizes the essential unity of the Upper Colorado River Basin. It serves a twofold purpose: First, in that it averages the cost of power development throughout the upper basin, thus diffusing, by means of uniform rates, the benefit of the upper basin's power developments; and, second, in that it provides a means whereby proposed irrigation developments may be judged on their intrinsic merits, that is to say, on the basis of their benefit-cost ratios, without regard to the question whether a particular development has associated with it a power development of magnitude sufficient to repay those irrigation costs that are beyond the ability of the water users to repay. We regard a basin account as necessary for the purpose of achieving a power rate based upon the cost of all the proposed power developments in the upper basin and also for the purpose of providing a pool of financial assistance to irrigation developments so that their undertaking will be dependent solely upon their own merits and without regard to the geographic accident of their location in relation to a particular power development In other words, the essential need in the Upper Colorado River Basin is a plan for the upper basin as a whole—a plan whereby projects will be developed, not only in and of themselves, but from the standpoint of their relation to the upper basin as a whole.

As has been pointed out, the policy of application of power revenues to project costs was first laid down in 1906. It was reiterated in the Hayden-O'Mahoney amendment of 1938. It has been applied ever since that date. It is an established policy that is fully consistent with sound government and with sound accounting. It is highly beneficial to existing and further water resource development in the Western States.

The historical basis for the traditional policy of application of the revenues derived from the interest component of power rates to the return of the Federal Government's investment is so often used as to give rise to the statement: "Yes—we understand the historical argument. We understand that such has been the practice ever since the year 1906; but what about the merits?" Merit, as well as tradition, is on the side of adherence to the policy of application toward return of the costs of Federal reclamation projects of the revenues derived from the interest component of power rates.

The basis for not requiring the return, by those who repay and return the reimbursable costs of Federal reclamation projects, of interest on those costs, lies principally in the fact that encouragement thus given to the undertaking of projects for the development, conservation, and utilization of water resources produces benefits for the general welfare of the country as a whole and that the cost of providing such encouragement should, therefore, be borne by the country as a whole. In the final analysis, under the provisions of the Hayden-O'Mahoney amendment, once power revenues have paid into the reclamation fund all sums allocated to be returned from the power revenues of a particular project, then all subsequent net power revenues flow into the general fund of the Treasury. Thus, the Federal Government stands, in time, to collect directly, many times the interest first forgiven. And this is in addition to the gain in Federal revenues derived from increased tax revenues in the area served by the project. The Upper Colorado River Commission confidently predicts that studies will show conclusively that in particular areas this gain in tax revenues alone is much more than sufficient to reimburse the Federal Government with interest for its total outlay in the construction of a project.

The preservation and continued application of that policy is vital to further development of water resource projects in the Upper Colorado River Basin. Finally, since the abandonment of that policy would greatly increase the cost of power, the preservation and application of that policy is of immense importance to REA cooperatives, municipalities, and others, for which power should, of course, be supplied at the most reasonable rates.

Certain costs of Federal reclamation projects are, by existing law, declared to be nonreimbursable. These are those costs allocated to certain broad purposes, generally recognized as bringing about benefits to the Nation as a whole, as distinguished from purely local benefits. Among these purposes are: The improvement of navigation, flood control, and the protection of fish and wildlife. In recent months the question has arisen whether the cost of certain additional purposes should be added to the nonreimbursable class. The Upper Colorado River Commission believes that, insofar as water-resource projects serve additional broad national purposes in the interests of the taxpayers as a whole, costs properly allocable to such additional purposes should, likewise, be nonreimbursable. It believes, furthermore, that the operation and maintenance costs properly allocable to any and all purposes the costs of which are or hereafter may be held to be nonreimbursable should be nonreimbursable.

The repayment policy of the Federal reclamation laws has been modified from time to time to meet the needs of society. In the beginning (June 17, 1902) 10 years constituted the maximum repayment period. That period has since been expanded to 40 years, in the case of the traditional repayment contract, and in the case of the newer type of water-service contract, to a reasonable period of years. The Upper Colorado River Commission would look with favor upon a reasonable extension of the repayment period under the traditional form of repayment contract. It would look with favor also upon the modernization of section 9 (e) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 in such a way as to afford, so far as practicable, to parties contracting under that section the advantages of the traditional repayment contract. All in all, the Bureau of Reclamation has achieved an enviable record in obtaining the repayment and return of project costs. That record can be improved, so far as repayment and returns from irrigation water users are concerned, by the more realistic analysis of repayment ability and by the application of formulas that will permit of adjustments in times of economic change.

The so-called excess-land policies of the Federal reclamation law, designed as they are to encourage the settlement of the West through the creation of farm homes, to prevent the growth of excessively large estates and thus to prevent the monopolization of irrigation benefits, are sound in conception. Their intrinsic merit is beyond question. The Upper Colorado River Commission is in accord with their basic policy. There will, however, be found cases where rigid insistence upon an irrigable acreage not exceeding 160 or 320 acres, as the case may be, results in an acreage insufficient for the support of a family and thus, to a degree, in thwarting the basic policy of the excess-land provisions. There will be found, also, cases involving the provision of supplemental water supplies to established areas, where rigid insistence upon the rule is contrary to common sense as well as the general welfare. Such cases may lead to outright winking at contravention of existing law or to the strained construction thereof. The Upper Colorado River Commission believes that consideration might well be given to the creation of statutory procedures designed to permit the Secretary of the Interior to authorize holdings in excess of the existing statutory maximum in cases where, after hearings and the consideration of pertinent facts, he determines that in the light of soil quality, character of agriculture, historical background, the need of the affected community to retain a given operational unit and other appropriate factors, a larger area should be permitted. If such decisions of the Secretary of the Interior were prevented from becoming effective prior to the expiration of 60 days from the date of report thereon to the President and the Congress, abuses would be obviated.

It has been pointed out that, in the view of the Upper Colorado River Commission, subject to its modernization and modification in certain respects, the existing state of Federal law and policy constitutes a generally satisfactory basis for development in the upper Colorado River Basin. It is our view that such development should proceed also in accordance with the law of the river, to wit: The Colorado River Compact, the Boulder Canyon Project Act, the California Self-Limitation Act, the Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act, the Mexican Treaty, and the Upper Colorado River Basin Compact. It is our view that such development should be authorized promptly. The development of the upper Colorado River Basin has too long lagged behind that of other areas of the West. The plans for its development are sound from the engineering and financial points of view. Development to the fullest extent permissible, within the limits of consumptive use apportioned to the upper basin by the Colorado River Compact, will redound also to the benefit of the lower basin and to the Nation as a whole.

Finally, we believe that administration of the comprehensive development of the water resources of the Upper Colorado River Basin should, subject to regulations that will fully safeguard the Federal interest, be confided to the fullest practicable extent to the Upper Colorado River Commission. In its very nature and by its very location, the Upper Colorado River Commission would constitute a practicable means for decentralization of administration and for administration through an agency close to the people most affected.

There are enclosed the answers of the Upper Colorado River Commission to a series of questions posed by your commission. Time limitations are such as to compel us to ask your commission to refer to the text of this letter in those cases where we have found it impossible to elaborate the answers to particular questions.

Should you desire information or further details in connection with the subject matter, please feel free to call upon me. I shall be glad to respond to the fullest practicable extent to any inquiries which you may desire to make, or to meet with you at your convenience, in Washington or elsewhere, to the end of furnishing the fullest possible assistance.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN GEOFFREY WILL,
Secretary and General Counsel.

The Chickens Come Home To Roost

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the feeding of Russian communism with machinery, vehicles, ships, gasoline, petroleum and the potential weapons of war from May 15, 1945, as disclosed in December 1947, and continued deliveries to Russian communism thereafter, has aided Russia to force communism on Manchuria, China, and Korea. And I did not believe it made sense at that time, to spend millions and billions of dollars to halt the march of communism in western Europe and at the same time aid communism by shipping supplies to Russia. The chickens have now come home to roost, Russian communism having taken over Manchuria, China, and Korea, and on such shipments to Russia I am including a news item of that earlier date.

OUTRIGHT BAN ON SALES TO SOVIET ASKED—OHIO CONGRESSMAN MAY OFFER BILL TO HALT EXPORTS

WASHINGTON, December 6.—An outright embargo on all exports from the United States to Russia was proposed today by Representative ALVIN F. WEICHEL, Republican, Ohio, as "a last resort if necessary to stop supplying a potential enemy."

WEICHEL is chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee now investigating Soviet use of American-built ships.

"While the President now has the power, under export control laws, to curb the sending of supplies to Russia, he does not seem to be overanxious to use it," WEICHEL told a reporter.

Information obtained by the committee, WEICHEL said, shows exports of such supplies as farm equipment and industrial machinery continue to leave this country for Russia in large numbers.

MUST BE STOPPED

"Unless this is stopped and stopped quickly," he said, "I shall ask my committee to approve legislation that would prohibit any ship from leaving United States ports with supplies for Russia or Russian-dominated nations."

This can be done, WEICHEL said, simply by making it illegal for customs officials to issue the necessary clearance papers without which no ship can sail from an American port.

WEICHEL said he prefers a less drastic approach to the problem "but something must be done."

"It just doesn't make sense for us to spend millions and billions of dollars to halt the spread of communism in western Europe and at the same time aid communism by shipping supplies to Russia," he said.

VESSELS RENAMED

WEICHEL said a preliminary investigation disclosed numerous American-built vessels, many of them Government-owned and transferred to the Soviet under lend-lease, "are plying the seas under Russian names and under the Russian flag."

"These ships used to fly the American flag under such good old names as the Iowan, the Dakotan, the Texas, the Vermont, the Maine, the American Robin," he commented. "Now some of them are known as the Stalingrad, the Leningrad and the Vladivostok."

WEICHEL said there are indications that since the committee started an inquiry earlier this year into retention by Russia of an estimated 96 lend-lease ships, "some of the names have been changed again."

"The evident purpose of this," he said, "is to make it more difficult for us to trace them and eventually get them back."

True Liberalism—Spiritual Freedom—Political Liberties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, on September 7, 1950, the following address was delivered by the Most Reverend Bernard T. Sheil, D. D., auxiliary bishop of Chicago, at a dinner sponsored by the Polish Newspaper Guild. The banquet was held at the Sherman Hotel, Chicago, Ill., honoring Zygmunt Stefanowicz, newly elected president of the Polish-American Journalists Guild:

It is interesting and rewarding to compare the history of Poland with the history of civilization in the Western World. One sees in such a comparison a striking parallel—a history, as it were, of the career of the human spirit in its age-old struggle for dignity, happiness and freedom under God.

With moral, ethical, and historical validity, Poland has aptly been called The Key to Europe and The Bulwark of Civilization. For its fertile inland plains, drained by the Vistula, have been since the tenth century, a central setting for the majestic and sweeping drama of western civilization.

From the monumental defeat of the Teutonic Knights at Tannenberg in 1410, through the destruction of the Bolshevik hordes at the gates of Warsaw in 1920, and clear on to the gallant defense of the same key city against the Stalinists in 1945, the blood of Poland has proven to be the blood of western civilization—shed for the cause of sound territorial integrity—shed against the enemies of Christianity for the dignity of man.

As one of the most outstanding fortresses of Christian Europe, Poland has withstood the onslaughts of barbarian invaders for almost a thousand years. It survived battle after battle, partition after partition, and even now, in chains, the noble spirit of its people is restless for a renewed struggle to drive off the tyrant and return to the liberty and dignity of the Christian-Democratic tradition.

History has proven, and will prove again, that Polish nationality cannot be permanently enslaved. Polish nationality is strong with the strength of the Christian faith, strong with the simple love of family, strong with a quenchless devotion to a free and independent homeland. Poland and its people are vastly more vigorous in spirit than any alien government which may dominate it.

Consider, for example, the enormous and extraordinary intellectual vigor of the democratic Polish press which consistently sounds a note of accuracy and right reason in a profession where distortion and willful omission of the truth have occurred all too frequently.

Most symbolic of this superb journalistic integrity in the Polish press is Mr. Zygmunt J. Stefanowicz, who honors us with his presence here tonight.

Mr. Stefanowicz, who is presently the editor in chief of the Polish Roman Catholic Union's newspaper the Polish Nation, has been for many years a distinguished Christian apostle of the Polish press. His work in the cause of Polish freedom, under the banners of Christ, has been so impressive that both Pope Pius XI and XII have seen fit to confer on him exceedingly high honors.

He is your recently elected president of the Polish American Journalists' Guild and I feel it a distinct pleasure to greet him here this evening.

Because of this spirit, this irrepressible vigor, identified with Poland, the democratic Polish press and leaders like Mr. Stefanowicz, one feels called upon to say:

Poland, Christian Poland, cannot and will not perish from this earth.

Yet, why—why—one asks, almost in desperation—why this present enslavement of such a free, proud nation—an enslavement undeserved by a country which has kept its faith with God and with the nations of Christian Europe

It is a difficult question to answer. The answers, I would say, are both simple and complex.

We know that Poland occupies a strategic geographical position which disposes it to function as a buffer state in time of peace and a two-way avenue of invasion in time of war.

Therefore, the simple explanation of Poland's present status as a slave state would seem to be that Soviet Russia has been able to assert her total and nefarious power over Poland, absolutely without interference from the free countries of the world.

It is of moment for all of us to inquire into the possible reasons why the Soviet Union was permitted by her formerly influential allies to reduce a proud and independent nation to the lowly status of a vassal.

This brings us, of course, to an inevitable consideration of the decisions made at Yalta and Teheran.

It was at Yalta that the historically acceptable boundaries of Poland were cut to fit the Russian Bear. And it was at Teheran that the diplomatic tomb of the legitimate Government of Poland was irrevocably sealed.

The recent disclosures of the Alger Hiss trial impel us to inquire into the influences which secured the Hiss position as a virtual Red emissary at Yalta. These are conceivably the same fifth-column influences which have been quite as effective as Soviet arms in bringing our peace-thirsty world close to the interminable Sahara of a third world conflict.

Granting the fact of liberal influence in placing Alger Hiss and other traitors in positions of topflight executive advantage with regard to governmental affairs, I should like to pose a few questions. I should like to inquire tonight into the nature and background of what might be called the leftist liberal mind. For such is a mind and spirit which markedly contrasts—in its restlessness, in its meandering—with the simple, God-anchored spirit of say, the Polish patriot. I should like to inquire tonight as to the extent such a mind is culpable for the present plight of Poland and the free or formerly free nations of the world.

"From the wreckage of liberalism nothing can be saved but its values * * *."

This acute observation made several years ago by a noted European thinker, has for us, in this time of international darkness, an even more profound meaning.

Whence came the wreckage of liberalism?

Is the wreckage of South Korea the wreckage of liberalism? Is the Stockholm peace petition the death warrant of pro-Marxist thinking. Did liberalism fail on the Marshall mission to China? Is it failing now in the State Department as it has already failed in Alger Hiss?

In advancing an affirmative answer to these questions as I do now, we must keep in mind our failures in the field of foreign relations since 1945.

The wreckage of liberalism and the failure of the leftist liberals themselves, during the past decade, can be attributed in great measure to their tremendous infatuation with the Soviet idea of government and of life.

Because of this great capacity for self-delusion, I am not at all persuaded that there is much value to be salvaged from leftist liberalism, or, for that matter, from any kind of liberalism which is not anchored to absolute and eternal truth.

Is there such a thing as true liberalism? Yes.

It is the kind of liberalism—very hard to find these days—which would know profound sympathy for Christopher Dawson's analysis. "True liberalism," says Mr. Dawson, "combines the Christian ideal of spiritual freedom with the medieval tradition of political liberties." He sees the failure of liberals in the past century as a failure to take Christian ideals seriously and also notes their unwillingness to give expression to the weight and the truth of Christian tradition.

Instead, most liberals, found themselves saying, "Credo in hominem" "I believe in man" This, because they had no supernatural credo.

To be more particular, the leftist liberals have been naive enough to say: "We believe that 'People's Democracies' are actually people's democracies. We believe that Chinese communism is 'agrarian communism.' They have insisted that Joe Stalin means peace when he says peace, and democracy when he says democracy. They have gulped down the lie which insists that the Progressive Party is not influenced by the Communist line.

They believe in the common man and they believe in the slave masters of the Kremlin, which taken together is a contradiction and a belief in nothing.

Since 1932, any newsboy on the street corners of America could have told the liberals that they were the high-priority object of a world-wide seduction, conceived and engineered by the Kremlin.

But would they have believed such ordinary horse sense? Hardly.

The astonishing and pathetic truth of the matter is that the pro-Stalinists no longer know how to believe. For genuine belief in anything implies a standard of absolute truth—the truth of God's existence and authority, for example. I would dare to assert further that if a man does not believe in the perennial truths of the Christian tradition, he has not learned how to believe at all and is incapable of genuinely believing in anything.

Expressing it with even starker simplicity, one must set forth the concise truth of man's origin and destiny: man came from God as his creature and he will go back to God to be judged. Within that framework of supernatural law he is free—free to acquit himself as he will, but subject to the sanctions of divine law.

But the liberal mind, since the nineteenth century, has maintained that the only way man can be free is by getting rid of the framework.

"Be yourself," the liberals cried. "Get rid of stifling tradition, get rid of religious belief that is nothing more than ignorance and superstition. Assert your natural rights in business, love, politics."

"Religion is a private affair," said the liberals. "It has nothing to do with business and politics." "One religion is as good as another," they went on. "There is no such thing as a personal God," they insisted. "The universe is the creative result of blind chance."

Such were the dicta of the nineteenth and early twentieth century liberals—they, the progenitors of many of the rudderless liberals of our present day.

But why such an emphasis on personal freedom and emancipation from moral responsibility? Was it merely because Rousseau said so—Darwin, Nietzsche, and other philosophical golden calves of the liberal movement? Was it really genuine belief in the philosophers who deified man and obliterated God which prompted the liberals to locate man at the center of the universe in place of his Creator?

Yes.

Yet the liberals of the nineteenth century were not quite as intellectually fanatical as their high-sounding phrases would seem to indicate. This bruiting about of altruistic affirmations concerning the freedom of man was also concerned with something as crass and pragmatic as the almighty dollar.

We would indeed be the victims of extreme naïveté and even gross self-deception—those unfailing characteristics of the false liberal—if we were not to recognize that much of the nineteenth century liberalism was a brazen sublimation of the worst aspects of laissez faire capitalism. Nineteenth century liberalism might further be characterized as a defense of irresponsible free enterprise, cleverly instrumented by an intellectual attack on the principles of the one institution—the church—which has, over the centuries, constantly reminded man of his moral responsibility.

We know now that modern liberalism in its earlier phases was the intellectual justification of the bourgeois struggle for profit and for power. The noble words of a Gladstone or a Disraeli are hard to disassociate from Britain's cruel and ruthless exploitation of primitives in Asia and Africa. The brilliant anticlerical pronouncement of the Kulturkampf liberals in Bismarck's Germany are one with the Pan-O-German imperialism that was to plunge our world into its first tragic global war.

It was the late Mr. Harold Lasky, the British Socialist doctrinaire, who epitomized liberalism as "the byproduct of the effort of the middle classes to win their place in the sun."

The definition is both clever and astute, but could only be completely acceptable if it were reordered to read: "Liberalism is the byproduct of the irresponsible effort of the middle classes to win their place in the sun at the expense of the economic and moral welfare of all other classes."

If religion was allowed no voice in the national market place of the nineteenth century liberal, it is not difficult to understand why the twentieth century heirs of liberalism would give short shrift to supernatural values in the international market place of the atomic age.

The self-deception of the nineteenth century liberal—his sorry substitute for religion—was an almost ludicrous belief in the sanctity and power of laissez-faire capitalism.

In his liberal offspring of the twentieth century we have encountered this same self-spoofing with a scope that has been extended from the national scene to the international. This is so because the gullibility of the modern liberal is concerned with the validity and the mission of world-wide communism.

We have said that the earlier liberals tended to get the profit motive all tangled up with their high-sounding altruisms. And I do believe that an interesting accumulation of evidence might be gathered which would demonstrate that it has not been unprofitable for certain liberals to espouse, with or without sincerity, the cause and party line of Stalinism.

With what trepidation, during the past decade, have we watched the welcome mat being spread out for pro-Stalinist liberals in our universities, in Hollywood, in Washington. This, in the name of a democratic freedom which we may have seriously endangered by the excessive and unreasonable practice of tolerance.

Far too many of the leftist liberals have been faithful to democracy, only in their fashion—and it has been a very profitable fashion.

Yet, one would not desire the invocation of undemocratic methods of suppression in order to combat such folly as that of the Stalinist and the innocent but duped liberal. However, every American and every man of good will everywhere, can only be thankful for the presently implemented policy of "clear and present danger" with which, through the justice and order of the judiciary, we should be able to save ourselves from ourselves.

Consider the devious cleverness with which a good measure of the Stalinist line has been successfully practiced within our midst—largely through the influence of leftist liberals, professors were permitted to place the imprint of atheistic materialism on many wieldy young American minds. They have prepared all too many young intellects for eventual apostasy from the Christian and democratic tradition by filling their minds and hearts with the sweet songs of moral license and the alluring, yet spurious prophecies of positivism and pragmatism. Such ideas as:

"Live dangerously—pitch your tents on the slopes of Vesuvius"; "the Bible is a book of tribal myths"; "the Vatican is a stronghold of Fascist reaction," were poured into young minds, from which eventually could come only bitter fruit.

In a day of world peace—and God bring it to all free men soon—when there is greater detachment and leisure in which to review the blunders and blindness of the 1940's, it will be most interesting to study the textbooks of our country and attempt to detect therein certain influences, calculated or not, toward the acceptance of the Soviet idea.

I cite, for example, a quotation from a study of international politics published in 1944. The work was written by an outstanding scholar in the field of world politics, and indicates, I think, how Soviet hypocrisy has been able to dupe and deceive even men of honest intellectual accomplishment. Said the scholar, without, I believe, intention to deceive: "As between the risk of acting as if the Soviet Union will be a trustworthy partner in maintaining peace and the risk of acting as if it will not, the lesser risk is clearly that based on expectation of Soviet good faith. * * * If we assume faith in the motives and integrity of the Soviet Government, there is a good chance of agreement upon a common program of Soviet-Anglo-American leadership in peace as in war."

I am under the impression that the scholar who made this statement is devoid of sympathy for the Communist line. Yet one cannot help but wince when coming in contact with a mind—so typical of the liberal—which can advocate faith in the integrity of a gangster government whose motives are world domination and whose trustworthiness is comparable to that of a murderer stalking his victim in the blackness of the night.

I must insist again that this gullibility of the liberal rarely has a basis in supernatural truth, and it is all the more erratic, vague, and uncertain because it lacks the stability of traditional religion. Make no mistake about this: The appetite of certain liberals for Stalinism and the things of Stalinism is a perverted search for religious stability on the part of souls who have rejected perennial truth only to discover that the residual hunger within them drives them from one unsatisfactory political fashion to another.

The shocking effect of liberal influence on the State Department in Washington has been revealed to our people only within the past 2 years. It was clearly liberal influence which placed Alger Hiss—not to mention others—in vital and strategic foreign office work at Dumbarton Oaks, Yalta, and the Far Eastern Division of the State Department.

It was the influence of duped and deceived liberals which defended Hiss until he could no longer be defended, until the whole infamous story of his top-level, top-secret treason against the American people screamed from the newspapers and shattered the myth of liberal reliability in an age of Communist siege.

If the Hiss case smashed one panel of the rose-colored glasses with which so many liberals have looked on Soviet Russia for so long, the ruthless attack of the Reds upon South Korea shattered the remaining panel of roseate hue. Many of our fellow-traveling liberals are seeing the murderous monster of Red communism face to face for the first time. With remorseful cries they are stumbling back toward the Stars and Stripes, looking upon the face of Uncle Sam and finding him good.

May God help them all and restore in them the supernatural faith that alone can bring them peace and stability.

In the words of a medieval divine, glowing with truth, now as then, one can glean further understanding of the failure of the liberals and those they have seriously influenced in a groping, war-sick world. Said the medieval thinker: "Whatever the world thinks, he who hath not much meditated upon God may possibly make a thriving earthworm, but will most indubitably make a sorry patriot and a sorry statesman."

The present failure of the liberals to find a substitute for the true God whom they have rejected will be followed only by the dark night of bitterness and cynicism if the supernatural springs of the democratic idea are not rediscovered. At the roots of true democracy flow the deep, pure springs of God—the waters of refreshment available to all men of good will.

The true patriots of Poland, enslaved or in exile, have refreshed themselves at these waters for centuries. With the strength of the supernatural belief in the dignity of man, the arms of Poland were successful at Tannenberg and at the gates of Warsaw. It was the Christian dignity, not only of their own nation, but of all Europe which Poland preserved in their struggles with the barbarians from the east and the west.

The people of Poland had and still have things noble and enduring to defend—a way of life, based neither upon the sophisticated vagueness of the liberals, nor upon the bestial regimentation of the Marxists.

Poland, as a people and as a nation, will rise again because of its steadfast belief in the sweet democracy of Christ—the love of family and country, based securely on the love of God.

It is this regard for the sanctity of the human individual which has spread from Europe to our own America. This is the Christian tradition of civilization which has made our country great. It can make Europe itself great once again when Poland and all other free peoples have risen from their chains.

The recent words of General Anders—that brave and distinguished leader of free Poland in exile, express I believe, the heartfelt prayer of all true Polish patriots and lovers of freedom everywhere. Said General Anders: "And what do we want today? We want that law and justice reign in the world, that all nations live peacefully and freely in their lands, that Poland regains freedom and independence, that peace and God's blessing return to our country."

The world that General Anders envisions is the same free and abundant order of nations toward which men of good will have struggled since the beginning of time. With renewed hope and courage let us face the difficult days ahead, dedicated to the eternal proposition that all men must be given the free opportunity to live with decency and dignity as children of God.

The Yellow Oleo Threat in Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, out in the State of Michigan the citizens of the State will on November 7 determine whether or not the milk products industry, which is so vitally important to the economic and social welfare of the people, is to be substantially damaged through the substitution of oleo and its various products for animal fats in the form of butter. So many people in the State are concerned about the result of this determination that I wish to submit for the RECORD the following Fifteen Facts You Should Know About Keeping Michigan Prosperous, prepared by the Dairy Action League:

FIFTEEN FACTS YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT KEEPING MICHIGAN PROSPEROUS

1. On November 7, 1950, the people of Michigan will vote on a proposal which will determine whether Michigan shall continue to prohibit sale and manufacture of an imitation of butter known as yellow oleo.

2 If yellow oleo is permitted in Michigan, one of the greatest dairy States, it will open the door to a host of other substitutes for dairy products—oleo milk, oleo ice cream, and oleo cheese—which will at first damage and then ultimately destroy the prosperity of one of the largest industries in the State, dairying.

3. This is the real issue at the polls: Shall vegetable fats raised in the cotton South and in the soybean Midwest and West destroy our markets for animal fats produced in Michigan? A vote to bring yellow oleo into Michigan is the same as voting to move a large part of the automotive industry into the cotton South as far as the ultimate effect will be on prosperity and employment in Michigan.

4. Michigan has a tremendous stake in its more than 132,000 dairy farms. These dairy farms represent an investment of $2,375,000,000, which, together with 107 creameries and 620 other dairy products plants, is more than twice the assets of the Ford Motor Co. in the entire world. One in every six families in the State is dependent on the dairy business. Some 600,000 persons derive their income, in whole or in part, from dairying. One out of every four mouthfuls of food eaten by Michigan residents is dairy products. Our Michigan income from dairying in 1949, exclusive of meat sales, amounted to $185,000,000

5. Damage to dairying in Michigan would adversely affect the economic life of every person in the State, no matter what he or she was doing for a living.

6. For example, the automotive industry will suffer. Farmers own about 35 percent of all the trucks and are the heaviest buyers, as a group, of automobiles. If farm purchasing power is cut down, as it certainly will be if imitations of dairy products are substituted for dairy products on the Michigan markets, the automobile industry will be hard hit and many people will be thrown out of work. The same argument applies to every other line of business—food, clothing, building, amusements, hardware, etc. The men and women in the cities who make or sell the goods which the farmers buy have as much at stake in keeping imitations of dairy products out of the State as the men and women who milk the cows.

7. The dairy industry does not oppose in this campaign the use of white oleo or the coloring of it at home. In this case the housewife knows that she is buying oleo and is not paying for good butter and getting commercially colored yellow oleo instead.[1] The minute or two a week the housewife devotes to coloring oleo is not regarded by most women as any more of a chore than peeling apples or pitting cherries for a pie. If she must have oleo, and colors it herself, the housewife is helping to prevent serious damage to the economic welfare of Michigan which would come with commercially colored oleo. She is helping to keep a job for her husband, opportunity for her children, and protect the security of her home when she votes against commercially colored oleo.

8. On the other hand, when a pound of oleo is purchased to replace a pound of butter, Michigan agriculture loses 50 cents in buying power. Oleo is like the carnival business, the money taken in goes out of town, because the principal ingredients are grown in the cotton South or in the soybean States. Compared to other agriculture, the soybean crop in Michigan is so small it is not an economic factor.

9. Dairy products and the meat from dairy herds produce about 43 percent of the farm income of Michigan which last year amounted to $681,000,000. Twenty-seven percent of the dairy products of the State is butter. The dairy industry cannot exist without butter. Oleo, however, not only threatens butter but every other form of dairy products by imitation.

10. Imitations of dairy products in the State will mean fewer people on farms and fewer jobs in cities with more people after them. It will mean farm and city unemployment.

11. Yellow oleo means higher oleo prices. Although all Federal taxes have been eliminated and there has never been a State tax in Michigan, in States where yellow oleo has been permitted yellow oleo prices range to 55 cents a pound.

12. There is no substitute for dairying in the State of Michigan through which the people on farms can maintain a satisfactory standard of living.

13. To preserve dairying, those engaged in it are vigorously supporting a three-point program:

(a) Advertise the advantages of dairy products.

(b) Work toward constantly improving grade and pack.

(c) Maintain a legislative program which will keep the industry alive and on an even keel.

Elimination of any one of these points open the road to disaster.

14. Soil conservation is vital to the welfare of Michigan. By nature, dairying is a great processing operation. It converts the products of our soil into food for our people. Most of our crops are roughages—pasture, hay silage, and straw. These crops would be wasted unless used by livestock. No other animal equals the dairy cow in her efficiency and ability to convert these coarse farm feeds into human food. The dairy farmer is the only farmer in the world who can sell off a thousand dollars' worth of the produce of his land and still leave the soil in better condition than when he started. Imitations of dairy products threaten the rich pastures and green countrysides of Michigan, and would replace them with rapidly deteriorating, eroded, abandoned, nontaxpaying lands characteristic of cotton farming in the South.

15. We have the "No" vote on proposal IV on the ballot in the fall election. Only by the hardest kind of work and deep interest on the part of the men and women of the State can enough "No's" be obtained to win. It is hoped that you and your friends will actively support the program to keep Michigan prosperous by working and voting "No," to the question of bringing yellow oleo and other imitations of dairy products into the State.

[1] "Butterleggers" are now active in Michigan. Since the first of the year 23 persons have been convicted of publicly selling oleo and representing it to be butter. The head of the Federal Food and Drug Administration at Washington recently expressed his fear that many more unscrupulous people would be buying up oleo reserves and selling them to the public for butter now that the Federal regulatory taxes have been removed.

Scare Buying Is Vicious—Scare Selling Is Worse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES J. MURPHY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following article from the New York Times, September 6, 1950:

SCARE BUYING IS VICIOUS—SCARE SELLING IS WORSE

There is another side to war.

It's known as profiteering.

It's ugly, uglier by far, than that part of war in which men fight—and die.

It can lose a war right here—in the very shadow of the Empire State Building, after that war has been won on foreign soil.

Profiteering or chiseling or anything stronger you want to call it, can help the monstrous thing we seek to defeat, and destroy the very freedoms we seek to preserve.

Ever hear of "scare selling"?

We're experiencing this wartime cancer that is festering, doctored by apostles of greed.

We're experiencing it in all its vicious forms.

So is the rest of the building industry.

We don't like it.

And we're willing to call a spade a spade—publicly.

We don't like it because we know that in most instances the price increase can't be justified by any comparable rise in production costs. We know the escalator clause is dictated by nothing more than greed. We know that the price-on-delivery dictum is based on pure, selfish gain—chiseling opportunism at its worst.

We don't like it because there's real danger ahead.

We feel it's high time to put on the price brakes.

Otherwise we're going through that red light—and crash.

Mind you, we're not hitting at those suppliers who have been forced to boost prices because their costs have gone up legitimately. We are concerned with those selfish interests who, for example, add 10 percent to the price of their material—5 percent of which is justified, the other 5, plain avarice.

We say this is the road to inflation, the road to economic disaster. We say this is the quick and sure way to the kind of controls that will hold us like a vise, and from which we never will ease out. And when and if that happens, we will have lost—lost everything, regardless of the battlefield victories.

For the unfortunate truth is, we're in the middle. If we succeed militarily, we can be beaten in still another way—by the undermining of our economic structure.

Our enemies don't care which way they win.

Yes, and there is this to ponder. The economic war can be won by the enemy only if we ourselves help him to win.

As builders, with $125,000,000 of construction behind us, we think we know a little about building costs. If these costs keep spiralling, we are laying the foundation for the kind of economic structure that is bound to topple, and bury us all, deep.

We're currently building apartments, at an investment of $16,000,000, to house 5,000 people. They are the talk of the town.

Why? Because these apartments are offered at rents people can afford to pay.

What will happen to this kind of building if war profiteering and chiseling continues?

We know this: You can't contract to deliver a house, or anything else, a year from today at a firm and fixed price, and produce it on the basis of paying for materials prices that prevail on the day of delivery.

We'd like to keep on building, and so would our subcontractors—our plumbers, painters, carpenters, masons, plasterers, electricians, et al.—building at the lowest possible cost by using every ounce of construction know-how, ingenuity, and resourcefulness we possess.

Let's put on the price brakes—now.

Let those who now profiteer use their managerial skill and ingenuity instead. Their profit will be greater not only in dollars, but in national welfare.

Profiteering is not fair to the contractors who build, to the subcontractors who do their work, to the men, women, and children who need housing.

Profiteering is not fair to the men who fight—and die, so that all of us can continue to live in freedom.

Profiteering is not fair to a United States.

Bureau of Community Development of Wisconsin University

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 13 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared on the subject of the inspiring work of the bureau of community development of the University of Wisconsin. I ask that this statement and appended materials be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. WILEY'S statement and the matters referred to by him were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WISCONSIN UNIVERSITY BUREAU SETS PACE IN COMMUNITY PLANNING

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, one of the finest jobs to my way of thinking that is being done by any unit in any State university is that being performed by the bureau of community development of the great University of Wisconsin. This bureau has for its purpose the mobilizing of research and other facilities to assist local communities throughout the Badger State in adjusting to changing social and economic conditions.

I feel that if there were similar bureaus in other State universities and in private colleges and educational institutions, the needs of the respective States would be that much more easily met. I feel that these bureaus could be a tremendous help in the adjustment of the respective States and in their increasing self-reliance rather than becoming exclusively dependent upon Washington because of inability to change with changing times. We all recognize, of course, that Uncle Sam must cooperate with the States and localities, but we want them to meet their own obligations insofar as possible by their own efforts.

I have in my hand the latest issue of the fine university magazine, Community Development Service. This particular issue is devoted to regional development in the upper Wisconsin River Valley. I think that the work being done in that particular region—the story of how community leaders have come together under university leadership to plan the problems of population, industry, education, health, uses of raw materials, encouragement of tourist travel, and so forth—I believe that this story will be of tremendous interest as a sort of case history of what can be done when local leaders set their minds to the task.

There follows thereafter four materials:

(a) A statement of the work of the bureau of community development itself.

(b) A description of the work being done in the upper Wisconsin River Valley.

(c) A schedule of local meetings in that region.

(d) A list of the local leaders participating in it.

BUREAU OF COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

The object of the bureau is to further a better understanding of the social and economic resources of Wisconsin; to make readily available to the people of the State the university's knowledge, experience, and researches in the handling of social and economic problems; to stimulate interest in citizenship and good government; to collect and organize material relating to community development; and to assist local communities in meeting social and economic adjustments.

The functions of the bureau are:

1. To provide individuals, groups, and communities of the State with counsel, information, and services in its field, in cooperation with other organized agencies, public and private; to assist local school authorities and county citizenship committees in the arrangement and conduct of their programs for citizenship training and induction of new voters. Such information and services are extended only when there is a definite request.

2. To organize and conduct community, regional, and State-wide institutes, seminars, and short courses for business, industrial or civic leaders—such as seminars on industrial management problems; merchants' seminars on trade area, merchandising, and management problems; leadership institutes on community development. Such educational programs are arranged only on request, and based on what the applicants themselves, or their selected committees, suggest.

3. To collect, organize, and publish data relative to the social and economic resources of the State, in cooperation with the school of commerce, the department of economics, sociology, and political science, and other departments and divisions of the university, and with governmental departments. Such information is made available to the schools and local business and civic leaders of the State when they request it. (Requests for technical information on business and industrial matters should be sent to the bureau of business information.)

A GUIDEPOST—VALLEY VIEWPOINTS ON REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Is the upper Wisconsin River Valley a region? What are our regional problems? Should we be working out more of our area-wide problems on a cooperative basis? Would a regional development program be of value to the upper Wisconsin River Valley? If it would be of value, how should it be organized?

In order to get answers to these questions, leaders from the area met in a community development conference in Merrill in April 1950. Representatives came from Vilas, Oneida, Forest, Taylor, Lincoln, Langlade, Marathon, Wood, and Portage Counties. They listened to what other parts of the country were doing. They discussed regional effort already under way in the valley. They decided that a regional development program would do much to strengthen the life of the valley.

To get things rolling a temporary committee was elected to lay plans for a regional organization and set possible goals for consideration at a subsequent regional meeting. This bulletin grew out of the work of this temporary committee. It will serve as a guide in getting a regional development program started.

At the invitation of President W. C. Hansen of the Teachers College, the temporary committee met in Stevens Point. There was unanimous agreement that the regional development program should be formulated as close to the community level as possible. To this end, a series of county-wide meetings should be arranged between September 10 and 21, 1950. The general outline of these meetings will be the same for each meeting. Local community leaders in each county will prepare a list of regional goals and suggest the type of organization which they think necessary to do the regional development job. By the middle of October the results of these eight community meetings will be pooled at a regional conference. This conference will complete the organization of the regional development program. This regional conference is tentatively planned for October 20, 1950.

At the April conference in Merrill, Norman Bitterman told of the accomplishments of his regional organization, Southern Illinois, Inc. This organization has been active for almost 30 years in strengthening agriculture, recreation, education, and industry of southern Illinois. A digest of his account is here presented. While the needs of the upper Wisconsin River Valley are different from those of southern Illinois, the basic principles of regional development are much the same, and a consideration of them may be helpful to this area. There is no question but what the leadership of the valley can profit from the experience of any such area development project.

At the county meetings in September, the first job will be to get down on paper lists of specific needs in the upper Wisconsin River Valley. Problems of regional importance will be our first concern. To start the thinking on this subject several ideas are listed in the final section of this bulletin.

Valley leaders should be thinking about the type of organization best suited to work on a regional level. Again, the suggestions made at the county meetings will be helpful.

As soon as the permanent valley organization is formed and a basic list of regional goals agreed upon, action committees will be organized.

The upper Wisconsin River Valley has already gone a long way in regional development work. Here are just a few of many illustrations:

1. Wisconsin Valley Librarians: Regional organization of librarians.

2. Trees for Tomorrow: Better forest management program cooperatively sponsored by the paper companies.

3. Wisconsin Public Service Corp.: Electric utility serving this region.

4. Stevens Point Teachers College: Teacher training for the valley.

5. Wisconsin Valley Improvement Co.: Power development and flood control on the river by a joint effort of the paper and power companies.

6. North Central Labor Body: Organized labor in more than eight larger communities.

7. Wisconsin Valley Mayors and Chamber of Commerce Managers Association: Cooperative study of common problems.

8. Wisconsin Valley Schoolmen's Association: Cooperative study and action on common problems.

9. University of Wisconsin Extension Center, Wausau: Liberal arts and preprofessional education for the valley.

10. Wisconsin Valley athletic leagues.

These organizations were selected to illustrate the wide variety of regional development activities already under way. They point to the fact that there is now a strong recognized need for regional cooperation. We are thinking about enlarging this effort so that all of the resources of the valley can be brought to bear on specific regional goals that are agreed upon by everyone. This plan has worked effectively in other areas of the United States; it can work well in the valley if the people are ready to make the effort.

A REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM FOR THE UPPER WISCONSIN RIVER VALLEY

COUNTY-LEVEL PLANNING MEETING

8-8:10: What is our job? Statement of objectives.

8:10-8:20: Regional development possibilities. What organizations are already active on the regional basis? How far have we come already?

8:20-8:40: Basic regional problems in the upper Wisconsin River Valley. Informative talk built around colored-slide series. This is just to start the thinking on a regional basis.

8:40 9: What are our regional needs? Panel discussion by representative group from the county. Can we handle the problems suggested in the preceding section better through a regional organization or through our own community? What are some of the other basic regional needs not listed earlier?

9-9:10: Intermission.

9:10-9:30: What should be the specific goals of a regional development organization? The proposals made at this meeting will be pooled with those made at seven other county meetings in the valley; next month at the regional workshop they will become a part of the program of the regional development organization. Discussion led by Bureau of Community Development staff.

9:30-9:50: What should be the form of a regional development organization? The results of this session will be used at the regional workshop next month at which time it is expected that a permanent organization will be formed. Discussion led by Bureau of Community Development staff.

9.50-10: Summary.

Tentative schedule of county meetings

Date	County served	Meeting location
Sept. 12, 1950	Oneida	Rhinelander.
Sept. 13, 1950	Portage	Stevens Point.
Sept. 14, 1950	Lincoln	Merrill.
Sept. 15, 1950	Taylor	Medford.
Sept. 18, 1950	Wood	Wisconsin Rapids.
Sept. 19, 1950	Langlade	Antigo.
Sept. 20, 1950	Marathon	Wausau.
Sept. 21, 1950	Vilas-Forest	Eagle River.

A Discharged Soldier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES B. HARE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Harry F. Davis, of Newberry, S. C.:

A DISCHARGED SOLDIER

Friends, I'm a discharged soldier
Back from across the seas,
I have a story to tell you
If you'll listen to me.
You see me maimed and crippled,
I got it all over there.
After you have heard my story
I'll ask if fate dealt me fair.

Before the war of '40 I was happy,
Living a quiet but simple life,
Blessed with a good job and home,
Two blue-eyed babes and wife.
Health was another treasure
We held in our small store.
Sickness and death seemed far away,
A stranger we did not know.

We were living in a small village,
Wife, babies and me,
Never thinking of parting,
Happy as happy could be.
Then came the call to arms,
I wanted to volunteer,
But it was so hard to leave my home
And the ones I loved so dear.

Yes, I was in the trenches,
I've been covered with muck and mud,
Frozen by the drenching rain,
Spattered with human blood.
I have hiked in the rain all day;
Night found me tired and spent,
No place but a shell hole to sleep in,
Not even a blanket or tent.

Yes, I was in three battles,
Their blazing, raging hells,
Singing and whining bullets,
And horrible bursting shells.
The shrieks of the mortally wounded
And cries of the thousands of dying men,
The crash of steel on helmets
Was awfully mixed in the din.

At last I came over seas
And was bound for my home town,
Expecting to meet my loved ones,
But what a change I found!
No one was there to meet me—
The house stood silent, alone.
There doors were all wide open,
The inmates, they were gone.

I asked the gray old parson,
He pointed beyond the blue hill
Where stood the tall church steeple—
Oh, God! My heart stood still.
Slowly I went to the churchyard
And found three mounds side by side,
Two the graves of my babies,
The other Ruth, my bride.

Friends, that's the wages of war—
Death and a broken heart.

California Faces the Facts of Civilian Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, in civilian and industrial defense, California again shows the way to the Nation under the able leadership of Gov. Earl Warren.

The problems of defense for the State of California with its vulnerability to coastal attack and for its great cities with their magnificent industrial potential are formidable. But the people of California under the guidance of capable public officials, both State and local, have faced their problems and taken positive action to build adequate defense.

Not only has California established a Defense Security Corps which serves as a standby organization to serve at home in place of the National Guard, but State-wide moves have been made by California's local governments to help the Federal Bureau of Investigation uncover Communists. Chief among these was the recent ordinance adopted by the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors requiring registration of Communists and Communist sympathizers and providing heavy penalties for violation of this law.

There is no sign of complacency in California, and the following article by Kimmis Hendrick, of the Christian Science Monitor, emphasizes the example California has set for the Nation during the present international crisis.

STATE OF THE NATION—CALIFORNIA FACES THE FACTS

(By Kimmis Hendrick)

LOS ANGELES.—It is encouraging to be able to report that California is considerably prepared in the field of civilian and industrial defense. It is even more encouraging to be able to report an evident determination to avoid complacency.

No Californian enjoys the vulnerability to attack of his State's coastal position. This vulnerability is accented by the vital role of the great shipping, oil production, and aircraft manufacture facilities. But no Californian—or anyone anywhere who is concerned for Californians—need overlook certain facts of strength.

One is that the State has retained most of its war powers. And for 5 years it has maintained a State Disaster Council, safeguarding the civil defense know-how acquired in World War II.

Last year the legislature established a California Defense and Security Corps. This gives the State a standby organization to serve at home in place of the National Guard.

Governor Earl Warren has just called a special session of the legislature for September 20 to consider urgent problems relating to the State's school construction program, civilian defense measures, and social service legislation. Of the second, the Governor says that he considers the danger of sabotage one of the greatest confronting California, and he will ask the legislature to strengthen California's Sabotage Prevention Act.

He believes this needs to be done because the present law covers any period when the Nation is at war. A technical dispute over the country's status, say as of now, might keep the law from being applied.

There are other examples of forethought. The State has moved quickly to facilitate cooperative civil defense liaison among the cities and counties; also cooperation between California and other States. These are, as the governor stresses, nonhysterical efforts.

Los Angeles has a number of assets as the West's biggest city. One is its spread-outness. To bomb Los Angeles' 450 square miles effectively would be a big assignment for any enemy. Here is a city with more than 20 major shopping centers. Its city limit signs are so far removed from city hall that jocular visitors to Alaska, Hawaii, and the South Pole like to report they have seen them there.

Of great value is the fact pointed up by Samuel B. Morris, general manager of the city's department of water and power, in a communication to Mayor Fletcher Bowron, that Los Angeles has adequate water and electric power supplies. It also has the substantial reserve of skilled and unskilled manpower essential to industrial vitality.

Los Angeles Harbor has been called one of the best protected in the country.

In State-wide moves to help the Federal Bureau of Investigation uncover Communists, and in such laws as those passed by Los Angeles County to keep Communists out of civil defense, there is no sign of complacency.

At the same time, it seems as though Californians are becoming more balanced in their appraisal of communism than they were before Korea illuminated the issue. There seems to be less thoughtless confusing of American liberalism with Moscow-spread communism.

Whether California has yet the biggest of all defenses—a conviction of the spiritual roots, power, and universal promise of democracy as America conceives it—nobody can say. Only the apathetic liberal or the dogged isolationist would want to be dogmatic at this juncture. It seems plain here that all Americans will have to do much more than they have already done to offer mankind the alternate of real freedom for Russia's cynical and desperate substitute.

Governor Warren puts this big challenge in these words: "In all the travail of the moment we dare not take our eyes from the horizon upon which we have set our sights. Force of arms may be necessary—even increasingly so—to defend democracy from its enemies in the Kremlin and elsewhere.

"But the force of arms will never be the means of spreading the blessings of democracy to the peoples of the world who have never known them. This must be done through the slow and unspectacular process of making democracy work right in our own home towns, our State, our Nation, and any place else where it still has a chance to breathe."

News of the War Hasn't Yet Reached Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN PHILLIPS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "News of the War Hasn't Yet Reached Washington," published in the Riverside (Calif.) Press-Enterprise September 8, 1950. This reflects a wide area of public opinion, as evidenced by the comments of many Members who were in their home districts for the brief recess last week. I concur in the opinions expressed by the writer of the editorial.

NEWS OF THE WAR HASN'T YET REACHED WASHINGTON

Washington has lagged behind the rest of the country in accepting the seriousness of our situation. And there's no better example of this than the so-called war-tax bill which is working its way out of Congress. It falls short of being a half-way measure.

Our Canadian neighbors, whom we don't watch closely enough, are intent on working out a tax program which will wholly meet the cost of their war effort. They're making an effort which is proportionally as expensive as ours; and they're going to pay the bill. As a consequence, they won't have too many worries about inflation, and they can probably forget about price and wage controls.

But look at our war tax. The $4,500,000,000 it will raise won't pay a third of our added costs. It doesn't have any bite. It increases individual withholdings an average of 3 percent, not enough to change any personal habits. And a continuance of normal buying habits puts us on the road to inflation, wage and price controls, ration books, and a soaring national debt.

We need a tax bill that hurts, a bill that forces us to do without things that we want. That's the only way to meet the cost of a war. And the country, whether or not Washington realizes it, is ready and willing to pay the cost.

The Washington attitude has been clearly indicated in the failure of the administration and Congress to take any steps to trim peacetime expenses. The Korean explosion should have led to a complete review of the Nation's nonmilitary budget, a trimming of nonessentials and a deferring of new projects. Some few Congressmen have urged this; but the prevailing sentiment has been for government as usual. If there's to be any belt tightening, it's not to be in Washington.

The domestic spending of the Federal Government (leaving out all expenses relating to past, present, or future wars) has increased more than 100 percent from the 1948 to the 1951 budgets.

Certainly in January, after Congress has had a chance to absorb the sentiments of the people back home, we can expect our Government to be put on a wartime basis. We can expect a real tax bill and some trimming of nonmilitary spending.

Or, we hope we can.

Borrowed Ships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. MURPHY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD the following article from the New York Journal-American, Friday, September 8, 1950:

BORROWED SHIPS

The American Government, under the pressure of the Korean emergency, has been compelled to borrow foreign ships in order to get vital military supplies to our hard-pressed fighting forces.

Ironically, with the single exception of 1 vessel, all of the first 13 ships of foreign registry chartered for this purpose were built in American shipyards and had been either loaned or given to foreign operators.

This desperate and humiliating measure graphically illustrates the shocking decline and virtual disintegration of the American merchant marine and associated maritime industries since the Pacific war.

The United States emerged from that conflict just 5 years ago as the greatest maritime power in history.

But in those 5 years there has been an almost total cessation of ship construction in the United States.

During the same period, hundreds of American ships have been given outright to other countries or loaned to them with neither promise nor expectation of repayment.

Other hundreds of America's once-powerful fleet of merchant ships have been left idle in the so-called moth-ball fleets in our coastal backwaters, the virtual graveyards of American maritime hopes and opportunities.

Consequently, now that we are suddenly involved in an unexpected and unprovoked war, we have a depleted and obsolete maritime establishment, entirely inadequate for our own critical needs.

But this is only part of the whole appalling story of American neglect and incompetence in the vital matter of maritime policy.

We have not only let our shipyards fall into disuse and decay, while giving away or mothballing most of the ships we built at such great cost during the last war, but we have made it almost impossible for American shipping operations to be conducted successfully or profitably with the few vessels remaining to them.

Unbelievable as it may seem, with the Korean war many weeks old, we are not deviating from that disastrous policy.

At this very moment, with thousands of Americans already dead and maimed in Korea, there is actually a proposed bill in Congress to make the devastation of the American merchant marine complete.

This bill would permit foreign ships to engage in American coastwise and intercoastal trade.

It would eliminate all subsidies to American shipping, thus delivering all world commerce into the hands of cheap labor and even slave-labor foreign operators.

It would repeal the existing law requiring the shipment of at least half of all Marshall plan goods in American ships.

Finally, it would still further deplete our diminishing and vanishing American maritime resources by pledging the immediate gift of 100 more tankers and cargo vessels to our foreign competitors.

This legislation, which remains actively before Congress despite the war in Korea, has been deliberately proposed by agencies of the American Government, although it would greatly and gravely weaken America militarily and economically in a manner that our worst enemies must view with some amazement.

Strong Republican Party Called Essential Need in War Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an article by Mark Sullivan which appears in today's New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this article is very timely, coming as it does before this fall's election. As Mr. Gabrielson has said, "The Republicans will support the war effort to the hilt, but policies and actions preceding the war will be reviewed completely." The Republicans have every right to insist on having the facts brought before the American people, and the Democratic administration will have to defend their position. My prediction is that the people are going to demand a change, as they want to know "where they are going."

MARK SULLIVAN SAYS OPPOSITION IN CONGRESS COULD TAKE SOME RESPONSIBILITY FROM TRUMAN

(By Mark Sullivan)

After Chamberlain had appeased Hitler at Munich, after he had assured the British people that this meant "peace in our time," after the assurance had turned out to be wrong and appeasement had brought war, after Chamberlain had been dropped from power and Winston Churchill substituted—after that, Churchill, now having responsibility and seeking to get unity of his people, said, in effect, "If we quarrel about the past, we shall lose the future."

The United States today would be greatly served if that could be duplicated here—if there were someone in a position to make Churchill's plea for national unity. But while we have the same need that Churchill had, our situation is otherwise reversed.

Churchill could ask his people to ignore the past and look to the future, because the government system of Britain makes it possible to separate the past from the future. Britain does not have national elections at stated intervals, like our biennial and quadrennial ones. In the British usage, if the party or leader in power has made mistakes or otherwise incurred disapproval, and if this is made apparent by a vote in the House of Commons, a general election is held throughout the country. Thus a party in power is retired and a new government takes over with a clean slate. (Sometimes change of leadership is brought about within the party in power. This was the case of Chamberlain and Churchill. Or change may be brought by a coalition of parties within the House of Commons.)

PAST AND FUTURE UNITED

With us today, the past and the future are united in the Truman administration. It has been in power for more than 5 years, and has been responsible for the country's policies and actions during the development of the condition that now exists. That there have been serious mistakes in the administration's course goes without saying. But under our system Mr. Truman will remain in power for more than 2 years, until January 1953; his administration will have the power to decide and carry out whatever is done about the condition in the creating of which the administration itself had a part.

By analogy to Britain, it is as if Chamberlain, after making the mistake of appeasing Hitler, had continued in power during the period when Britain had to deal with the consequences of that mistake. It is not likely that if Chamberlain had continued in power Britain could have had the confidence and spirit it acquired by the substitution of Churchill.

Without doubt the Truman administration would be glad to have the benefit of Churchill's aphorism, would like to have the country ignore the past. In effect this is said by spokesmen of the President's party, or the portion of it that upholds him. In the congressional campaign now under way, criticism of the administration by Republicans is denounced as impeding our war effort. The implications of this attitude would go far. Because Mr. Truman was in office when war broke out, he would be given a broad sanctity, and immunity from criticism not only about policies and actions that had a part in the coming of war, but immunity from criticism about the conduct of the war.

The position of the Republicans in the congressional campaign has been made explicit and authoritative. It is set down plainly in a formal statement by the Republican Members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and further set down in a parallel statement by Republican National Chairman Gabrielson. The Republicans make a clear separation of the past from the present and future. As put by Mr. Gabrielson, the Republicans will support the war effort "to the hilt," but policies and actions preceding the war will be "reviewed completely."

REPUBLICAN POSITION CLEAR

To the same effect of clear separation between the past and the future, the statement of the Republican Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is equally explicit and includes a solemn promise: "On the basis of honest recognition of past errors and courageous resolve for the future, we wholeheartedly pledge our unpartisan cooperation to final victory."

That pledge on behalf of the opposition party is assurance to the country and ought to be welcome to President Truman. For a large part of the tragedy that both Mr. Truman and the country face is inherent in the President's position. The future steps he can take in the conduct of the war and of foreign relations are in some cases determined or limited by commitments implied in past steps the administration has taken, some of them mistakes. He would be to some degree released from his imprisonment to the past by the existence of a strong Republican Party in Congress cooperating with him. This would take responsibility for steps which need to be taken but which Mr. Truman, if he had sole or predominant responsibility, would find difficult or embarrassing to take

The Right To Know

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. RHODES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein an editorial from the New Era, A. F. of L. weekly newspaper, published in Reading, Pa.

THE RIGHT TO KNOW

One of the greatest censorship jobs ever put over on the American public by the daily press has just been completed.

Except for a few outstanding examples, this indictment takes in every reputable daily newspaper in the United States. It is their self-imposed indictment. It is their own product, the result of preconceived planning to ignore or hide as best as possible the House of Representatives' investigation of Fascist lobbying in the United States, lobbying done with the aid and support of the Nation's biggest and best-heeled corporations.

We do not blame the 100 or more Republicans in the House of Representatives for defending men like Dr. Ed Rumely, executive secretary of the pro-Fascist Committee for Constitutional Government, or Joe Kamp, head of the Constitutional Educational League, or Mervin K. Hart, one of the most vicious anti-Semites living in America today. Dr. Rumely is a former convict, having been found guilty by a jury for dealing with the German enemy during World War I. Joe Kamp is in jail today, guilty of contempt of Congress.

We say we do not blame the Republicans in the House for defending these men because Dr. Rumely and Joe Kamp disseminate the vicious, antilabor, antisocial security, anti-Fair Deal, anti-minimum-wage law propaganda which is part and parcel of the Republican philosophy.

We do blame the daily press, however, for playing the Republican game and refusing to tell the public about the many Dr. Rumelys and the many Joe Kamps who are a great threat to America today. The Commies are vicious enough, but they can easily be detected by checking their ideas against the current Commie line from Moscow.

The native Fascists like Joe Kamp and Dr. Rumely, however, hide behind the American flag. They say they are defending the Constitution, yet they try to make fools out of Members of the House of Representatives who are investigating lobbies. They figuratively spit in the face of Congress by refusing to answer questions and by refusing to produce records showing where their tainted money comes from.

The House has cited Joe Kamp and Dr. Rumely for contempt. This is as it should be. The sad commentary, however, is that so many Republicans defended these Fascist traitors to democracy. And equally tragic was the virtual blanket of censorship which the daily press imposed on this important action.

Some time ago 54 alleged Commies and Commie sympathizers rapidly were cited for contempt by the House with only one Member arguing that this was a violation of their civil rights. The House then acted on the theory that no individual is bigger than the Congress of the United States. The press gave big headlines.

The same issue was at stake in the Rumely and Kamp proceedings. Only this time Rumely and Kamp found many friends who defended them for doing exactly what the Communists did. The Republicans cooked up all kinds of excuses to save their Fascist friends.

The reason must be obvious: The reactionary Republicans in the House of Representatives who defended Rumely and Kamp get their campaign funds, their spending money, from the same corporations and big-money interests as do Rumely and Kamp. Ironically, the Republicans also voted against contempt citation for William Patterson of the Red civil right congress, simply to be consistent with their stand on Rumely and Kamp.

We feel that this lobby investigation must be continued until the real voices behind the Republican puppets are brought to light. Names of the big contributors to Committee for Constitutional Government and Constitutional Education League must be made public.

Another Benton Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 13 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, Washington columnist Marquis Childs has written an article about the good, solid work which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] has been doing on behalf of small, independent businessmen in his State of Connecticut. Mr. Childs' article appeared in the Washington Post of September 12, 1950.

I call attention to the article because it was my pleasure to attend the first pilot model clinic started at Bridgeport in my capacity as chairman of the Senate's Select Committee on Small Business, a committee I might add in which the Senator from Connecticut played an outstanding part in the formulation of policies to help small, independent businessmen not only in his home State of Connecticut but indeed throughout the Nation.

The Senator started the first clinic at Bridgeport, Conn., as the outgrowth of an idea we both advanced during a hearing. The response was so enthusiastic that the idea spread throughout the Nation with Members of Congress on both sides of the aisle endorsing the project wholeheartedly. The Senator from Connecticut has provided admirable leadership in this area of business, based on his understanding of the problems confronting business and industry, and, in large part, I believe that much of his drive and sincerity here stem from his work with the Committee on Economic Development, a nonprofit organization which during the war numbered 70,000 businessmen in thousands of communities throughout the United States. He was the original vice chairman of the Committee for Economic Development, as ECA Director Paul Hoffman was the original chairman.

This piece by Childs gives the Senator from Connecticut the credit he deserves, and for that reason I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLINICS FOR PROCUREMENT

(By Marquis Childs)

ANOTHER BENTON PLAN

With Congress racing to get out of Washington, a great many minds are fixed on one thing—the harsh necessity of getting reelected. But clearing the first hurdle, which is to get back home, may prove to be the easiest step of all.

In this strange season of half-war and half-peace (if that's what it is called) the ordinary campaign appeals are likely to have little weight. The word comes back that the voter is distracted and depressed. He's not thinking much about elections and when he does it's with a feeling that maybe the "outs" wouldn't be any worse than the "ins."

The best way to campaign is not to seem to campaign—the nonpolitical approach. That may be one reason why an innovation introduced by a newcomer to politics, Senator WILLIAM BENTON, of Connecticut, has caught on so quickly.

This is the small-business clinic.

BENTON, who has made several fortunes in the course of an extremely active career, was one of the founders and moving spirits of the Committee for Economic Development, the organization of forward-looking business executives who have exerted an influence on the economy far out of proportion to their numbers.

In the Senate as a member of the Small Business Committee, BENTON has continued this interest. There are many small manufacturers in Connecticut and their letters made BENTON aware of the difficulties small business has in dealing with the Federal Government. Big business can afford the overhead of a Washington representative who can hunt his way through the labyrinth of big Government. But this is beyond small business.

BENTON initiated the first small-business clinic at the manufacturing center of Bridgeport. Key officials from various Government departments were present. Each official came prepared to spell out what the small manufacturer should do to get contracts under the swiftly expanding program of defense production.

Many of the industrialists accepted the invitation in a skeptical frame of mind. They expected to get what they often refer to scornfully as "the Washington runaround." They were agreeably surprised by the brass-tacks talks they heard. Senator BENTON had made it clear at the outset that he wanted no political question since the goal was a practical one to aid the small manufacturer.

Later the clinics were set up for New Haven and Hartford, sponsored by the chambers of commerce in those cities. In his letter of invitation, BENTON said:

"The Korean situation stresses the critical nature of the problem in terms of procurement, industrial mobilization, and dispersal of contract awards. This problem was not foreseen in the planning stage of the pilot clinic at Bridgeport, and I shall devote more time to it. Frankly, this clinic stems from the enthusiastic response to the Bridgeport affair."

At the later clinics officials of the Departments of Defense, Commerce, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the General Services Administration gave even more detailed information on how and where smaller business firms could bid for Government business. The only politics, and this was not directly related to office seeking, was BENTON'S preliminary talk stressing his conviction of the need for real competition in the private enterprise system and of his desire to help small business provide that competition.

Both Republicans and Democrats have now taken up the small-business clinic idea. They have been held or are scheduled for cities literally from Maine to California. Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH sponsored a clinic in Augusta, Maine, and Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND in San Francisco. Both are Republicans.

Told of the spread of these clinics, a veteran politician expressed the skepticism of his trade, doubting that they would get the sponsors any votes in November. If they do not mean actual votes in the ballot box, they certainly mean good will. And they may also mean more defense production and a healthier economy less likely to be dominated by monopoly, which is good for the country regardless of party.

Collin County, Tex., Welcomes Speaker Sam Rayburn

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Labor Day, Monday, September 4, 1950, the McKinney Daily Courier-Gazette, published in McKinney, Tex., carried a front-page editorial addressed to the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives.

Under the title "The Editor Speaks," the editor-in-chief, L. L. (Pete) Perkins, Sr., welcomed Speaker RAYBURN to Collin County and paid our colleague and leader one of the highest tributes possible. The editorial was inspired by the visit of Speaker RAYBURN to Collin County to attend the first anniversary of the establishment of a model soil conservation farm at Princeton, nearby.

We know—

The editor wrote—

that you are glad to be back among the folks that for the past many years have loved and respected you, not for just the things you have done for your district, but for what you have done for America and the world.

Under unanimous consent I insert the editorial in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point:

THE EDITOR SPEAKS

Mr. Speaker, to say "Welcome to Collin County" would be putting it very mildly in our way of thinking. We know that you are glad to be back among the folks that for the past many years have loved and respected you, not for just the things that you have done for your district, but for what you have done for America and the world. Throughout your life you have rubbed shoulders with the biggest and the mightiest, but you have never forgotten the folks back home in your thoughts.

These editors have seen times when things looked awfully blue and then you would step in and through sincere efforts, thoughts and constructive work, would help us. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have learned to lean on you very much, we seem to think that you can do the impossible, and the truth about it, you have many times.

Mr. Speaker, in your district you might not get every vote, but it would be our guess that you have the respect of every citizen. People recognize leadership, ability and sincere efforts, and if we might do a little Texas bragging, Mr. Speaker, we would say that not in the history of this glorious country has there ever been a man that has or will equal your worth-while accomplishments.

Every American knows that this is a troubled world and we know that we have true American leadership in you. It is with real sincerity that we pray that you may be able to give many more years of service to these United States and the world.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, welcome to Collin County.

Comparison of Voting Records

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in the September 1 issue of the Wisconsin CIO News an effort is made to discredit the voting record of certain Republican Members of this House from Wisconsin by comparing their votes on a few selected roll calls with the vote cast by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]. The direct inference is drawn that the votes of the gentleman from New York represents the Communist Party line position. It is not my purpose to argue the question of whether or not the inference is justified.

It is my purpose, however, to keep the record straight. I, therefore, call your attention to the following open letter that I have addressed to Mr. Robert Treuer, editor of the Wisconsin CIO News:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 9, 1950.

AN OPEN LETTER

Mr. ROBERT TREUER,
Editor, Wisconsin CIO News,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR MR. TREUER: The lead story in the September 1 issue of the Wisconsin CIO News proposes that Congressmen's records be judged by comparing them with the voting record of Representative VITO MARCANTONIO, of New York, who, according to the story, "has followed the [Communist] Party line devoutly."

Your noble purpose is to show "how palsy-walsy Republican and Communist ideologies become when it comes to voting time," and the story is illustrated by a cartoon showing the GOP and a Commie preparing to share the same bed.

This Marcantonio comparison interests me, particularly since one of my hobbies is collecting voting guides issued by various pressure groups. In that collection, my most prized possession is a series of official CIO voting guides for the years 1947 to 1950, inclusive. These "guides" tell whether a Congressman voted right or wrong, in the opinion of the CIO, on every issue considered significant by the CIO during each session.

In view of your new standard, I was somewhat surprised this morning, in thumbing through my collection, to note that Party Liner MARCANTONIO has voted right 47 times out of a total of 52 key issues covered by the last four CIO voting guides.

Your sports editor will tell you that this is a batting average of .903 both for the CIO in the Marcantonio League and for MARCANTONIO in the CIO League—more than enough for the first team and winning for you the privilege of bedding down with him on all road trips. With a signal lack of regret, I concede that my batting average of .019 (1 out of 52) in the CIO League and .076 (4 out of 52) in the Marcantonio League disqualifies me from playing ball with either you or the Reds.

Yours for foolproof voting guides,
JOHN W. BYRNES,
Representative in Congress,
Eighth District, Wisconsin.

The Golden Jackass

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, heretofore granted, I am inserting an article by Vivien Kellems:

THE GOLDEN JACKASS
(By Vivien Kellems)

"And when the people saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the Mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him, 'Up, make us gods which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.' And Aaron said unto them, 'Break off the golden earrings, which are in the ears of your wives, of your sons, and of your daughters, and bring them unto me.' And the people brake off the golden earrings which were in their ears and brought them unto Aaron. And he received them at their hand and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a golden calf; and they said, 'These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.' And when Aaron saw it, he built an altar before it; and Aaron made proclamation and said, 'Tomorrow is a feast to the Lord.' And they rose up early on the morrow, and offered burnt offerings, and brought peace offerings; and the people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play."

For 150 years, ours was a Christian Nation. It was founded by brave, God-fearing men and women who left the eternal wars and oppression of Europe and came to a new land where they might find peace and freedom; freedom to live and work as they pleased, freedom to worship God as they chose. All kinds of people came, all nationalities, all religions. There was room for everybody. But every person who came to these shores had one compelling motive—the determination to be free. No hardship was too severe, no danger too great, they were willing to risk life itself to make this dream of freedom come true.

By bitter experience these people knew that freedom for a nation is possible only where the individual is free, where every man is as good as every other man, with equal opportunity for all. They knew they had to work for that freedom; it could not be superimposed in the form of a dictatorship, no one was going to bestow billions of dollars upon them, or fight a world-wide war to give it them. They, themselves, had to establish it and put safeguards around it for their children. And they did an amazing thing. They declared in writing, on a piece of paper, that all rights and liberties reside in the people. They repudiated the divine right of kings. People, just because they are human beings, own all rights, and governments exist only by the consent of the governed. This was a new, a revolutionary idea and upon it, in the short space of 150 years, this little band of immigrants and their children built the richest, most powerful nation in the world. They secured and maintained for the majority of the people a standard of living undreamed of before, the hope and envy of the whole world.

And then something happened. We had a depression! It was not the first depression in our history, nor will it be the last. But it was a good one. We saw thousands of people standing in breadlines, we saw veterans selling apples on street corners, millions of men were out of work, little children were cold and hungry. And we were terrified! We rushed pell-mell to Washington and we said unto Aaron, "Up, make us gods that shall go before us for we are deep in depression and we wot not what will become of us." And Aaron smiled, reassuringly and with great charm, and said, "Fear not. The only thing we have to fear is fear itself. Break off the gold pieces which are in your safety deposit boxes and in the coffers of your wives, and of your sons, and of your daughters, and bring them unto me." And we took the first train back home and brake off from ourselves every gold piece we owned and we delivered them unto Aaron.

And Aaron received the gold at our hand and fashioned it with a graving tool after he had made it a golden—calf? No, not a calf. We would never be satisfied with a pusillanimous, spindle-legged little calf. We needed a noble animal, a proud, arrogant one, a god we could worship and to which we could offer burnt offerings. There was but one animal for this job. Up to this time we had always had a two-party system in our country and whenever the elephant began to feel his oats and throw his weight around, as he did ever so often, we'd toss him out and install the donkey. What more natural that in our extremity we should again turn to this familiar friend who had served us before? But this was to be no ordinary donkey. We were in dire straits, this one was of solid gold—our gold, all of it—a golden jackass, the perfect symbol of what we were about to do. And we said, "This be thy god, Oh America, which shall bring thee up out of the land of depression."

And when Aaron saw the golden jackass, he built an altar before it. And Aaron made proclamation and said, "Tomorrow is a feast to the Lord." And we rose up early on the morrow and offered burnt offerings.

First, we offered our gold certificates. They weren't any good anyway, we couldn't redeem them in gold. We were off the gold standard. And make no mistake about it. When we surrendered our gold we surrendered our power, because ownership of gold is power. Every indignity that has been heaped upon us during the last 17 years, every liberty stolen behind our backs, has been made possible by the debauching of our currency, by the forsaking of our gold standard.

And our next burnt offering was the good, old American dollar itself. We decided to devalue what little value was left by raising the price of gold. And what a smart burnt offering that was. We made $2,000,000,000 for Aaron right out of thin air. One minute the price of gold was $20 60 per ounce, and the very next minute it was $35 and all we had to do was multiply the ounces of gold in the Treasury by 35 instead of 20.60 and there it was—$2,000,000,000 more for the golden jackass, a nice reward for perpetuating the most gigantic swindle in history.

Signs and portents indicate that we may be contemplating another slight singeing of the American taxpayer. We're quite smug about our horde of gold buried in the ground, but did any of you read in the newspapers recently that we had shipped 10 tons of gold to Italy? I wonder what for. And did we give Italy the gold, or did Italy go through the motions of paying for it with money we had already slipped her? If she did pay us the legal price of $35 an ounce, she could turn right around and sell it on the world market for $42 an ounce. And what other nations have been bleeding gold out of the Treasury while American citizens are forbidden to own gold? Wouldn't it be a good idea to send a few adding machines down to Fort Knox and do a little counting? How much gold is there in the ground down there? And how much isn't? And what isn't, where is it?

But having sacrificed these burnt offerings to the golden jackass, we sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play.

We began with a new philosophy. We reversed the precepts and teachings of 150 years, all those old bromides about hard work, and frugality, and integrity, and self-reliance—all that piffle. This was a new era, a new deal for everybody, the feast of the forgotten man. We didn't have to worry any more. The Government owed us a living.

It was wonderful. There was something for everyone. The money was inexhaustible, we had billions of dollars and the checks flowed from Washington in every direction. First there was relief. And it was so simple. All you had to do was to apply. And then there was CPA and PWA and WPA. No more breadlines, no more worry. We had such fascinating things to do. Boondoggling all over the place. Down in Florida we built shower baths for the dogs. Over in the Washington Zoo Mr. Ickes built a mountain for the mountain goats. The poor goats. There they were on flat ground. It was a shame and the goats so unhappy. So Harold built a beautiful mountain and would you believe it, those ungrateful goats refused to go up the mountain.

The money flowed faster and faster, an endless stream—anything and everything was provided. Labor got the Wagner Act. The farmers got the AAA (nice, but not to compare with the Brannan plan). They needed seeds. They got seeds, and then got paid not to plant them, or to plough them under aitr thy had sprouted. We just had the most marvelous ideas.

Of course, a few old fogies became a little nervous and ventured to sound a warning but we promptly put them in their place. "Why, you copperheads, you. Don't you know this is a new deal? We're spending our way out of the depression. What difference does it make how much we spend? We owe it to ourselves, don't we? These be our gods, oh, America, that shall bring us up out of the land of depression.

And finally, even we economic royalists got our dish. We got the NRA. And we loved it. We sat down to eat and to drink. Now this was something like it. For the first time in our history, price fixing was made not only legal but mandatory by the Federal Government. This was just what we were waiting for. We took one triumphant look at that underhanded, double-crossing competitor who had been cutting prices on us, and we tore off to Washington on the first plane. We'd fix him. We'd make a code. And we did. Codes, codes everywhere and for everybody. We all had a code. We set prices where they ought to be and we defied that lousy competitor to cut them. Right into the hoosegow if he did! Remember the man who charged 5 cents too little for pressing a pair of pants? He got his and so did anybody else who violated that sacred code. This was our god which would bring us up out of the land of depression.

And then there was a sick chicken. It was in a coop. And a rabbi, fearful for the health of his people, refused to take the sick chicken even though the code said he had to. "Straight killing" the code called it. And the whole thing went to the Supreme Court. And in those days we still had a Supreme Court and it very rightly threw the whole NRA right out the window. It said price fixing was unconstitutional and impossible in our free competitive system. Maybe it's all right in Germany or in Russia but not in the United States of America. That golden god suffered a sudden demise.

And Aaron was very wroth. And he said, "Why, those nine, decrepit, senile, old men. Who do they think they are, refusing to offer up a little burnt offering to the golden jackass, the god which is bringing us up out of the land of depression. They belong in the horse-and-buggy days. I'll fix them. I'll make a new Supreme Court."

But strangely enough, while we clamored for new gods to go before us, deep in the heart of every loyal American was planted a respect and reverence for one god that even Aaron, with all of his charm, couldn't take away from us. In spite of all the glamor, and not having to work, and the forgotten man, and the social gains, and the worship of gold, we still had sense enough to realize that the Supreme Court stood above petty, partisan politics, our last bulwark of liberty and freedom. And so we said, "No." Aaron couldn't have his new Supreme Court, and he was annoyed.

But Aaron was always lucky. What he couldn't force from the American people, time gave him and you can take a look at it today—including Harry's notable contributions.

But we soon forget about the Supreme Court. We had bigger and better things to do. As we began to run a little short of projects here at home, someone had a brilliant idea—the good neighbor policy. There was all of Central and South America, with unlimited possibilities, right on our doorstep. The worship of the golden jackass could become hemispheric. And so we turned to the south. A vanguard of good-will missions by glamorous movie stars was followed by slaughterhouses for San Salvador, fishing boats for Peru, a water filtration plant for Honduras. We taught the Paraguayans how to farm and sent tractors and farm machinery to them. We established a collectivist food production program in Haiti with all necessary tools, seeds, fruit trees and vegetable plants. We trained nurses in Nicaragua and conducted a pathological investigation in Guatemala. Too bad we didn't conduct one in Washington first! Like Mr. Ickes' goats, the South Americans were just a bit startled and bewildered by all this outpouring of solicitude and generosity, but nobody shoots Santa Claus and in a short space of time we were able to get rid of $6,000,000,000 in 6 years, and we still had 11,000,000 unemployed.

Then war broke out in Europe. And stunned America momentarily shocked into its senses. The War to End All Wars, The War to Make the World Safe for Democracy was still fresh in our memory. Many of us still nursed hidden grief for loved boys who had not come back from that war. We wanted none of it. Frantically we passed the Neutrality Act, quickly followed by lend-lease. We would gladly give anything and everything to keep war from our shores and our boys at home. But as lend-lease began to take hold, a great light burst upon us. Here was global opportunity for the golden jackass. And we economic royalists who had loved NRA fell for this one just as hard. Under the guise of shipping the tools of war to our friends, anything was possible.

We suddenly grasped the gigantic, world-wide possibilities of lend-lease which was only intensified by our entrance into the war. Fighting with our backs to the wall, the lives of our boys in danger all over the world, we still had time and money to bring boondoggling to a degree of perfection undreamed of before. Anything up to now was just practice for the real job that faced us.

It's never nice to say "I told you so" and believe me, I derive no satisfaction from what I'm about to say. This is a signed article by Leon Denner which appeared on the front page of the New York World Telegram on September 24, 1949. "Four Red atom units going full blast." It gives details as to the location of these atom factories. I can't pronounce the names of the towns but permit me to read this. "No. 3, near Zlatoust, south of Cheliabinsk. The Ural atomic laboratories here are served by high power lines drawn from the most powerful generators in the Urals' industrial network. Zlatoust is the site of the oldest arms manufacturing center in Russia, founded by Peter the Great. It is equipped with American machinery." As are all the other atom plants in Russia. Do you know when that machinery was shipped to Russia? Right in the middle of the war. MacArthur pleading for supplies in the South Pacific, and we changed over whole cable factories to make these high tension lines for Russia. Let MacArthur wait. What difference does it make if American boys are killed? Russia must be served and given everything she wants.

These cable specifications came into my hands in 1943 and I was so incensed I stood up before the Chicago Rotary Club and told it, giving the amounts and the uses of the cables. That speech was so hot the Chicago Tribune buried it on the financial page, and I was called everything from a Nazi spy to a tool of Goebbels' propaganda machine. Today those papers are a matter of public record and anyone can go to the Treasury Department and see them. And the directive which forced our manufacturers to hold up our own war materials and ship cables, and generators and machinery to Russia with which to make postwar atom bomb plants, came right out of the White House.

But we were eating and drinking. We had risen up to play. Faster and faster flowed the money, madder and madder became the dancing.

But through it all there were enough of us who fought, and worked, and died, that we finally won the war.

We were prepared for that eventuality, too. We had UNRRA all cooked up. UNRRA. To feed the starving and clothe the naked. We redoubled our efforts. Machine tools, whole factories and plants for making every conceivable object poured across the ocean to Russia. Our boys back from war couldn't find homes. Let them wait. Russia must be served first and we sent materials and factories for fabricating them to make thousands of homes. To Italy the same. We installed a tremendous public works program, conducted in the best WPA tradition with ex-WPAers at its head. We not only reconstructed the war damage in Italy but boondoggled all over the place—everything from teaching the children of Naples how to play baseball to repairing the leaks in the gondolas on the Grand Canal.

A gangster, Tito, murdered five of our boys in flames. That's all right, Tito, it's all good clean fun. Not a pause in UNRRA largess, we poured out tons of sugar (we were rationed at home), thousands of automobiles, and trucks, tractors, steel rails, freight cars, porcelain doorknobs and bubble gum.

Ex-Governor LEHMAN was at the head of this gravy train while it was running full blast, but he had to resign because he got sick. I should think he would, probably sick at his stomach along with the rest of us. However, he wasn't too sick to get himself elected to the United States Senate. If Mr. Dulles had opened up to the people of New York the plain and fancy graft corruption in UNRRA which Mr. LEHMAN knew about and about which he did nothing, Mr. LEHMAN would not now be in the Senate, where he shouldn't be. He was backed 100 percent by the Communist vote in New York. Not that Mr. LEHMAN is a Communist. He isn't, but the Communists know that his policy will hasten the day they're waiting for. And Mr. Dulles' reward for his discreet silence is a fat job as adviser in the State Department.

As the odors of UNRRA began to penetrate our nostrils, the State Department hastily shifted operations. Now don't be misled by the squeamishness of our State Department over UNRRA. Mr. Acheson's boys in the striped pants (only instead of stripes on the pants they use lace on their panties) never leave one rotten egg until they've laid a riper one. They turned to the left and there was the Export-Import Bank, all ready. We must make loans to war devastated countries to rehabilitate their economies. Again the money was shoveled out—all the old favorites, Russia, Rumania, Yugoslavia and for good measure countries who hadn't had a cowshed destroyed, Denmark, Sweden, Ireland, Portugal and our dear old good neighbors in Central and South America. A steel mill to Chile—no coal or iron ore near but that's a minor matter, followed with a wonderful hydroelectric plant for the Indians in adobe huts, 300 miles south of Santiago. There's a 100 mile transmission line and the peak load on that line is 80 kilowatts. Those Indians can't afford to buy one light bulb but they can always go out and look at the line. Ditto for Peru and those Indians 150 miles from Lima. And don't think these crack-brained schemes are confined to South America. They're all over the world.

We can't afford to have our mail delivered more than once a day but at the very time this new cut in our standard of living is bestowed upon us, we graciously give Korea and Formosa $60,000,000, Indonesia a hundred million and our dear friend, Mr. Peron in Argentina a tiny one hundred and twenty-five million.

Didn't you hear about our old friend Tito? He's back again, large as life and twice as natural. First we bestowed a steel mill upon him quickly followed with a loan from the Export-Import Bank of $20,000,000. You thought that was all, didn't you? It was only the beginning. The World Bank followed through with another two million seven hundred thousand. And just recently we slipped him another twenty million. Tito's doing all right for himself, isn't he? I carefully followed the clever build-up given Tito to make all this traitorous gold palatable to the American people. First were nice pictures in the newspapers; Tito at his desk, Tito with his little son, Tito catching a fish. He caught a fish, all right. It's a big sucker, and we're it. All this was timed to appear just before a charming article in the Saturday Evening Post with a nice editorial saying it's all right, we'll let the dust settle in the Balkans. The dust will settle—after the explosion. The Balkans have always been the tinder box of Europe and if we think we can play the power politics in that area we're due for a rude awakening.

But the Export and Import Bank couldn't bankrupt us fast enough and banking is dull and prosaic. It isn't dramatic. The golden jackass became restive, and the people were bored. We needed a crusade, a slogan. Suddenly President Truman appeared before Congress and asked for $400,000 to fight communism and stop Russia in Greece and Turkey. And at the very moment he was high pressuring this money from Congress, Dean Acheson and those same lace-pantie boys in the State Department were demanding that we ship $17,000,000 worth of oil-refining machinery into Russia on lend-lease, $400,000 to fight communism and stop Russia, and $17,000,000 into Russia. And what were we doing shipping lend-lease into Russia 3 years after the war; no other countries were getting it?

But that isn't all. May I quote from the Newport News Daily Press, Newport News, Va., of April 24, 1947, right while Congress was debating a Greek-Turkish gift. "With one Russian vessel already loading UNRRA goods, another Soviet ship is due to come into Newport News within the next few days to take on a sizable consignment for Russia. The Krasnodar is taking on approximately 6,000 tons of cargo, most of it heavy machinery, including such items as concrete mixers and boilers. This ship is to transfer to Norfolk within the next day or two, according to present plans, to take on some bag cargo. Scheduled to arrive here shortly is the Russian vessel Baku, also to load machinery and other Russian goods."

And yet Congress voted those funds to fight communism and stop Russia. Is the pattern beginning to take form?

And from the modest little beginning of the Truman doctrine grew the Marshall plan. For the past 17 years the American people have been lied to, bamboozled, and cheated. But never has anything approached the amazing deception and sell-out of the Marshall plan. The blueprint was laid down for us in an editorial in the Eastern Economist, an English publication in New Delhi, India, on July 12, 1946. May I read this editorial to you, which, believe it or not, is called the World's Santa Claus.

The premise of the editor is that the United States can never balance its imports and exports because any imports to our country "might reduce employment within and create unemployment." He concludes as follows: "In such circumstances it would not be such a foolish thing (as some might imagine) to give away goods to other countries, for on balance it would be better to part with surplus goods than to create unemployment. What is essential is to devise a peacetime machinery on a semipermanent basis, of an orderly scheme of goods and equipment from America to the rest of the world. We suggest that from now onward a machinery should be set up by America whose purpose would be to provide gifts of loans to other countries. If President Roosevelt's famous Freedom from Want is not to be a pious wish and a slogan empty of content, it should be the duty of America to organize systematically the outflow of goods to the poorer countries. * * * If this is to play the world's Santa Clause, the United States of America is both rich enough and should have sense enough to fill the role."

And we fell for it. Two years ago when Congress was voting the Marshall plan funds for the year, England and Russia signed a bilateral trade agreement whereby Russia shipped to England food and timber in exchange for steel, machinery, tools, and other industrial equipment which was used to build up Soviet industry. And where do you think England got those tools, machinery, steel, and other industrial equipment? I'll give you three guesses. The exact commitments of the equipment shipped from us to Britain in the Marshall plan. Wouldn't it be simpler to just ship this material directly to Russia? And are you surprised that Russia has four tremendous atom bomb factories? How long will it be before those bombs are dropped on us and whose fault will it be?

But now it's no longer the Marshall plan. It's the ECA, not the good neighbor policy, not lend-lease, not UNRRA, not the Export and Import Bank, not the puny little Truman doctrine—it's ECA, soon to be superseded by point 4, to develop the underdeveloped areas of the world—a whole new idea, I don't think. But whatever they call it, a rose by any other name would smell as sweet—or as sour. It's still the same old thing, the worship of the golden jackass, but not now to bring us up out of the land of depression but the god who will keep us from going down into the land of depression.

But Aaron was a piker when he fashioned it with a graving tool. In his balmiest days he could only get rid of a puny 60,000,000,000 in 6 years. King Truman the First is handing it out at the rate of a billion a week and will keep it up until after the election in November--unless we collapse before then.

But with all our global worship of the golden jackass, we have not neglected the home front. Oh, my, no. Public housing, Federal aid to education, socialized medicine, increased social security (which is neither social nor secure) and of course, farm subsidies.

Two years ago we women of Connecticut were buying Canadian potatoes at three times what they were worth, while all those wonderful Maine potatoes were shipped to Richmond, Va., dumped into a trench, oil poured over them and burned. Today the Government has billions of eggs stored in a cave near Atcheson, Kans. It costs $25,000 a month to keep the eggs cool. It will cost more than that to keep the women of this country cool when they finally get onto what is being done to them. And while we're fighting communism all over the world, we're shipping millions of eggs from Red China and putting them in the cave, too. But this system enables us to pay twice, once to the farmer to make the price high, then again at the grocery store at the price our taxes have boosted it up to.

I suppose all of you get letters asking for contributions from time to time. I get my share and unfortunately I cannot contribute to all the causes that are deserving. But today I'm going to read one I got recently. It's not a form letter, it's written to me personally.

MOUNTAIN CHILD WELFARE MISSION, INC.,
Hazard, Ky.

MISS VIVIEN KELLEMS,
Kellems Cable Grip Co.,
Stonington, Conn.

DEAR MISS KELLEMS: There are thousands of underprivileged and undernourished children in the isolated and neglected mountain areas—children who can't go to school because they do not have clothing to wear—children who never know what it is to have a full and satisfying meal, a decent outfit of clothing or a pair of shoes—never a toy or storybook of any kind. Little joy comes into the life of these unfortunate children.

We would like to give you the opportunity of sharing with us in this needed work for these worthy and deserving mountain children—our own American children, and assure you that any help you can send will be put to a good use among these children in distressing need.

With kindest best wishes, I am
Sincerely yours,
MARY SUE WHITE, R. N., President.

What folly is this? Potatoes burned, eggs stored in a cave and our own little children hungry.

But surely this spectacle is unique in history—a rich, powerful nation deliberately committing suicide by giving away everything its owns.

But the crowning achievement of the golden jackass was the monstrosity, the so-called bipartisan foreign policy. There is no such thing, a bipartisan foreign policy. Our foreign policy is based upon our domestic policy. The two are inseparably bound together, one and the same thing. You cannot approve one without endorsing the other. Now you do not have to take my word for this. May I quote from no less an authority than Mr. Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, in his speech before the American Society of Newspaper Editors on April 22: "I mean there is no longer any difference between foreign questions and domestic questions. They are part of the same question." Our domestic policy is to confiscate the wealth and property of the American people by increasingly heavy taxes. Our foreign policy is to take that wealth and squander it all over the world with a prodigal hand. Combined, the two are designed to accomplish one ultimate objective—to hand this country, lock, stock, and barrel over to Joe Stalin.

The golden jackass laughed when he persuaded the blind Republicans that we must present a united front to the world. Otherwise patriotic, intelligent Republicans fell for this clever scheme, conceived in the facile minds of the gangsters and Communists who hold positions of power in our Government. It successfully shut the mouths of the loyal opposition and tolled the death knell of the Republican Party.

Do you believe in giving a steel mill to Tito? Do you believe in opening our Treasury to this murderer and pouring out other gifts and loans? Do you believe in handing over our gold to Italy? Do you believe in dismantling the factories of Germany and shipping them into Russia at the very same time we are spending billions all over this world to fight communism? Do you believe in selling the English people into bondage and poverty by financing this communistic Labor Government—using dollars earned by free Americans to socialize British industry? Do you believe in shipping Rumanian oil to the Chinese Communists through the port of Darien in American tankers, with the approval of our State Department? Do you believe in building a vehicular tunnel with Marshall-plan dollars in prosperous Brussels, while every day people are maimed and killed in the streets of our cities and we can't find a place to park right here in Bridgeport? Do you believe in the sell-out at Yalta where with one grand wave of his hand, Roosevelt delivered to Stalin the fruits of our victory? Thousands of dead American boys lie betrayed in their graves. Do you believe in dropping two atom bombs on Japanese cities when Japan had been suing for peace for 6 months? Do you believe in burning our wheat in Greece in order to keep the price up when we supposed that wheat was feeding the hungry Greek people? Do you believe in letting a convicted Russian spy go free and sending him home first class at our expense, while an innocent American businessman is tortured and thrown into a filthy Communist prison for 15 years? Do you believe in burying our potatoes in trenches and hoarding our eggs in a cave while millions of people are starving all over the world and our own little children can't go to school because they haven't enough to eat or a decent pair of shoes to wear?

What madness is this, what insanity? Every American who, even though in good faith, has acquiesced in duplicity, this colossal sell-out of the American people, should hang his head in shame. Lose elections? Of course the Republican Party loses elections and it will never win an election until it has the courage to stand up before the whole world and repudiate this gigantic swindle. All over the earth, millions of people are waiting to hear that there are some sane Americans who stand aghast at the crimes that are being committed in the name of this so-called bipartisan foreign policy, that there are some decent Americans who recoil in horror at the deliverance into the hands of Russia of one country after another, that there are Americans who will demand an end to a foreign policy which constitutes the blackest page in our history.

You cannot buy love, friendship, or loyalty. The old roue with the diamond bedecked blonde cutie on his arm, deceives no one but himself. And Uncle Sam, vulgarly throwing his gold around all over the world isn't deceiving anyone but himself and isn't buying himself anything but hatred, tragedy, bankruptcy, and war.

What a time for power to be in the hands of small men, petty men, men who care only about their personal political fortunes and what next November might bring them. And what a time for statesmen—men who are ready to take the objective course and to unselfishly serve their country. What a time for the courage of the martyrs, willing to risk everything for principle and a holy cause, the cause of human freedom.

Will the Republican Party accept the challenge? Will the Republican Party once more boldly proclaim that a man is free just because he is a man; that all rights and liberties are his because he is born a human being? Will the Republican Party once more restore to that man his Government, and make that Government his servant, not his master? Will the Republican Party shake off the shackles of a dishonest foreign policy that are binding our Nation, and tear away the chains that have been forged upon a free people to reduce us to slavery?

And, most important, will the Republican Party renounce the crass materialism of the past 17 years, the cynical purchase of a man's vote paid for in coin stripped from that same man in taxes? Will the Republican Party forsake the worship of gold—yes, the blind idolatrous worship of the golden jackass—and return in contrite humility to the warship of the God of our fathers?

Then, and then only, can we go to the American people with clean hands. Then, and then only, can we lead our country back into the paths of peace and liberty and righteousness.

Address of Hon. Frances P. Bolton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

KEYNOTE ADDRESS OF REPRESENTATIVE FRANCES P. BOLTON, OF OHIO, WEDNESDAY MORNING, AUGUST 30, 1950, AT THE CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S REPUBLICAN CLUBS IN CLEVELAND

Ohio, the great Twenty-second District, which I have the honor of representing in the Congress of the United States, Cuyahoga County and the city of Cleveland welcome you warmly, and trust that your all too-short stay among us will be both happy and fruitful.

It is a rare privilege for us to have such leaders in our midst.

Especially is this so at a moment when the future of mankind itself may well rest upon this 1950 election.

Republican women, we stand today upon the threshold of opportunity. Behind us are 17 years of difficult rear guard action, with but 2 years when we could make ourselves heard, and even then we were not able to make ourselves understood and adequately felt.

But we have held back the attack upon the American principle that free men are capable of governing themselves. We have reminded the people of this country of ours that they actually do a better job in the long run than a centralized government of appointed, not elected, bureaucrats. Nothing could be further from the ideals and principles upon which these States joined together than the methods that have been sold the voters during these past 17 years. The moment for an attack on all fronts is now—not 2 years from now.

We stand today upon the threshold of opportunity, holding in our hands a responsibility as great as any with which men and women separately and together have ever been entrusted.

It is for us to see that the people of this country recognize what has been done to freedom in the guise of beneficence—to see that they recognize the hand of Esau, and hear the undertones of danger in the lilting voices, the honeyed words.

Why is it ours to do?

First and foremost because the Republican Party came into being to protect the people of that day from supercontrols. John Hay, President Lincoln's Secretary, reports a conversation in which Mr. Lincoln said, "It is for us to prove that government by the people is not an absurdity."

No truer word could be said today. Supercontrols of the people of this great land of freedom have been slipped over our heads and fastened upon us so smoothly, so skillfully that most people haven't known what was happening to them. Just as the world-wide propaganda agencies have covered the earth with clouds of misstatement, of high sounding promises, so have those in power in this country confused and befuddled the thinking of the freest and most intelligent people on this earth.

Take just one phase of our living:

Every housewife knows she has to stay inside the sum total of her husband's earnings. Every man knows he can't keep on borrowing to meet the interest payments on his mortgage. That way he would lose both his home and his credit. But during these long years of the rawest deals any great people were ever given, the idea that the Government can pile up fantastic debts and keep doing it forever and ever, has been dripped onto our good American common sense and solid experience drop by drop until many have accepted it not only as possible, but actually as a sound way of meeting the ever-increasing and wholly unsound Federal budget.

The Republican Party in the Eightieth Congress proved in deeds not words that the budget can still be balanced.

Of course it wasn't popular to cut down Government expense when that meant fewer cushy Government jobs. Of course it wasn't popular when it meant States, cities, and towns, and so forth, would have to square their shoulders to take back much of the burden of meeting their own local responsibilities. Of course, it wasn't popular because the people have been most carefully and subtly led to believe that the Federal Government can and will take care of everything they want.

So, in 1948 the dealers once again shuffled the pack and dealt the cards. Pretty poor hands for everybody except the dealers.

What so many of us forget is that every dollar the Federal Government spends has come out of our own pockets. We forget that the Federal debt is a burden we have to carry. Only a few years ago every man, woman, and child in America had a debt responsibility of only $300. Today every man, woman, and child has a chain around his neck of $1,697.

The Republican Eightieth Congress did not forget where the dollars came from. It reduced taxes, paid, on the national debt, and balanced the budget, while at the same time providing to increase our national defense.

We are gathered here not just to talk together, not just to tell each other about what

Republicans have or have not done. We are here in an effort to stimulate the women of our own party to work for freedom in these United States. We are here also to assume the task of getting the real picture to all the women of the country without camouflage, but with imagination and force. A very large number of them are waking up to the danger that lurks on every highway and in every alley. They are recognizing their responsibility and their opportunity not only to keep freedom a living reality but to build it into the most powerful force in all the world.

Of course there are large groups of women who are Democrats just as we are Republicans. But there are many even of these who are deeply disturbed over the methods of the New Deal and its successors. They are beginning to wonder if it has not all been a very raw deal to them and to their children. And there are the Independents who are looking for something they can take hold of, something they can believe in and trust.

To catch their imaginations will take a lot of practical thinking. As our new National Chairman Guy Gabrielson so wisely says, it will take well organized political machinery without party cliques or personal feuds, welcoming and utilizing every group in every community utterly without regard to race, creed, color, age or sex. All these, says Mr. Gabrielson, must be gathered up into the great driving force of a powerful machine. This is happening, and you who represent the half million members of the National Organization of Republican Women's Clubs are a tremendously important part of this machine.

What has to be done? More than any other one thing: the voters must be registered and gotten to the polls. The 45,000,000 who failed to vote in 1948 must recognize and assume their personal responsibility this year. There were 93,000,000 men and women eligible to vote in 1948 (and 45,000,000 didn't)—automatically there are more now.

Freedom itself is in grave danger when people stop caring about it. Agnes Hale, wife of fine Congressman ROBERT HALE, of Maine, in the Federation's News Letter of July of this year, reminds us that while 95 percent of the voters of Australia and New Zealand voted in 1948 (and incidentally the New Zealanders turned out their Socialists) it is believed that only 51 percent of the eligibles voted here—a drop from 83 percent in 1896.

Don't let people say to you—oh—my vote won't count. Remind them that Thomas Jefferson was elected President by just one vote in the electoral college—so was John Quincy Adams—so was Rutherford B. Hayes, whose election was contested. And then one vote cast by an Indiana Congressman, who won his seat by one vote, decided the matter. One vote gave statehood to California, Idaho, Oregon, Texas, and Washington.

One vote gave us the Draft Act in World War II. And we here in Ohio will do well to remember that one additional vote in each of our 8,800 precincts would have carried the State for the Republicans.

All over this great country there needs to be a doubling and redoubling of effort for registering our citizens such as the unions, the League of Women Voters, and many other organizations are making, in addition to the work of the regular political parties. In every State your club women must join with your organization women to see to it that every eligible man and woman is registered and votes. That's the practical end of it—and it is one in which women play a major role always. This year our efforts must be crowned with overwhelming results.

So I say again: This is the moment when the Republican Party—the party that was born in Lincoln's time to keep Government in the hands of the people—must rouse itself as from a deep sleep and prevent Government being taken for keeps out of the hands of the people to whom it was given when America was born. Isn't it time that somebody put the truth into plain words that everybody can understand?

Our Constitution set up a representative Government, not a Socialist state. But Norman Thomas, long a candidate for the Presidency on a Socialist ticket said in 1946 there is no longer need for such a party. He said that his 1932 platform has been 90 percent carried out by the Dealers. He ought to know.

Organized labor is giving much time, effort and money to see that every eligible working man and woman is registered. Some Republicans fear this. I do not. I have a sincere confidence in the rank and file of American workers. I am one of many Republicans who believe deeply in the right of labor to organize, who rejoices in the gains many of the major unions have made in these last few years particularly. I am one of the many who are relieved to learn that the wiser leaders are warning their members that socialism in America would put an end to unions as we now know them. I am deeply certain that many of this great body of Americans are well aware of the danger to their organizations and to the country as a whole of centralized controls, and so will not lend themselves on election day as tools of their own destruction.

The Eighty-first Congress majority leaders have made several broad gestures toward more complete control over the free people of the country. The balloons of compulsory health insurance and the Brannan plan were blown up with a lot of attractive hot air and launched on trial. A bill was introduced "to conserve our natural resources" that creates regions under the complete control of bureaucrats in Washington—doing away with State lines. But the people of the country didn't quite like the looks of any of them too well—so the administration decided to hold their fire, to retreat a bit just as the Marx boys in the Kremlin do when things go against them.

From what one hears on Capitol Hill the Dealers have decided that the opposition will have little to say in the Eighty-second Congress because they expect to take at least 40 more seats in the House and 5 or so more seats in the Senate. This, they say, would give the administration a complete control and the whole great control program will then be passed easily. So why bother about those various bills now?

I say to you again that this is a moment of great responsibility—a moment when only the election of a Republican-controlled House and Senate can keep a people's government from becoming a bureaucratic dictatorship. Unless freedom is maintained here in these United States there will soon be no freedom anywhere in the world.

As Americans we are all faced with so much that is jeopardizing the principle of individual freedom under law that means America. Part of this is the infiltration into every phase of our living of Communist doctrines, strategies, techniques. We are waking up and realizing that these dangers are right here, too, not only in France or Italy; not just in the Philippines, China, Malaya, but also right here at home. A mounting tide of anger is rising against the administration which has turned its eyes away from the danger, which has even condoned it and refused to move against it.

The attack upon Korea has shocked us awake.

The fact that we had only a handful of unbattle-trained occupation troops to throw into the breach; that no fighting units were anywhere near our Pacific outposts; that we were so evidently caught in another Pearl Harbor, dazed us at first. Little by little the tide of anger is rising against those responsible, both in the Defense Department and in the Department of State, which is both the adviser and the mouthpiece of the President in whose hands all foreign policy rests.

What of the foreign policy in Europe? It is a long history of poor judgment, blundering, and appeasement. The results are there for all to see: Hundreds and thousands of freedom-loving people forced under the iron curtain by a ruthless, well-trained police group, while we stood by and let it happen.

Why haven't we hammered on the violations of every agreement that the Kremlin has been and is daily guilty of? Why isn't the Voice of America a continuing protest against the high-handed Politboro, so comfortably ensconsed in the palaces on the hill above Moscow's Red Square? We have checked the Communists to some extent in Europe through the Marshall plan and the military assistance Greek-Turkish Act, both of which came out of the Republican Eightieth Congress, but we know that the danger is still grave.

The Marx boys did not disband their armies and put their ships of sea and air into mothballs. They didn't stop research on fire power, tank armor, or end their war production. They didn't set aside appropriations made by a Republican Congress for a 70-group air force and arrogantly say 48 groups are enough. They didn't let those 48 shrink to 38. They have spent every minute of these 5 years strengthening their air, land, and sea forces, adding to their war factories, training their youth and the youth of every satellite country, as well as the children they kidnapped from across their own and satellite borders, to be Communists and to be fighters. They have stopped at nothing that will bring them nearer the goal set up 100 years ago by Karl Marx; complete control of the world.

Our appeasement policy was one of the main contributing elements in the take-over by the Kremlin of what we now call the satellite countries. We know (and knew at the time) that there are hundreds of thousands of freedom-loving people in those countries, as well as in Russia proper. But in spite of that the President—in whose hands the foreign policy of this country rests—not the Congress—made the shameful agreements of Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam.

What of our foreign policy in the Far East which blew up in Korea? Remember always that the foreign policy of the United States is made by the President, and implemented by the Secretary of State. It was the President of the United States who brought Russia into the Japanese war just in time to take the surrender of the Japanese in Manchuria and North Korea, and to take over the great industries built there over a period of years. It was again the President who made the secret agreements at Yalta, at Tehran—with Alger Hiss at his side. From Tehran (1943) until the move on Korea (June 25, 1950), the foreign policy of this country in Asia was based on abject appeasement of Soviet Russia.

Convinced that the free nations had to be strengthened, and that they had to be joined together for combined effort if the Communists were to be stopped in their ruthless march across the world, the Republican Eightieth Congress passed the Greek-Turkish Act launched the ECA legislation, initiated the idea of the Atlantic Pact and passed laws strengthening the United Nations. These measures were the result of real bipartisan efforts.

The shameful agreements at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, the blundering methods that have resulted in placing over half a billion of the people of the world under the Soviets in China are strictly the outcome of the policies of the Dealers. Republicans had no part in their inception and have no responsibility for their failure. Do not let yourselves be misled by present protestations that are being poured out upon the land.

Remember this: During the Republican Eightieth Congress there was written into the China Aid Act of 1948, largely through the consecrated efforts of the Congressman from Minnesota, the Honorable WALTER JUDD, a bipartisan China policy. It is still in the law, but the Executive has not seen fit to carry it out. Rather has it been evaded and misconstrued and action delayed by those charged under law with making it effective. Remember also that it has been the Executive's refusal to carry out the expressed will of the Congress that held up the rebuilding of a strong Air Force and a more powerful Navy.

We are a people slow to anger. We have courage to meet whatever comes. We are ready to give up all lesser things to preserve the priceless heritage that is ours as no other people have known it: Freedom. We know that no man and no government is faultless—that all make mistakes. These we can and must accept.

But today questions as to why we have so little military strength when we have spent so much are heard on every hand. In Korea we are told the battles are bloody, that the courage of our troops is magnificent, and yet the casualty lists are small. Why are we not told the truth? Why are we not told the extent of our commitments and plans so that our young men may know whether they must plan on military service?

When Government gives but half-truths, when it withholds parts of the picture, there begins the rising of a tide of deep resentment that must sometime before long burst the dikes and turn upon those responsible for half-truths, for repression of facts, terrible as these may be. Woe betide those who have trusted the people so little that they have withheld the truth.

Don't let anyone mislead you. Get the recorded facts so clearly into your minds that you will find yourselves alert and full of a flaming faith in the great party that must and will rise up once more in behalf of freedom.

Take with you wherever you go in these next weeks the Digest of the Republican Principles prepared by the national committee last February. They are good American principles with no taint of alien ideologies.

Carry with you also the 10 points Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH put into such succinct language—swell with pride that we have so fine a woman representing us in the United States Senate.

Remember, too, that they aren't just words, for during the short 2 years of Republican control of the Congress taxes were reduced, the budget was balanced, and a start was made on the reduction of Government spending, and a very real effort was made to repair the damages done to our Military Establishment. We were helpless, however, when the President refused to act upon the mandate of the Congress, set aside the appropriations made, and cut the Air Force.

Economy at every possible point is imperative. To this end Congress set up the Hoover Commission to study the Executive Department of Government, and report back on possible methods for greater economy and better administration. The whole country wants action, and what do we get? Twenty-one reorganization plans, few of them having much if any relation to the findings of the Commission and almost all of them adding to the power of the heads of departments and bureaus.

It is significant that the only Cabinet officer who made any economies has been the Secretary of Defense.

These are all matters that need the most careful consideration by every man and woman in the United States.

But the question before us here in Cleveland this morning is, what we must do, we Republican women, whether we are members of Republican clubs, or members of our local and State Republican organization or members of neither, or of both? We must use every scrap of intelligence, of wisdom, of understanding and all of the best sense of humor that we have to one purpose: The election of Republicans on November 7, not just because they are Republicans but because they are the only voice the free people in this great country have left.

If you have sensitive toes that are often stepped on, wrap them up thoroughly and put on stout boots until after the votes are counted. If you are downhearted put on the biggest smile you ever saw, yes, practice it in front of your mirror, but smile and sing an hallelujah chorus of gratitude that you have a chance to get to the people of this country straight from the shoulder before it is too late the fact that the Government is their Government; that the money it spends so recklessly, with so few visible results, is their money. Make it clear to them that they have a right to demand good management, efficient administration, a strong national defense and adherence to American principles, and results.

We, we Americans found out how to break up the atom and release the terrible power with it, we made the atom bomb possible and used it. Now atom bombs are loose in an unfriendly world, a terrible power.

But we Americans did something much more difficult, much more important, when we set up our three-part Government, and released the individual from domination by others of his kind or by government itself. We have seen the power that can be developed by the individual when he is free to use all of himself. There is no greater power on earth than the power of free men joined together by common purpose and by a common will.

It is this power that must be insured to the world. Only by a change over of the controls of the Congress from the dealers to the Republicans can this be assured.

Only by working with passionate unity can we do our part to preserve freedom here and across the world.

Let us go out from this place with determination to do three things:

1. Lay aside all our selfish littleness.

2. Give ourselves completely to the task ahead.

3. Work day and night, night and day to bring to the people the realization of their individual responsibility to the Infinite God of all mankind to keep the torch of freedom alight in an ever-darkening world.

Fellow Republicans: It is my earnest hope that you will go out from here fired with fresh courage and a burning faith in the task before us. It is my prayer that we may prove ourselves worthy of the help of Almighty God whose purposes we have the responsibility and the privilege to serve.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 9, page A5744, embodies an editorial, "The WCTU and the War," from the Richmond Times Dispatch dated August 7.

The editorial is a warning against the kind of temperance which brought upon the Nation the era of prohibition which we should like to forget and which we hope shall never recur.

The attached interesting and pertinent articles were gleaned from two different newspapers. One captioned "No Complaints" is from the Detroit Free Press under date of September 7, 1950, headlined Korea, and giving proper weight to beer, the food drink so popular with the average American soldier. The other was clipped from the Washington Post, dated September 9, and indicates the rampant hypocrisy prevalent in our country, particularly in dry territory where the crop of stills and the output of deadly moonshine whisky is as a rule the greatest.

NO COMPLAINTS—BEER REPLACES WATER FOR CUT-OFF GI'S

KOREA.—About 100 American troops were isolated from the main body of United Nations forces in the Naktong River bulge for 4 days.

Despite their isolation and precarious position, they effectively supported the drive to push the Reds back across the river.

Their principal assignment was to report Communist troop movements. They could watch the Reds easily from the high peak where they were cut off. They reported by radio.

The unit was supplied twice daily by air drops. Planes brought ammunition and everything else they needed—except water.

Every time water was dropped from a plane, the container burst when it hit the ground. The situation was becoming serious.

Then some one, with typical GI ingenuity, suggested individual cans of beer be dropped one at a time. It worked. After that no one complained of a lack of water.

"If I could have a can of beer everytime I wanted a drink of water," one GI remarked, "I think I'd stay up there all the rest of the month."

ILLEGAL LIQUOR SOLD "LEGALLY" IN "DRY" CITY

YAZOO CITY, MISS., September 8.—An unofficial agreement between the city council and local bootlegers under which the whisky salesmen operate by paying one $100 fine a month was revealed here today.

"Yes, that's right," said Mayor Pro Tempore P. J. Whalen. "The agreement was made about 2 weeks ago."

Mayor W. S. Perry is out of the State.

"Unless something unforseen happens, I don't think we'll make any change in it," Whalen said. "We're going to try and get ourselves some revenue from it."

Mississippi is one of the two remaining States with a prohibition law on its statute books. Enforcement, however, is left to city and county authorities.

The State does impose a black-market tax of 10 percent on all liquor sales. Similar taxes are collected by several cities in the State.

A protest against the local agreements was sounded at a mass meeting earlier this week, called by Dr. Webb Brame, pastor of the First Baptist Church.

Norman Mott, publisher of the Yazoo City Herald, told the meeting the council acted because "they sincerely believe it is the best way to cope with the whisky and gambling situation."

Whalen today said "only about 5 percent of the people here are excited about it."

Recommendations by the State of Texas to the President's Water Resources Water Policy Commission, Fayetteville, Ark., June 30, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OMAR BURLESON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD, the statement in behalf of the President's Water Resources Water Policy Commission for the State of Texas, which statement was presented at Fayetteville, Ark., on June 30, 1950.

In addition, there are included exhibits Nos. 2 and 3, constituting recommendations by the State of Texas in connection with water conservation.

There is no greater domestic problem than that of water supply and particularly in the great Southwest. I think the discussions in this document will be of intense interest to the Congress, and that it may bring to our attention helpful information upon which to base further considerations.

The statement follows:

PRESENTATION

Gentlemen of the Commission, the Commission has graciously invited Gov. Allan Shivers to communicate at this conference the recommendations of the State of Texas. The Governor authorized the Texas water code committee, an interim committee established by the legislature to study the water problems of the State, to prepare and present a statement designed to reflect the attitude and recommendations of the State. The privilege of presenting this statement to the Commission has been accorded to the undersigned subcommittee. We are mindful of the Governor's suggestion that our recommendations be built around these cardinal principles: recognition of the fundamental right of the Federal Government to exercise powers necessary to navigation in all streams which are navigable; when such streams are intrastate that the individual States have supervision of all other rights therein; and when such streams are interstate that all other rights therein be administered through interstate compacts.

In performing our assignment we have received valuable assistance from the State board of water engineers.

PLAN OF THIS STATEMENT

This statement contains in addition to certain primary assumptions:

I. A brief summary of the recommendations.

II. Comments on each of the recommendations; and

III. Exhibits.

We do not propose a suggested water policy, but seek to recommend some of the elements which we think should be incorporated in the integrated policy which this Commission will evolve.

I. SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Congress should reaffirm the doctrine that the waters of navigable streams are the property of the people of the State in which they flow, limited by the right of the Government to prevent any material interference with actual navigation, and as to interstate streams, by the coordinate rights of the people of other States.

2. The storage of the waters of the people of a State should create in the Government no proprietary rights to the stored water, but at most an obligation on the part of the owners to pay the Government reasonable compensation for storage of the water.

3. Obviously, the necessity for soil conservation is inseparable from flood control and water conservation.

4. Floods do not recognize State lines, but our rivers in their uncontrolled and natural condition have never obliterated the boundaries of the State. It is believed that flood waters can be stored and managed in such way that the sovereignty of the States will not be washed away in the process.

5. A comprehensive flood control and water conservation program must be on the basis of the whole watershed of a stream. We believe that this can be accomplished best as to an interstate stream through employment of designated agencies of the Government in cooperation with the officials of the respective States, and to the extent necessary to adjust equities between or among the States, through the service of interstate compact commissioners. We do not feel that the employment of authorities or administrators having jurisdiction of areas created without respect to State boundaries is essential.

6. In all instances where a watershed is confined wholly within, or where the contributing portion of the watershed is situated within, a single State, all water stored in any flood-control or water-conservation program for such watershed should be owned and used in accordance with the laws of the State.

7. The Federal law should make provision for cash reimbursement to a State or a State agency which constructs a multiple-purpose dam to the extent of the approved cost of that part of the structure, incurred and effective for flood control, provided that the amount reimbursable and the State's plan for the operation of the flood-control facilities of the structure shall have first been approved by the agency of the Government charged with the duty of operating flood-control facilities in that vicinity.

8. We feel that the Reclamation Act should be amended in harmony with what appears to be its original intent, to the end that the legal title to a project should remain in the United States until it has received reimbursement of the capital cost of the facilities; but that throughout the repayment period the equitable title to such facilities be vested in the landowners. The contract should provide that upon repayment to the Government of its cost both the legal and equitable title will become vested in such landowners without the necessity of any affirmative action by the Government or by the Congress.

9. We feel that the Reclamation Act should be further amended in harmony with the recommendations heretofore made to the Commission by the Texas Water Conservation Association in its presentation, dated April 28, 1950. An excerpt from the presentation by the association, proposing such amendments to the Reclamation Act is attached hereto as exhibit 2.

10. The Federal Power Act should be amended so as to remove obvious impediments to the active cooperation by States in the water-conservation and flood-control program of the country. The following amendments are suggested:

(a) No State, agency of a State, municipality or other public body should be required to obtain a license from the Federal Power Commission before constructing a dam at which power will be developed unless there is a finding by the Department of the Army that the structure will affect adversely navigation on the stream;

(b) The provisions of the Federal Power Act under which the United States Government would have the right to recapture a dam and other works owned by a State, a State agency, municipality, or other public body, after the expiration of the license should be repealed.

11. We feel that to the extent permitted by the Constitution, Congress should place greater emphasis on the value of water storage for industrial and municipal purposes, in determining the feasibility of a multiple-purpose dam.

PRIMARY ASSUMPTIONS

We will assume that certain principles will be incorporated in or recognized in any declaration which may be made of the Government's national water resources policy, including the following:

1. That the national interest requires: A substantial or major participation by the United States Government in the provision of flood-control facilities for navigable streams and their tributaries; provision by the Government, upon request of the landowners, at a cost not greater than cost to the Government for irrigation facilities for lands economically irrigable under standards and regulations prescribed by the Reclamation Act (not a primary duty of the Federal Government); contribution by the Government to the cost of soil treatment so as to prevent erosion, a substantial contributor to floods of streams and because of siltation, an important factor in the expense of controlling floods; and wherever practicable in the performance of its reclamation and flood-control obligations that the Government employ multiple-purpose dams so as to produce revenues which will reduce the expenses of operation, and, to the extent possible, provide reimbursement of the capital expenditure. (Serious consideration of the Commission is invited to suggestions contained in a report heretofore filed with the Commission by the irrigation task force of the Engineers Joint Council. It proposes a modernized approach to determination of benefits and the allocation of payments for a Government-constructed project. Attached hereto as exhibit 3 is an excerpt (p. 18) of that report.)

2. That in the several States practices in the use of water and laws regulating the use of water have become a part of the economy of the State, and based thereon important vested rights have become fixed and perfected.

3. The State of Texas (as is the case in other States) has authorized substantial integrated river-improvement programs, and in the case of the Brazos River is in the midst of its own flood-control and water-conservation program. Pursuant to acts of Congress the Army also is building flood-control and multiple-purpose projects on the Brazos. There is no conflict between the program of the Army and that of the State. The work of one complements the other. Each Government structure eliminates the construction by the State of that unit. The State legislature created the Brazos River Agency in 1929, being the first instance in the United States of a public agency charged with the duty of controlling the water of an entire watershed. The laws of the United States should encourage and not place any impediments to such activities.

4. Experience has taught that flood control and conservation improvements can be planned and constructed most economically and efficiently when the planning is on the basis of the entire watershed of the river; but that there is no necessity for using an improvement unit larger than a complete watershed, which would include all contributing sources of water and its outlet to the sea.

II. COMMENTS ON RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Congress should reaffirm the doctrine that the waters of navigable streams are the property of the people of the State in which they flow, limited by the right of the Government to prevent any material interference with actual navigation, and as to interstate streams, by the coordinate rights of the people of other States.

2. The storage of the waters of the people of a State should create in the Government no proprietary rights to the stored water, but at most an obligation on the part of the owners to pay the Government reasonable compensation for storage of the water.

Comment

Congress recognized water rights which were vested under State laws and the propriety and the necessity of complying with State laws when the National Reclamation Act of 1902 was passed. Those provisions of the act have never been repealed. Section 8 of the original act denied any intention to "interfere with the laws of any State or territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or any vested right acquired thereunder" and required the Secretary of the Interior to "proceed in conformity with such laws."

Perhaps the Commission will recall that during the Seventy-eighth Congress when the flood-control bill was under consideration in the Senate the States became alarmed over some of the provisions in the bill because it accorded no recognition to any rights of the States in reference to the construction of the many proposed flood-control and multiple-purpose dams, nor in the disposition and use of the water to be stored by such structures. This agitation resulted in the calling of a conference in Chicago attended by the representatives of the governors of approximately 40 States. Out of this conference grew the so-called O'Mahoney amendments to the flood-control bill. The amendments were enacted into the law known as the Flood Control Act of 1944. Under that act no such structure planned by the Government can be constructed until the Governor of the State or a representative of the State designated by him shall have had an opportunity to examine, criticize, and to approve or disapprove of the proposed project. It cannot be constructed over the opposition of the State unless and until Congress shall have had an opportunity to pass again on the propriety of the project.

There is another provision in the Flood Control Act of 1944, applicable to all of the so-called Western States, including the State of Texas, that the use of water for consumptive purposes as prescribed by State laws in the streams thus improved has priority over the use of the water for navigation.

If there is any doubt that these principles announced in the Reclamation Act of 1902 and in the Flood Control Act of 1944 constitute a general policy of the United States Government Congress should make the declaration of policy as to such matters definite.

Under the Flood Control Act of 1944 the Secretary of the Army and his representatives in the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army have assumed properly, that the water stored at a multiple-purpose dam is the property of the people of the State in which the water is stored, but that reasonable financial arrangements should be made with the Government for payment of the cost of storing the water. We refer, of course, to storage space at such a dam not devoted primarily to flood storage. It is provided at the expense of the Government, but conservation storage is made available for use by the people of the State through sale or contract. In several instances the Corps of Engineers of the Army has made contracts with municipalities under which the municipality pays either in a lump sum the cost of the part of conservation storage to be used by it, or makes annual payments designed to liquidate the capital investment of the Government in the conservation storage capacity of the dam. In two or three instances in Texas the Government has sold perpetual storage rights in reservoirs to water districts. The Army has no water to sell but it can sell all or part of its excess storage capacity. If this is not the general policy of the United States Government it should be declared as the general policy.

And if our laws are not clear enough on the subject to convince the officials of the several agencies charged with administering Government-owned dams and the Department of Justice, that the primary rights of the people living on the banks of a navigable stream extend to the reasonable use of the water of the stream, a renewed declaration of policy on this subject should be made. The Commission, doubtless, is cognizant of the difficulties between the Bureau of Reclamation and the residents of the San Joaquin Valley in California. Evidence adduced in court shows that before the Friant Dam was constructed the Bureau assured the people of the valley that their riparian and appropriative rights to water in the river would not be disturbed by the construction of the dam and to the extent that those rights existed independently of the dam they would be honored and respected by the Government. After the dam was completed litigation was instituted in which the Bureau of Reclamation, represented by the Department of Justice, is insisting that because the stream is navigable the Government owns paramount rights to the water, and that all so-called riparian rights existing because of the location of the land on the banks of the river and all so-called appropriative rights theretofore granted by the State of California must fall, although the question of navigation is not involved in the proceeding. No doubt the Commission will feel that this situation should be clarified.

May I remind you that in the President's speech at Grand Coulee Dam on May 11, 1950, in connection with his remarks on the proposed Columbia Valley Administration, he emphasized the fact that in the western part of the country as distinguished from the needs in the East, special consideration should be given to private rights in the water of the streams. After concluding his comments on the Tennessee Valley Authority he said:

"We have worked out a set of recommendations for a Columbia Valley Administration which builds on that successful experience but recognized the different circumstances out here. Take one simple example. In this area, a farmer's right to the use of water is vital to his livelihood, and is protected by State laws. That is the way it should be, and the Columbia Valley Administration I have recommended would have no power to tamper with anyone's water rights."

By the same token the Congress should make it crystal clear that no one connected with any branch of the United States Government whether it be the proposed Columbia Valley Administration or otherwise shall have power to tamper with anyone's water rights We believe that this Commission will conclude that such doctrine is worthy of recommendation to the Congress.

3. Obviously, the necessity for soil conservation is inseparable from flood control and water conservation.

Comment

The United States Government is doing such an excellent job in its soil conservation program operating principally through the Department of Agriculture, and to some extent through other agencies, that extended comment is unnecessary. The importance of stopping every drop of water as close as possible to the place where it falls is so well recognized that emphasis is superfluous. One reason impelling this observation by Texas is that during the first hundred years of civilized agriculture in our State three-fourths of the top soil of our watersheds has been washed into the Gulf of Mexico. Fortunately this condition is being improved under the organized soil conservation program, but it takes many years to restore the soil which is carried away by a 24-hour flood.

4. Floods do not recognize State lines, but our rivers in their uncontrolled and natural condition have never obliterated the boundaries of the States. It is believed that flood waters can be stored and managed in such way that sovereignty of the States will not be washed away in the process.

5. A comprehensive flood control and water conservation program must be on the basis of the whole watershed of a stream. We believe that this can be accomplished best as to an interstate stream through employment of designated agencies of the Government in cooperation with the officials of the respective States, and to the extent necessary to adjust equities between or among the States, through the service of interstate compact commissioners. We do not feel that the employment of authorities or administrators having jurisdiction of areas created without respect to State boundaries is essential.

Comment

We realize that this item is controversial. There are persuasive arguments in favor of the so-called regional river authority which would have jurisdiction over territory situated in two or more States. It is conceivable that if such a project were operated by one man or by three men the expense would be less and time saved by avoiding the necessity of consulting with the component States situated within his or their jurisdiction. A fair answer to that argument is that a great deal of time and money could be saved to taxpayers of the United States by vesting complete powers of government in one man or in a three-man commission. Thus would be obviated the expense of a Congress, the delays and expense of our court systems, and the tremendous expense, delays, and duplication of effort in the many bureaus and agencies of the executive department. But we hold to the principle that even though a democracy is the most expensive form of government, still we are willing to pay perhaps 25 percent more cost and put up with 50 percent more delay in the processes of our Government rather than give a power of attorney for all governmental functions to a single man or commission.

When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, the States yielded sufficient of their individual prerogatives of sovereignty to permit the formation of the Union. There doesn't seem to be any invitation in the Constitution for the Government to dissect the area of the United States into segments comprising groups of States or parts of two or more States which would have authority or power to determine the economic life and substantial rights of the people of those particular groups of States or areas.

We believe that the Congress should refrain from an attempt to create the so-called regional authorities until it has been demonstrated that the objectives cannot be accomplished satisfactorily through cooperative efforts of the representatives of the Government and the individual States or the coordinated efforts of representatives of the several States which may be involved in a given problem. It occurs to us that the arrangement now in effect as to the flood-control and conservation program in the Missouri Valley is adequate. Here the governors of the several States are working with the representatives of departments of the United States Government on the vast program. The job is being done without surrender by the States.

Particular attention should be given to the use of interstate compacts in working out problems of this kind. Texas has had great success in working through interstate compact commissioners and feels that the remaining interstate problems will be worked out satisfactorily through compact commissions recently authorized. It would appear that little, if any, argument is needed to support this recommendation.

In short, if there are to be any Federal regional authorities, borrowing an expression from a prominent Hollywood executive, Texas prefers to be included out of them.

6. In all instances where a watershed is confined wholly within, or where the contributing portion of the watershed is situated within, a single State, all water stored in any flood control or water conservation program for such watershed, should be owned and used in accordance with the laws of the State.

Comment

Acting under constitutional mandate (1917), the Texas Legislature has created its several agencies, each vested with full power to perform all flood-control and conservation duties in the watershed involved. Through agencies of this kind the State is approaching the complete control of the Colorado River of Texas. It is in process of controlling the Brazos River. The Brazos agency is cooperating closely with the Corps of Engineers of the Army in its program. Much work is being done by other so-called districts and State authorities created by the legislature. Attention is called to this matter because there has been some effort by Members of Congress from other States to include the watersheds situated in the State of Texas in an administration or authority which would be created to regulate and conserve the waters of the Arkansas River Valley. A glance at a watershed map of the State of Texas incorporated as exhibit No. 1 will show that all of the rivers in the State of Texas with the exception of our boundary rivers (interstate and international) have their respective sources within the boundaries of the State and discharge their flow into the Gulf of Mexico. Because our rivers could have no effect whatsoever upon the flood or conservation problems of any other State, it is inconceivable that the Congress would consider seriously superimposing over Texas an administrative body which, among its duties, would have jurisdiction over the watersheds of the State. This is especially so since the State is in the midst of its own vast program for the control of the floods and for the conservation of the waters in its several watersheds. The State's program is progressing satisfactorily. The Army which is effecting the Government's flood-control program in Texas is working in full harmony with the State agencies. It is believed that at the next session of the legislature, serious consideration will be given to vast expansion of the State's water conservation program.

Even as to our boundary rivers our international and interstate problems have either been solved or are well on the way to solution.

The State of Texas is affected by one international water treaty—that between the United States of America and the United Mexican States relating to the utilization of the waters of Colorado and Tijuana Rivers, and those of the Rio Grande from Fort Quitman, Tex., to the Gulf of Mexico. This treaty was consummated and became effective November 8, 1945. As a result three large dams are to be constructed jointly on the Rio Grande, one of which is expected to be under construction during 1950. The water in these dams allotted to the United States will be administered under Texas laws.

The State of Texas is also a party to two interstate compacts—the Rio Grande compact, affecting the Rio Grande above Fort Quitman, and the Pecos River compact.

Congress has authorized the States of Texas, Oklahoma, and New Mexico to negotiate a compact on the diversion of the waters of the Canadian River, and the compact commission is already actively engaged in the formation of this compact.

H. R. 8873 has been introduced to Congress asking for the consent of Congress to the negotiation of a compact relating to the waters of the Red River by the States of Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, and a similar resolution will be introduced within the next few days affecting the waters of the Sabine River between the States of Louisiana and Texas.

7. The Federal law should make provision for cash reimbursement to a State or a State agency which constructs a multiple purpose dam to the extent of the approved cost of that part of the structure, incurred and effective for flood control, provided that the amount reimbursable and the State's plan for the operation of the flood-control facilities of the structure shall have first been approved by the agency of the Government charged with the duty of operating flood-control facilities in that vicinity.

Comment

There are and will be instances where a flood control and conservation agency of a State is planning a multiple purpose dam which with slight modification could be made to serve a very useful objective of the Federal Government in its flood-control program. This is especially so if the State's project is situated upstream from other units projected by the Federal Government. In such instances it should be possible to effect a real economy. The Federal Government should make a contribution to the cost of the State's unit to the extent that the Government itself would be relieved from providing similar capacity on the stream. To illustrate the point your attention is directed to pending Senate bill 3432 by Senators KERR and THOMAS of Oklahoma. This bill seeks to modify the Government's general plan for improving the Arkansas River basin by authorizing the appropriation of $7,000,000 to be paid to the Grand River Dam Authority of the State of Oklahoma as the Government's contribution for the flood-storage capacity of Markham Dam which is to be constructed by the State agency. We have in mind similar instances in Texas. Doubtless there are instances in several other States. Why duplicate the effort of a State agency if a real economy can be effected by the Government in contributing a part of the cost of the State unit?

8. We feel that the Reclamation Act should be amended in harmony with what appears to be its original intent, to the end that the legal title to a project should remain in the United States until it has received reimbursement of the capital cost of the facilities; but that throughout the repayment period the equitable title to such facilities be vested in the landowners. The contract should provide that upon repayment to the Government its cost both the legal and equitable title should be vested in such landowners without the necessity of any affirmative action by the Government or by the Congress.

9. We feel that the Reclamation Act should be further amended in harmony with the recommendations heretofore made to the Commission by the Texas Water Conservation Association in its presentation to the Commission, dated April 28, 1950. An excerpt from the presentation by the association, proposing such amendments to the Reclamation Act is attached hereto as exhibit 2.

Comment

Reclamation projects of the United States Government are financed by the Government on the assumption that during the term of the contract with the landowners or their representatives the Government will receive payments which will liquidate the Government's cost of the project. We believe the Reclamation Act of 1902 is sufficient authority to justify quit-claiming these improvements to the people who have paid the bill as soon as the Government gets its money back. The 1939 amendment to the Reclamation Act seemingly permits contracts which could extend beyond the repayment period. At any rate, the Bureau of Reclamation does not appear particularly anxious to deed, or otherwise divest itself of title to, the properties after the projects have been fully paid out. As to new projects which are under consideration by the Congress designed with the praiseworthy purpose of affording municipal water supply, the status of the title to the properties after the subscribing municipalities shall have repaid to the Government the full cost of the project is not clear. The Bureau of Reclamation, sponsoring these projects suggests that it should be the responsibility of Congress after the entire repayment has been made to quitclaim the interest of the Government to the municipalities which have paid for the projects. In those instances, as well as in all other instances, we think it should be made crystal clear by Congress that when the Government has received reimbursement for reclamation projects (whether primarily for irrigation or for municipal storage) the title should be recognized as in the people or the agencies which have paid for the projects.

Without some amendment to the Reclamation Act we believe there will be minimum use of the Bureau's facilities in Texas, at least on the major rivers. Waters stored on Texas rivers for irrigation purposes (except the Rio Grande which is an international stream) would be used principally in the extreme southern part of the State for rice culture. Because of the inherent nature of the crop requiring rotation of land use (2 years in crop and 3 years fallow), there can be no 160- nor 320-acre rice farms. Rice can be grown successfully only in large acreages and in large ownerships. So long as it is the principal crop the 160-acre limitation will prevent extensive operations of the Bureau in Texas. This is so likewise as to pasture lands which otherwise could be irrigated very successfully.

10. The Federal Power Act should be amended so as to remove obvious impediments to the active cooperation by States in the water conservation and flood control program of the country. The following amendments are suggested:

(a) No State, agency of a State, municipality or other public body should be required to obtain a license from the Federal Power Commission before constructing a dam at which power will be developed unless there is a finding by the Department of the Army that the structure will affect adversely navigation on the stream;

(b) The provisions of the Federal Power Act under which the United States Government would have the right to recapture a dam and other works owned by a State, a State agency, municipality or other public body, after the expiration of the license should be repealed.

Comment

There is probably sound reason for regulating under license a power project owned and operated by a private utility company; but the reason does not exist in the instance of a power project of a State or a State-owned or sponsored agency. This is manifestly so if the project is not to be situated on Government-owned lands. In its original conception the Federal Power Act (formerly the Water Power Act) was enacted to protect the interests of the United States in instances wherein private utility companies were preempting through special legislation valuable power sites on Government-owned land. The late President Theodore Roosevelt urged the passage of legislation which would regulate under general law the granting, in the future, of these valuable rights, which previously had been conferred by Congress through special legislation without any material consideration to the Government. The provisions of the law as now written are applicable to public bodies as well as to private interests. Where Government lands are not involved it is difficult to see why public agencies should be required to take out such licenses. For that reason we think that the provision requiring the license should be restricted to those cases only where the structure might be injurious to navigation. In such instances the license would be withheld until facilities to accommodate navigation could be installed.

Certainly there is no real justification for the Government to have the right to take at its "net investment" a State-owned project at the expiration of the 50-year license. This means in effect that the Government would be permitted to take over (without reference to its value) without pay a State-owned project, because within 50 years a project of this kind would ordinarily be fully depreciated. If the investment is depreciated at 2 percent per year it will be fully depreciated at the end of the 50-year license even though the project itself may have another 100 years of useful life, because it is the policy of owners of these projects to maintain the properties in good operating condition.

At this time the Brazos district, mentioned in another part of this statement, has completed all of its plans and the financing for the construction of three small dams at which hydroelectric power will be developed. The Federal Government is making no contribution whatever to the construction of these units, and the district proposes to liquidate the entire construction cost by pledging the net operating revenues of the dams for a period of 30 years. It has filed a declaration of intent with the Federal Power Commission as required by law. While it is conceded that the construction of these units can have no practical or material effect on the navigability of the stream, if the Federal Power Commission finds that the construction will "affect" the navigability of the stream either adversely or favorably, the district cannot proceed with its construction program until it applies for and receives a license from the Federal Power Commission. The attorney general of Texas has advised the district that it cannot legally accept such license because of the recapture provisions. Under the State law any net profits after payment of its indebtedness earned by the district belongs to the general fund of the State of Texas. So the attorney general holds that the district cannot jeopardize the State's property to recapture by the Federal Government as is required under the Federal Power Commission Act as now written. So if the Federal Power Commission finds that it has jurisdiction over these three dams, they cannot be built. The power the dams would develop and the water they would conserve will be lost. Also, the net earning power of the dams in the amount of $1,250,000 per year would be lost. Furthermore, a finding that the Federal Power Commission has jurisdiction over these three dams will likewise cause the inability of the district and the State to construct three additional dams in west Texas which would doubtless be subject to the same ruling. For these reasons and because other States and public agencies in the country are affected, we recommend the proposed amendments.

11. We feel that, to the extent permitted by the Constitution, Congress in determining the feasibility of a multiple-purpose dam, should place greater emphasis on the value of water storage for industrial and municipal purposes.

Comment

Under general law, the Corps of Engineers of the Army, in determining the feasibility of a dam, is not permitted to take into actual consideration the value of storage capacity which may later be sold to municipalities and to industries for water supply. We feel that because of the recognized shortage and increased use of water for domestic, municipal, and industrial purposes throughout the Nation, a new emphasis should be placed on the value of such storage.

An acre-foot of water, stored where it can be used economically, will yield: In electric energy at 5 mills per kilowatt-hour, 45 cents; for irrigation use 75 cents to $1; for municipal use at 2 cents per thousand gallons, $6.40. So there is every reason to accord a very high value to storage facilities which will be used for municipal and domestic purposes. We believe the encouragement of such procedure is in line with the Commission's objectives. The States should be interested in working out financing arrangements under which they might purchase such storage rights at Government owned dams, thus assuring a needed supply for their people. Moreover, water thus stored would remain under the control of the State. It is believed that Texas would give interested consideration to cooperating with the Government in financing the cost of such storage at Government dams.

EXHIBIT 2 TO RECOMMENDATIONS BY STATE OF TEXAS (AN EXCERPT FROM STATEMENT FILED BY TEXAS WATER CONSERVATION ASSOCIATION DATED APRIL 28, 1950)

Amend the National Reclamation Act so as to—

1. Eliminate the automatic authorization of projects by the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 9 (a) of the 1939 Reclamation Project Act permits the Secretary of the Interior to authorize construction of a project, without action by Congress, when it will pass certain standards of feasibility. When the Secretary finds that the project will pay out under any form of contract which he is authorized to make, then he can authorize it.

All reclamation projects should be authorized by the Congress with Congress fixing the repayment period on irrigation features, based on a reasonable number of years within the useful life of the project. The nonreimbursable costs should be based on a reasonable number of years within the useful life of the project at the going cost of Government money.

2. Eliminate the open end or service type of contract permitted under section 9 (e) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939.

Section 9 (e) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 permits the Secretary of the Interior to make contracts with water users which would establish to the United States in perpetuity as a public utility in the distribution of water on a rental basis. The term of such contracts cannot exceed 40 years, and at the end of the term the contracting organization and water users therein would have no right to continued water service, and no right to renewal, or to negotiate a new contract except upon terms and conditions acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior.

Such contracts violate and nullify the fundamental policy established by the Congress in the Federal reclamation law assuring water user organizations contracting pursuant thereto, permanent water rights appurtenant to the land based on beneficial use, and providing for control by them of their distribution facilities.

Section 9 (e) should be amended so as to permit, at the option of the water users, a conversion from the 9 (e) to the 9 (d) contract when repayment can be completed within a 40-year term. This association believes that, at the option of the water users, this will terminate the so-called open end features of the 9 (e) contracts.

3. It should also be provided that when a 9 (e) contract is first entered into it shall include the terms and conditions later to be included in a 9 (d) contract, which shall have been determined and included, as far as practicable, in the first contract entered into under this section 9 (e).

4. The act should limit the renewal of 9 (e) contracts, and unless the automatic authorization of projects by the Secretary of the Interior is eliminated, then the law should be amended so as to fix a definite period in which the reimbursable costs of a project must be repaid.

5. Limit the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to acquire lands by condemnation or otherwise for recreational purposes without first obtaining the consent of the local taxing unit.

6. Eliminate economic control over the project or the water users by the Secretary of the Interior by amending section 6, Reclamation Project Act, 1939, thus eliminating under this section the authority of the Secretary to require certain cropping practices as directed by the Secretary of the Interior.

7. Repeal 160-acre land-limitation provisions of Reclamation Act.

The land-limitation provisions of the Reclamation Act were enacted primarily to facilitate the settlement of public lands in the arid areas of the Western States, and to prevent speculation therein. In many projects under contemplation or construction by the Bureau of Reclamation there is little public land and the larger part of the areas to be served consists of lands in private ownership for which only a supplemental water supply will be furnished.

Any attempt to enforce the 160-acre land-limitation provisions on projects which will furnish a supplemental water supply to private lands having an existing economy built up over a period of many decades in which the pattern of land ownership is the result of economic development created by private capital, enterprise, and initiative, is unjust, unworkable, discriminatory, and confiscatory.

In Texas, which is not a public-land State, there are under irrigation more than 2,884,000 acres of land developed by local districts and private enterprises. This includes thousands of acres of rice lands which cannot be cultivated to rice year in and year out; the better practice is to farm rice 2 years and pasture the land 3 years. The 160-acre limitation is wholly unworkable in the Rice Belt. In other areas, like the ranching area, 160 acres is not an economic unit.

EXHIBIT 3 TO RECOMMENDATIONS BY THE STATE OF TEXAS (AN EXCERPT FROM THE REPORT OF THE IRRIGATION TASK FORCE (P. 18) OF THE JOINT ENGINEERS' COUNCIL)

Development of the water resources of the United States in the best interests of all of its citizens requires that no distinction be made between different types of projects nor between projects of different size. The same fundamentals must govern in each case and their application must be consistent.

Those who benefit from the construction of a project should bear the burden of its cost in proportion to the benefits received, and there should be no difference between the obligations of immediate beneficiaries on irrigation projects and the obligations of such beneficiaries on other projects.

Irrespective of the purpose or function for which nonreimbursable expenditures are made or subsidies are granted by the Federal Government, each should be subjected to the test of what is best in the national interest. The test requires that the benefits to be derived from each such nonreimbursable expenditure or other subsidy should be greater than the benefits which would accrue from the expenditure of a like sum for any other purposes or at any other location in the United States.

While conservation and control of the waters of the United States is in the national interest, the construction of works for such purposes is not necessarily the function of the Federal Government. On the contrary, that which can be done by the individual should be done by him, and that which requires collective action should be done at the lowest governmental level practicable. The Federal Government should intervene only when and to the extent that the collective action of all the people of the Nation is necessary to the orderly development of the water resources of the United States.

Beer for Our Fighting Men in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, press dispatches indicate that somewhere along the line an order has been issued which deprives our American fighting forces in Korea of beer, the safe and wholesome food drink. The order is one that disturbes me and it should be made one of great concern to the American people, for if it is not promptly rescinded its effect will be reflected in sharply increased casualty lists from the battle front. Everybody knows that the people in Korea and the Far East drink tea, not water, because streams, rivers and lakes all are dangerously polluted and the water is for obvious reasons unfit for human consumption. The oriental people are smart enough not to use water for drinking purposes.

To force our American troops, especially on the battle front, to drink water from these sources is the equivalent of an attack from the rear by infiltration. Water in Korea is deadlier than bullets. No amount of prophylactic precautions can safeguard the lives of our fighting men against typhus, cholera, and deadly dysentery in various forms, if our men must quench their thirst with polluted water. To issue beer to our fighting men as a health and safety measure will not compel all of our troops to drink it. Those who still prefer polluted water likely as not can have it, if under fire it is available. But men who prefer to drink beer which gives energy and quenches thirst ought to be privileged to have it when in the discretion of the commanding general, in conformity with the order, the needs of the fighting men require the substitute.

There is nothing sinful about a drink of beer, but it is the equivalent of a death sentence to force our fighting men exposed to shot and shell in the battle lines to drink polluted water. I surmise that this order stems from some narrow and bigoted source. If this is true somebody should be either court martialed or impeached. The order is not in the interests of the safety of our men and should be immediately countermanded.

It is a matter of common knowledge the world over since beer was first produced over 6,000 years ago that beer is a food. Everyone knows that beer is a part of the daily rations of the working man. The average 12-ounce bottle or can of beer contains about 160 food calories.

Dr. Howard W. Haggard, long-time professor of applied physiology at Yale University and one of the world's best-known nutrition experts, is quoted in the following:

A food is a substance which, when eaten, supplies the body with nourishment and with energy for warmth and movement. Beer satisfies this definition and is in every sense a food.

It has been a well-known fact to everyone that beer has not only served as a beverage for a workingman's lunch, but has, like milk, added many valuable nutritional elements to that meal. As early as 1784 Benjamin Rush called attention to the nutritional values of beer. He pointed out that many of the poor people of Great Britain had endured hard labor with no other food than a couple of pints of beer with a few pounds of bread.

Food is measured by its contents of nutritional elements essential to good health. These are energy or fuel foods (carbohydrates or fats), protein, minerals, vitamins, and bulk. No single food supplies all these nutritional requirements of the body. Upon analyzing the nutritional values of beer, we find that beer compares favorably with most of the common foods.

Beer is essentially an extract or broth of cereal grains which have been first treated to render their carbohydrates soluble. Beer, therefore, contains most of the food values of grain products, that is, carbohydrates, minerals, and some protein.

In a pint of beer there are approximately as many calories as in a pint of pea soup. Beer contains 90.6 percent of water, but grapefruit, rhubarb, strawberries, asparagus, spinach, tomatoes, cabbage, and lettuce, to mention only a few other foods, contain a higher percentage of water. Even meat, such as chicken or beef, contains from 68 to 78 percent of water, and milk contains 88 percent.

Proteins: Beer contains about 0.5 percent of protein. This is only about one-seventh of the protein content in milk, but milk is a protein food and, therefore, is rich in this element, but beer contains more protein than apples and approximately as much protein as oranges, rhubarb, and grapefruit, and slightly less than tomatoes, strawberries, and carrots.

Minerals: Beer contains many of the minerals of the grains from which it is made, such as phosphorus and potassium. Most foods have one or two minerals, but never all of them.

Vitamins: Beer likewise contains the general vitamins of the grains from which it is made and lacks only those vitamins which the grains lack. Thus, beer contains adequate amounts of the vitamin-B complex, such as riboflavin, nicotinic acid, and pyridoxin.

Bulk: The bulk in beer is approximately the same as the bulk in milk.

Alcohol: Beer contains 3.2 to 3.7 percent alcohol. Beer is not unique as a food containing alcohol, for raised bread often contains some and occasionally will contain as much as one-sixth as much as that in beer. Many puddings and other desserts contain very appreciable amounts of alcohol from the flavoring extracts added to them.

People of all times have instinctively realized the nutrient value of beer. Their sound instinct has now been substantiated by modern science in the form of chemical research which has proven that beer has been found to contain as much of the nutritional values as are found in the common foods. This cannot be said about any other beverage, with the exception of milk. Beer is a beverage, but, like milk, it is a food.

I have today placed a bill in the legislative hopper directing the Secretary of Defense by law to provide a daily ration of beer to our fighting men in Korea and elsewhere, whenever and wherever the health and welfare of our fighting men may require it. This applies particularly to Korea at the present time, but will be applicable wherever polluted water endangers the lives of our combat troops.

Acceptance Speech by Walter A. Lynch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES J. DELANEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by Hon. WALTER A. LYNCH, of New York, appearing in the New York Times of September 8, 1950:

TEXT OF ACCEPTANCE SPEECH BY LYNCH

ROCHESTER, N. Y., September 7.—Following is the text of today's speech by Representative WALTER A. LYNCH, accepting nomination as the Democratic candidate for Governor:

"My heartfelt thanks are yours for the great honor you have bestowed upon me. I am proud to be the Democratic candidate for Governor of the State of New York. Proud, because I know that I shall follow that traditionally great army of Democratic Governors, Alfred E Smith, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Herbert H. Lehman. Proud, also, because,, like them, I shall be Governor of all the people of the State and not just a small segment of our citizens.

"The time has come for us to take stock. In the last 8 years the State has amassed the greatest revenues in our history. But during the same period we have seen the greatest spending. Who profited by all this? I know that I didn't, and you didn't, either. Your State taxes went up, so did mine.

"We were promised and we expected to get more schools, more hospitals, more social services. Where are they? We just didn't get them from the Republicans. The large corporations and bankers got what they wanted. That is why they spend so much money trying to keep the Republicans in power.

"Unlike the Democrats, whose feeling is with all the people, the Republicans represent now, as always, that small privileged class which has sought, for its own advantage, to have influence in government. It is the same kind of support the Republicans have had in national campaigns. It was the same kind of vicious campaign this coalition of Republicans and bankers ran against our beloved Democratic President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

"They failed. It was the same kind of unholy combination of Republicans and bankers which had sought to unseat our great President Harry S. Truman 2 years ago. They failed again, but they still keep coming back. Trying the same tricks all over again. In their candidate for Governor these Republican bankers hope yet to gain control of the Federal Government. They have attempted it twice with the same candidate, and 1952 is only 2 years off. The Republican Governor, denied ambition for the Presidency before the 1944 and the 1948 national campaigns, and here we go again.

"As for myself, I have no such ambitions. I am a candidate for Governor. My sole desire is to be a governor worthy of all the people of the State. I cannot foretell the future, but I hope to stay in Albany a long time. I shall not have a personal publicity bureau to help me to higher national office.

"But I will attend to State business and only that; it is a full-time job and you'll find me at it full time. That's what Al Smith did, that's what Roosevelt did, that's what Lehman did. And I'll be following in their footsteps.

"It is about time we had a Governor who thought of his office as a place of work for the people of the State and not as a personal steppingstone. And you are going to have such a man in me.

"They tell me that the Republican candidate is going to run his campaign on national issues, not on State issues. Is he afraid to face the questions the people are asking about 8 years of inefficiency in Albany? Is it because he cannot account for such things as the disappearance of the $700,000,000 postwar reconstruction fund, or give straightforward answers to why there aren't enough schools for our children or public housing for our veterans or hospitals for our sick? I intend to talk about these things during my campaign. The people of New York State want something done about these things that affect them so vitally.

"If this were a national campaign, national issues would have their proper place. I discussed them when I ran for Congress every 2 years. And after many years in Washington I know that our national Democratic administration under President Truman has been courageous, forceful, and progressive both in its domestic policies and in our relations with the rest of the world. The United Nations, the North Atlantic Pact, the Marshall plan, point 4, and the other programs have all been the result of our national administration's planning. And I have had a part in their enactment. President Truman needs no defense.

"The only effect of the Republicans talking about Federal issues and not State issues is to break up the present unity of Americans in our fight against world communism. It is purely politics; that can only help the enemy. Let us remain united as a Nation and confine ourselves in this State election to the issues at hand.

"The people of this State have caught on to slick slogans, 'local home rule' with mandatory education expense items is just a phrase. But that's the kind of home rule with which this administration has been saddling the people.

"The people have caught on to promises on a cash-paid Thruway in 1947, only to find no cash in 1950. If you want that road now, you'll have to get it by a bond issue plus Federal aid. The people have caught on to promises of thousands of additional beds in mental institutions only to find less than 200 more provided. The people have caught on to claims of economy and reduced budgets. They are wiser today than they were 4 years ago. They will be wiser as the campaign goes on.

"Let me tell you this: I am known well by the people of the district I represent in Congress. They know of my devotion to work and to them. They have seen me in action in that great borough of the Bronx and they know all of my accomplishments in Congress. I don't have to tell them. And before this campaign is over, I will be known as well by all the people of the State. And don't forget that. I am going to tell all the people of our State what is wrong with this Republican administration and what I am going to do about it as governor.

"I will see, and meet, and talk with the farmer, the businessman, the housewife, and the workingman from Niagara Falls to Montauk Point. They can then judge for themselves whether they want a man in Albany who believes in the things in which they believe.

"I accept the nomination with sober respect for what is expected of a candidate for governor. I am mindful of the responsibilities entailed in the office of the chief executive of this great State. I have never been awed by responsibilities. And my record attests to the fact that I have shouldered them well. I do not intend to change my ways as Governor.

"With divine guidance and your help, the people of the State will have a good Democratic administration, come the first of next year."

Land Reforms by the Republic Would Rob Communists of Their Biggest Point in the Philippines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I have tried to understand why communism is embraced by people without knowing much about it. The trouble now in the Philippine Islands where a great many are flocking to communism can be explained by looking into their feudal land system. A careful examination will indicate that the land question is back of this Soviet movement. People who are landless, hungry, and destitute will follow any movement that insures them life.

Ramond R. Ravanzo, civil engineer, Republic of Philippines, explained the trouble there in the following statement recently published:

Present communistic unrest in the Philippines stems from conditions which had their beginning during the Spanish control of the islands. Large land grants were given individuals who were in the favor of the government and are still held by descendants of those people. The church also holds large areas of agricultural lands. In many instances the population of several villages and the surrounding agricultural lands are tenants of rich landowners or the church. The people were not allowed to migrate freely over the islands and are now too poor to do so. Private holdings of small landowners which were once adequate for the support of the family have been so divided by inheritance that it is no longer possible for individual landowners to make a living on their small tracts, and they must seek other employment in order to exist. Wages for common labor range from about 87 cents to $1.25 per day. Since commodities which they must buy come principally from the United States and must be purchased at prices comparable to, or higher than, our present inflated level, it is understandable under such conditions that the Communist doctrines are being accepted by some of these people.

It is apparent now that if Chiang Kai-shek had instituted land reforms in China, and not left that for the Communists to do, he would now be presiding over China instead of being chased out of the country.

Lawrenceville Tobacco Festival

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WATKINS M. ABBITT
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure last week of attending the tobacco festival at Lawrenceville, in the county of Brunswick, State of Virginia. Under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I herewith insert an address I made on that occasion:

LAWRENCEVILLE TOBACCO FESTIVAL

It is a great privilege to be here today among my friends of Brunswick County. I am highly honored to participate in the celebration of your tobacco festival, and to share this platform with the charming and beautiful ladies from whom will be chosen the tobacco princess. You were most generous in extending me the invitation to be with you at this time.

I would like to say a few words about the part that tobacco has played in the development of south-side Virginia. It is impossible here to fully cover the complete story of tobacco in our great Commonwealth. But a few brief statements may serve to remind us of the importance of tobacco to our forefathers, and to those of us who are fortunate enough to live here today.

We are proud of the fact that tobacco was first successfully cultivated in North America at Jamestown in the year 1612. The early years of the colony had been marked by very troublous times. Disease and the failure of food crops had taken their toll. The very life of the settlement was at stake. There was no cash crop upon which the colonists could depend for export to the mother country in exchange for the manufactured products they so urgently required. It was John Rolfe who first recognized the need for a staple crop—easily grown and sold abroad. Tobacco filled that need, and virtually guaranteed the permanence of the colony that was later to become the Commonwealth of Virginia.

From the early beginnings in Virginia, tobacco production increased rapidly to meet the ever-increasing European demand. For many years it was about the only commodity that could be sold abroad to purchase manufactured articles which colonists were not able to produce themselves. In 1615, about 2,300 pounds were shipped from the colony to London. In 1622, the total was 500,000 pounds; by 1640 the total shipped from Virginia reached 1,500,000 pounds. By the end of the seventeenth century, the colonies of Virginia and Maryland together were sending about 35,000,000 pounds abroad each year, about two-thirds of which was from Virginia.

Tobacco was not only important to the export trade of Virginia during those early years, it was the medium of exchange for our domestic economy. Tobacco was money. Debts were contracted in terms of tobacco. Ministers, merchants, lawyers, physicians, all were paid for their goods and services with tobacco. According to historians, when a shipload of brides-to-be arrived in the colony in 1619, widowers and bachelors paid for their passage with tobacco. In order to marry one of these ladies, the gentleman had to redeem her with 120 pounds of leaf.

As tobacco production increased to meet the greater demand from abroad, problems some of which are similar to those we are currently confronted with beset the grower. The history of the first century of tobacco production in Virginia is replete with periods of overproduction, disastrously low prices, poor-quality production, and foreign competition. It is interesting to note in passing that the attempted solutions to these difficulties were quite similar to those we have used--much more successfully--in recent years.

In 1619, more than 300 years ago, the Virginia Assembly provided for the establishment of an inspection system designed to eliminate tobacco of poor quality from the market. Inspectors were required to burn tobacco of inferior quality. This didn't work out too well apparently, although inspection laws were on the books off and on throughout the 1600's.

High prices in the very early days resulted in a sharp increase in production. As a consequence, surpluses and low prices immediately followed. Under these circumstances production controls were resorted to, and with the help of these, and the weather, the surplus was reduced and some increases in prices were noted. This cycle was repeated a number of times. (Compare and contrast problems and solutions during the colonial period with current decade.) Some of the production controls are very interesting to look back upon. One was a limitation upon the number of plants that could be grown by a family; another upon the number of leaves that could be harvested from each plant; still another was a complete prohibition on planting during the year 1666. Along with the efforts to limit production various price-fixing measures were attempted in order to assure growers a reasonable return. History fails to record whether all these ventures were entirely successful. In any event, production and exports continued upward, and tobacco continued to be the chief article of commerce.

During the pre-Revolutionary period, tobacco was closely linked with political, fiscal, and commercial developments in England—which was then, as now, the major foreign market for tobacco exports. Tobacco growers fought vigorously the English navigation laws designed to direct all trade in tobacco to England, where merchants could and did pay less for the leaf than those in other countries; they protested the high excise taxes upon imports of leaf; the welfare of tobacco growers was closely involved with British politics. But in general, throughout the period, the British market provided Virginian tobacco growers with a virtually guaranteed outlet at fair prices.

So much for the early history of tobacco in Virginia. Much progress has been made over the past 300 years. We have come a long way from the year 1612 when John Rolfe first planted tobacco successfully, and was able to harvest a few hundred pounds. The road has been a long one—at times very difficult—but tobacco has been throughout our history one of our most important agricultural commodities, one of the mainstays of our economic life.

This year—1950—should be one of the most prosperous years in history for our tobacco farmers. (In making this statement I am fully aware of the difficulties being experienced by producers of the dark types of tobacco.) According to the latest crop report released by the United States Department of Agriculture, the farmers of Virginia have produced nearly 150,000,000 pounds of tobacco. I am including all kinds of tobacco in the figure—flue-cured, fire-cured, burley and sun-cured.

We know something about 1950 prices for flue-cured tobacco. For the belts to the south of us, prices so far this season have been averaging better than 10 percent above full parity prices. If prices hold up—and I see no reason why they shouldn't—the flue-cured tobacco growers of this State should receive about $62,000,000 from the sale of their 1950 crop. If we add probable returns to other growers—from sales of fire-cured, burley and sun-cured, the total should be in the neighborhood of $77,000,000.

This will mean one of the highest returns in history to the tobacco grower of Virginia. It will keep tobacco in its rightful position as one of Virginia's most useful and profitable crops. It will mean good incomes, not only to the tobacco farmer who labors long and hard to produce it, but also to the merchant, the doctor, the sales clerk, the school teacher, the insurance man. Good prices to the tobaco grower will help to assure jobs and good income to all of us.

Although other agricultural commodities—livestock, grain, poultry, peanuts, fruits, and vegetables—have been important crops to our farmers, tobacco still plays an outstanding role in the total economy of Virginia. In fact, in recent years, the position of tobacco as a producer of farm income has become relatively more important. Just a few figures to prove my point. During the years 1925-29 the gross value of tobacco produced in Virginia was equal to about one-fourth of the State's income from farm crops. During 1945-49 tobacco's share rose to better than one-third. When we include the value of livestock, dairy products, and poultry—all the produce of our farms—one dollar out of every six received by our farmers during 1945-49 was represented by tobacco.

Now let's look for a minute at the importance of tobacco to Lawrenceville and Brunswick County. According to published census records, in 1929 the gross value of all farm products sold in Brunswick County amounted to $2,000,000. The value of tobacco produced here was slightly less than $900,000—representing approximately 45 percent of the total cash farm income. By 1945, however, the value of tobacco grown here in this county was more than $3,000,000, or 76 percent of the county's cash receipts from the sales of farm products. It probably will account for at least as high a share this year.

Our farmers here in Brunswick County have a good crop of leaf tobacco. About 8,000,000 pounds will be marketed, and growers should realize a total of about $4,400,000. I am including both flue-cured and fire-cured. The good prices you are going to receive for your tobacco mean much to everyone in Lawrenceville and to your neighbors in other parts of the county. For when the farmer prospers we all share in that prosperity. We have come a long way from the depression years of the early thirties when tobacco was bringing 6 to 8 cents a pound. For the crop of 1932 the total value of tobacco produced in all Virginia brought farmers only a little more than the 1950 crop will bring to the farmers of this single county of Brunswick. It sounds unbelievable, but records will bear me out.

What has brought about such a change? Why will this year's crop mean so much in the way of good incomes to farmers and others of us not only in Brunswick County, but throughout the tobacco land of the South?

You farmers, through your own efforts, have been largely instrumental in bringing about this great improvement. You have cooperated with each other and with your Government in a tobacco program that assures a reasonable return for labor expended in planting, cultivating, harvesting, and marketing your crop. "Tools" have been provided for the operation of the program. The "tools," consisting of inspection, loans, and marketing quotas, are effective only when applied together. You have recognized the necessity for this interdependence. You farmers are to be congratulated for having accepted your responsible roles in the promotion and operation of the tobacco programs. These programs, perhaps, have their shortcomings. But when we think back to the 1930's we recognize that our efforts along these lines have paid big dividends.

We can readily understand, when we review the economic situation, how important tobacco is to all of the people of Virginia. It will benefit the farmers in 1950 by paying them approximately $77,000,000. The income from payrolls and salaries of the employees of the various industries that process the tobacco amounted to approximately $60,500,000 in 1949. These same industries spent almost $577,300,000 in 1949 for materials utilized and the services expended in the manufacturing process of transforming the raw tobacco into the various products that we buy at the corner store. This process yields the most valuable commodity of the entire State, for the value of the output of the tobacco-manufacturing industry in Virginia for 1949 was $637,800,000.

Thus, we can see how very important the cultivation and manufacturing of tobacco is to the economy of Virginia. It benefits the farmers by paying them about $77 million for their efforts; it serves to the advantage of the men and women who work in the factories processing the tobacco to the tune of another $60 million in the form of wages and salaries; it serves the manufacturer of the tobacco products by accounting for about $637,800,000 in sales of the output.

In addition to the above, tobacco is the largest revenue-producing commodity to the Government by way of taxes than any commodity in existence.

I am also proud of the splendid tobacco market that you have here in Lawrenceville, it being the only market to increase its sales last year over the previous year and tied for the best price average in the belt.

In closing, I wish to express my pleasure in being here with you. It has been an honor to be a subject of your beautiful tobacco princess. It has been a privilege to say a few words about tobacco, which for more than 300 years has played an important part in shaping the destiny of our Commonwealth. I hope that, in the years to come, tobacco will continue its important role in providing the good things of life for the people of Virginia.

Society of American Foresters Celebrates 50 Years of Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WATKINS M. ABBITT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, in December 1950, the Society of American Foresters will celebrate 50 years of outstanding service to the American people. Forestry represents one of the greatest industries that this country has. It is one of the great natural resources that the American people possess and the Society of American Foresters is doing much to foster the proper development and management of this great American resource.

The Seaboard Airline Railroad Co.'s industrial department prepared an article dealing with the Society of American Foresters which was published in the Forestry Bulletin No. 22. The original article dealt with the growth of the society in both the Appalachian and Southeastern sections. This article was so well received that a revision has been prepared for the Nation at large and, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I herewith insert a copy of the revised article which I know will be of great value to those of us who are interested in forestry:

SOCIETY OF AMERICAN FORESTERS CELEBRATES 50 YEARS OF SERVICE—GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY MEETING TO BE DECEMBER 13–16, 1950

Celebrating its golden anniversary this year, the Society of American Foresters has shown a growth in membership and influence comparable to the growth of interest and activity in the development and management of the American forest resource. The society and its growth, moreover, has been the cause of the present acceptance of the economic soundness of scientific forestry, rather than its result.

Through the society's 50 years of service to the profession, its members have been studying and developing forestry knowledge applicable to the diverse timber stands and the rapidly changing economy of this country. European forestry knowledge, although forming a background for departure by American foresters, was found inapplicable to New World conditions unless considerably altered and improved. Thus members of the society, working as officers and scientists in Federal, State, or private employ, pioneered new methods of forest fire prevention and control, new methods of handling timber stands for maximum productivity of timber, and the management of related resources such as wildlife, soil and water, and recreational opportunities.

Today their knowledge and methods are being put to work by both public and private landowners. But still the search for new knowledge and better methods goes on, attempting to keep pace with the economic and social demands which bring increasing pressure against the forest resource.

During the first quarter of this century professional forestry expanded from near nonexistence to the point in 1925 when over 1,000 foresters were members of the Society. The second quarter-century saw a sixfold increase as total society membership reached 6,300 on August 1, 1950. The most phenomenal growth has been during the past 15 years, however, when membership in the professional forestry organization more than doubled. Significantly, this growth is closely related to the increased adoption of good forestry programs by owners of forest lands.

Membership in the society is made up of citizens of the United States and Canada and is restricted to persons who are professionally trained in forestry, those who have forestry experience equivalent to professional training, and those in related fields who have made outstanding contributions to forestry.

As a professional group, the society establishes and maintains the standards of forestry, provides a medium of exchange of professional thought, and promotes the science and practice of forestry. The members of the society's 21 regional sections, with their 60 chapters, meet periodically in those interests. Likewise, the society holds an annual meeting which is attended by members from all parts of the United States and Canada. The golden anniversary meeting of the Society of American Foresters will be held in Washington, D. C., on December 13 to 16, 1950.

The Journal of Forestry, official publication of the society, is the only professional publication in this country devoted entirely to the science and application of forestry. As such, it provides each month accurate information on new developments in all phases of forestry, and is widely used, not only by foresters, but by students and land managers.

As a means of promoting and developing the highest type of professional training for foresters, the society regularly examines the schools giving courses leading to a degree in forestry and has established an accrediting system. Schools accredited by the society are considered as having been given a stamp of professional approval.

Because of the many fields of American life to which the professional forester has been able to make contributions, there exists among foresters, as among other professional people, areas of specialization. For this reason, the society has found it desirable to establish subject-matter divisions in addition to its 21 regional sections. These divisions, which include education, silviculture, forest products, public relations, private forestry, forest economics, forest recreation, range management, forest-wildlife management, and watershed management, serve to bring together for exchange of knowledge the various specialists among foresters themselves. Through the formation of the divisions, the society has been able to increase the development and dissemination of forestry knowledge and methods.

Much of the work toward the objectives of the society is accomplished by a number of standing committees, including committees on civil service, forestry terminology, tree nomenclature, community forests, policies and objectives, international relations, ethics, and grade standardization of forest planting stock. In addition, representatives of the society serve for the society on various national and regional committees with other scientific organizations.

The impact of the work of the society is felt, although not always recognized, throughout the country, indeed, throughout the world. Although the society has its headquarters in the Mills Building, Washington, D. C., its leadership stems from every State in the country. Elected officers include a president and council of 10 outstanding foresters chosen by the membership at large, in addition to the elected officers of the 21 regional sections and 10 subject-matter divisions. Members of the society can be given considerable credit for the sound economic principles of forest management which are contributing in an increasing degree to the public welfare. You will meet the society member not only in the woods, but at the luncheon club, the civic association, the church, and the school; and if at that moment he happens not to be wearing the society's emblem pin, you'll be able to recognize him anyway by his sincere enthusiasm for the accomplishments of forestry and the possibilities for still greater accomplishments in the future.

Who Did Make American Foreign Policy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, on a previous occasion a little more than 3 months ago I directed attention to the column entitled "Pertinent Comment," which is written by Mr. Frank Saylor, editor of the Labor Herald. This outstanding labor newspaper is published weekly in Wilmington, Del.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, I said that Editor Saylor "expresses his views with thoroughgoing honesty, independence, and patriotism," and that "his incisive appraisals of matters of public interest are thought-provoking and merit the earnest attention and consideration of all of us."

I now reiterate those statements about Mr. Saylor and the Labor Herald, and as a further substantiation of those remarks I include in this statement a portion of Mr. Saylor's "Pertinent Comment" column from the issue of September 9, 1950. This column, you will note, deals with the refusal of American stevedores to unload a shipment of canned Russian crab meat brought in aboard a British liner and the President's criticism of the stevedores for their action.

Mr. Saylor's column follows, and I urge again that it be read most carefully:

PERTINENT COMMENT ON MATTERS OF LOCAL AND NATIONAL INTEREST

(By Frank Saylor)

When President Truman, critical of the refusal of New York longshoremen to unload 80 tons of canned Russian crab meat brought in by a British liner, declared that American foreign policy was not made by the stevedores, the stevedores came right back with the question of who did make American foreign policy?

The question, we believe, is quite pertinent. Who does make foreign policy? Who decides, after expensive backing of Nationalist China, to withdraw and leave it as a clear field for ruthless Red expansion? Who would have surrendered Korea and minimized the importance of Formosa in the military scheme of things? We dislike to bring the thought in again but how about Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam? Did the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate or Congress have anything to do with these commitments of the gravest import, or, for that matter, with what happened and now goes on afterward?

It is established union policy not to handle struck work or nonunion materials. From time immemorial union members have acted in accord with that policy without interference from the Government. It has long been common knowledge that Russian slave labor has been processing crab meat and furs which the Soviet Union barters with England in a trade deal. Despite this foreknowledge nothing was done about preventing the entrance of slave-produced crab meat into this country. That waited upon the direct action of the longshoremen.

The charges of slave labor within the Soviet domain, made time and again by representatives of organized labor, have never been denied, not to mention refuted. The charges therefore are tacitly admitted.

If the Government does not step in when unionists refuse to handle struck work why should they cavil at the refusal of the New York stevedores to handle the product of real slave labor?

In the 1930 Tariff Act it is provided that: "All goods, wares, articles, and other merchandise mined, produced, or manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor or/and forced labor or/and indentured labor under penal sanctions shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited." Doesn't that mean anything?

There is local and sectional interest in the attempt to import Red crab meat into the salty waters of the blue-clawed crab, the Delaware and Chesapeake bays.

Red crab meat has been coming into, of all places, Baltimore, where every day during the season is a crab feast, but we doubt whether the natives will go for it unless it is in a crab cake or salad. Lovers of crab meat who go for them steamed and enjoy the cleaning, won't do any trafficking with the Reds.

One shipment was landed several weeks ago, but after that a second cargo of 2,000 cases was not unloaded and went back to Britain. Again stevedores determined foreign policy.

We do not doubt that once unloaded there would be a market for the slave-produced crab meat, especially if it were to be priced accordingly. Locally crab meat costs over a dollar a pound and if it could be had for less, there would be plenty of buyers.

It is unfortunate that conditions are strained by the iron curtain between Russia and the world, that we and they cannot live in peaceful accord, the free labor of Russia producing crabs and furs in exchange for the product of the free labor of America. The Soviet ruling classes have decided this is not to be and the stevedores are answering them in the only language they will listen to.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with this matter of imports from Russia, I want to state again, as I have on other occasions, that our policy of foreign trade with Russia and satellite nations needs a complete review and realistic action. In addition, our present policy of shipments to Russia and other iron-curtain nations and recipients of ECA funds also needs immediate clarification and revision.

We all know now that within the past few months a substantial amount of molybdenum, which is used for hardening steel, was shipped from the United States to Great Britain under a Department of Commerce license and then immediately transshipped to Russia. Why, Mr. Speaker, was this permitted, and what assurance do we have that it will not reoccur?

In testimony submitted only last week to a subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it was stated that western European nations who are now receiving economic and military aid from the United States shipped more than $1,000,000,000 worth of goods to Russia and her satellites last year. This included in excess of $100,000,000 in war goods, such as machine tools, ball bearings, barbed wire, and brass, which were sent to Russia and her satellites from Great Britain. This testimony also stated that shipments to iron-curtain nations last year from Belgium, France, and Luxembourg included various metals, railway rolling stock, chemical products, explosives, and rubber. Again the questions are, Why is this permitted, and what steps are being taken to prevent a continuation of this policy?

Referring again to our own country, we find, for example, that Communist China received $50,000,000 through exports to this country in only the first 5 months of this year. Furthermore, during the first quarter of this year the United States continued to ship to Red China such war potentials as petroleum products, steel, and electrical machinery. Mr. Speaker, the American people want to know why.

In view of the foregoing, it appears that when the President criticized the stevedores and declared that they do not make American foreign policy, the stevedores were speaking not only for themselves but for the American people at large when they came back with the question, "Who did make American foreign policy?"

What Made America Great

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Mr. Walter L. Hays, president of the American Fire & Casualty Co., and president of the Florida State Chamber of Commerce, at the commencement exercises of John B. Stetson University, Deland, Fla., on August 18, 1950:

WHAT MADE AMERICA GREAT

President Edmunds, distinguished guests, candidates, ladies and gentlemen:

It is a privilege to be with you and I want to congratulate you on having Ollie Edmunds as your president. He is one of the best-loved men in Florida. It is good to see businessmen become leaders in education; it is good to have business ideas and educational theories intermingled.

This is an era of security. Security can be something desirable—and can be something harmful. The way I am thinking now, so-called security is doing this Nation damage; damage which may never be completely repaired, and security (this alleged security) is giving us as individuals a great setback.

The dictators of all time promised security. The dictators of our time—Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler—promised security in return for support. What the people received was slavery and imprisonment.

Three hundred thirty years ago, the Pilgrims landed on this continent seeking freedom, seeking opportunities. Since the birth of the United States of America in 1776 to 1933, this country skyrocketed in industry, in education—in every kind of development. No other country has ever equaled this record. Our foundation was based on competition, on free enterprise, on opportunities, and not security. The people had the opportunity to provide their own security.

Beginning with the Roosevelt administration, people in this country, like those of other countries in the past, were promised security, and this trend is still being carried on. For this alleged security we have given up a certain amount of freedom, and there has been a lessening of opportunities.

This scheme of security offered by the Government goes so far as to give a certain amount of "security from competition," which is contrary to the principles which made this country different and made this country great. This security from competition is brought about by Government and bureaucratic regulations.

If, in the past, we had had our present-day Government, as it operates today, there would be no General Electric, General Motors, Standard Oil, or any of the many great concerns which mean so much to our daily lives. We would not be able to buy an electric refrigerator for a modest figure. Instead, we would probably be like the people in many other countries today—no refrigeration. If we had any at all, it would probably still be the old-fashioned ice box. There would be no opportunity to buy a radio for $25 or $30. If the great oil companies had not been developed in the past, you would not be able to drive a car today unless you were a millionaire.

The first thing which made cars possible was the development of the great oil companies, making gas obtainable at a reasonable price. Gas is still a problem in countries which do not produce oil. The big motor companies have automobiles on a production basis where we have the finest piece of machinery possible within the reach of a great part of our population.

None of these concerns could start out the way they found it necessary to start and develop under present-day Government. If we had had today's Government from the beginning, we would have none of the luxuries which we enjoy today, unless we paid a price many times the present cost. You might say that these firms are making lots of money. This may be true, but new ones are not starting. Those which tried under present-day regulations have fallen by the wayside.

In 1916 I had a 1910 two-lunger Maxwell. No top, no windshield, no self-starter. With a good tail wind I could get up to 25 miles an hour. If there had been no competition in the automobile business, probably we would still be driving a car similar to this and be paying around $3,000 for it.

There is much being said about security these days. There is not enough being said about opportunity. There is too much stress being placed on security by the heads of our Government. They are offering an alleged security with our own money—and depriving us of freedom and opportunity.

This country wasn't built on security. It was built on opportunity—and our progress in the future, if we make progress, will be on our opportunities. If we accept security we will stagnate and deteriorate.

In a recent speech, General Eisenhower decried and ridiculed the idea that the most important thing in life is security. He aptly emphasized that prisons provide absolute security: food, shelter, clothes

We may become modern, but if we consider free enterprise and competition old fashioned and toss them aside, we are tearing out the very foundation of this Nation.

In our educational program, we should emphasize the advantage of the development of free enterprise—of the American way of life as we once knew it—not the one we are drifting toward. We should take business out of Federal, State, and local Government. As I have said before, our great industries were built on free enterprise and free competition—and that is what makes this country the greatest country of the world in which to live. Our free-enterprise system is one of the main things which helped us to win the last war, because we outproduced our enemies. The Government depended on industries developed by free enterprise Our scientific advancement—the airplane, medicine, and many others—has been made possible not by Government but by free enterprise. Even the making of the atomic bomb was actually done by free enterprise, private firms.

Universities haven't placed enough importance on this part of our educational program. I would like to see Stetson University develop a free-enterprise department; to make a research and get all the material possible—that those who graduate from this university might have a true picture as to what made America great.

To cure our present situation, we must get back to individuals; those individuals who want something for nothing. There seems to be a weakness with many to become dependent after they have been given help. We should come to the realization that the people support the Government and not the Government the people.

Abraham Lincoln said, "You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves."

A serious mistake is made by parents spoiling their children by doing for them what they should do for themselves. It develops lack of confidence, shiftlessness, and makes weaklings.

There are those who look to the Government for a living—depending on the Government "hand-out" or "give-away" programs of one kind or another. Many have been spoiled by the Government the past few years. They have been made dilatory; no aim or purpose in life other than "getting something for nothing."

No one, not even the Government, can give "hand-outs" forever. The only thing we will ever have that is worth while is what we get for ourselves. With this goes self-respect.

The best way to hurt someone and spoil his life and happiness is to give him "something for nothing." Those who have to battle and work hard for what they get are more progressive, alert, get more out of life, and are happier than any other group.

Last year, some wild mallards showed good judgment by not going back north with the flock, but remained on the little lake in Orlando in front of my home. They raised some young ducks and were happy families. They worked hard all day, from daylight to dark, fishing and foraging for their food. They were peaceful and happy. But my bright idea was their undoing. I got the idea of feeding them some grain. Now, they work not—they sleep all day under a tree. They wake up fighting—always disgruntled—"too much time on their hands." Gone are the happy days of foraging for their food. Instead, at 5:30 p. m. they are on the lake-front in front of my home. If I am 5 minutes late, there is a terrific squawking. The complaining is such that it disturbs the whole neighborhood. If I don't rush out immediately with the grain, they indignantly come across the street, despite the traffic, and up the stairs to my door.

Someone has said, "An honest name for 'welfare state' would be the 'farewell state.'" The welfare state is not for Americans. Government cannot give anything to anybody, unless it first takes away something from somebody else. If we look to the Government to fill all our wants, we cannot have freedom of action.

We must remember that the power to regulate is the power to destroy. When we accept a dole, subsidy, or any kind of a hand-out, we lessen our freedom, we strengthen central control, whether it be Federal or State. Every time we accept something, we give up something. The pendulum of our Nation is swinging to the left. We are swinging toward socialism, away from free enterprise and free competition.

The famous words which made a college famous were the simple words by Daniel Webster, speaking of Dartmouth. He said: "It is, sir, as I have said, a small college. And yet there are those who love it."

It seems only fitting that I speak to you at Stetson University on the subject of free enterprise, because you are a free-enterprise university, not subsidized by the Government—Federal or State. You are free enterprise itself. Thank God for the small college, for a college small enough that the student doesn't lose his identity and where he receives individual attention in his classroom. Today many colleges are becoming too large, too cumbersome, for students to receive all that to which they are entitled. You have a marvelous record. You have been an influence for good here in the South. Your footprints are forever in the sands of Florida. There are those who love Stetson.

The president of a Florida college, returning from a visit to Europe, said: "We are losing the cold war in Europe. The people of Europe have no will to fight because they have lost all hope of ever having free or fair lives for themselves and their children."

People must have hope for freedom and justice—hope for opportunities for themselves and their children—if they are to have the will to fight.

It is our hope that through the educational halls of this country we will be able to emphasize to the students of today and tomorrow the importance of carrying on our form of government, preserving our freedoms, and continuing our system of free economy. Our hopes for the future lie with those who will carry on our responsibilities.

When Paul was saved from a Jewish mob and stood before a Roman captain to be examined by scourging, not for any offense but on the theory that anyone attacked by a mob must be guilty of something, he saved himself by declaring his Roman citizenship. The astonished and unconvinced captain asked, "Art thou a Roman? With a great sum obtained I this freedom." The captain said he paid a great sum of money for his freedom. Paul answered dryly, "But I was born free."

We, too, were born free. Thanks to God, and thanks to all the brave men who have paid a great price, who have given us that inheritance, and all who have fought and died to preserve it.

We are free, and heir and joint owner of the greatest nation ever built on this earth. We are the most favored and most fortunate people the world has ever seen. But American citizenship is not all privileges. We have a responsibility too. Our responsibility is as ceruler of this Nation—to make ourselves worthy of being Americans.

Status of Government Reorganization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The record of the Eighty-first Congress in the field of Government reorganization, while not as good as it should be, nevertheless is little short of monumental.

What has been done is far ahead of the achievements in this area of any previous Congress.

As much as one-half of the program as proposed in 1949 in the report of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government—the Hoover Commission—has now been made effective through reorganization plans, new legislation, or administrative action.

What this means is that almost as much remains to be done as was accomplished during the 1949 and 1950 sessions, forming the work of the Eighty-first Congress. On the assumption that the parts of the program encountering the fewest difficulties have been disposed of, the toughest problems lie ahead. The unremitting efforts of Members of the Congress and of citizens and groups interested in the accomplishment of the goals of the Hoover Commission will be needed.

THE CITIZENS COMMITTEE

The persistent activities of the Citizens Committee for the Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government, or as abbreviated, the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, have been of incalculable value during the last two sessions.

Continuance of the work of this committee on an intensified basis is essential if the Eighty-second Congress is to make a record in Government reorganization matching that of the Eighty-first.

Interest in the reorganization program may lag unless the public is kept informed of progress and means are provided for channeling expressions of sentiment to Members of Congress.

HOOVER COMMISSION BACKGROUND

Public Law 162 of the Eightieth Congress, which created the Hoover Commission, was enacted on July 7, 1947. The Commission's 12 members, equally divided between the two parties and representing appointments by the President of the United States, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House from the legislative and executive branches of the Government and from civil life, worked on the problem of reorganization for almost 2 years. The life of the Commission expired in the spring of 1949.

The Commission submitted to the Congress in the early months of the 1949 session 19 reports, together with numerous supporting task-force reports and related documents.

Partisanship has been notably absent in the consideration of recommendations of the Hoover Commission in Congress as it had been in the deliberations of the Commission itself. Factors other than partisan have accounted for controversies on some of the features of the program.

REORGANIZATION PLANS

The most impressive part of the accomplishments in the reorganization program has been the initiation of changes by the President, and consideration of his proposals by the Congress under the procedure offered by the Reorganization Act of 1949, Public Law 109 of the Eighty-first Congress, enacted June 20, 1949.

Under this key measure, the President, until April 1953, may submit plans for shifting agencies or functions, abolishing unnecessary functions, improving administration, and eliminating overlapping and duplication. The plans are referred to the Committees on Expenditures in the Executive Departments in the respective branches of Congress. Unless disapproved by a majority of the total membership of either House, a plan becomes effective 60 days after submission, or upon such later date as may be specified.

Seven reorganization plans were submitted at the first session of the Eighty-first Congress in 1949, not counting an eighth plan relating to the Military Establishment which was withdrawn after legislation covering it was enacted. Of the seven, only one was rejected.

Twenty-seven plans were submitted at the second session in 1950, seven of which were rejected.

Thus, out of 34 plans in the two sessions, 26 became effective. Of the eight rejected, only four had been certified by the Citizens Committee as in conformance with the Hoover Commission program.

The seven plans in 1949 proposed a new Department of Welfare and reorganizations in the Labor and Post Office Departments, the Executive Office of the President, the Civil Service Commission, the Maritime Commission, and the Public Roads Administration.

The only plan rejected was No. 1 which proposed the creation of a new Department of Welfare.

Of the 27 plans submitted during the 1950 session, the first 6 provided for clearer lines of responsibility and authority in the Departments of the Treasury, Justice, Interior, Commerce, and Labor; the next 7 for a strengthening of the internal organization in seven regulatory commissions, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the National Labors Relations Board, and the Civil Aeronautics Board; the next eight for changes in labor standards enforcement, transfers of functions to and from the General Services Administration, transfers of certain functions from the Federal Security Agency to the Department of Labor, and establishment of a Maritime Board and a Maritime Administration in the Department of Commerce and abolishment of the Maritime Commission; and the final six for transfers of certain functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency, the placing of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the Department of Commerce, the creation of a new Department of Health, Education, and Security, the transfer of functions of the National Security Resources Board to the chairman of the Board, and the strengthening of powers of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The seven which were rejected in the 1950 session were No. 1 for the transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury of powers of subordinate officials, including the Comptroller of the Currency; No. 4 for a strengthening of the powers of the Secretary of Agriculture; Nos. 7, 11 and 12 for a strengthening of the powers of the Chairmen of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, and the National Labor Relations Board, respectively; No. 24 for the transfer of the independent Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Department of Commerce; and No. 27 for the creation of a new Department of Health, Education, and Security.

The Senate was responsible for the rejection of plan No. 1 in 1949, and plans Nos. 1, 4, 7, 11, 12, and 14 in 1950. The only plan rejected by the House of Representatives was No. 27 of 1950, creating new Department of Health, Education, and Security.

The four plans clearly conforming to recommendations of the Hoover Commission, which were rejected, were the first Treasury plan and those relating to the Department of Agriculture, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Communications Commission.

NEW LEGISLATION

More than a dozen new laws embodying recommendations of the Hoover Commission were enacted during the two sessions.

Besides the Reorganization Act of 1949, the first session of the Eighty-first Congress enacted as one of its outstanding achievements the Military Unification Act, which contained amendments to the National Security Act of 1947 to strengthen the authority of the Secretary of Defense and provide for a performance type budget and other fiscal provisions recommended by the Hoover Commission. This was Public Law 216, Eighty-first Congress, approved August 10, 1949.

A separate measure, Public Law 36, approved April 2, 1949, created a Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Another notable enactment of the first session was the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act, creating a General Services Administration, which has brought together such housekeeping functions as those relating to supplies, public buildings, and records. This was Public Law 152, approved June 30, 1949.

A highly significant law of the first session was Public Law 73, approved May 26, 1949, strengthening the powers of the Secretary of State, and providing for reorganization of the Department of State in keeping with principles put forward by the Hoover Commission.

Two measures in harmony with Hoover Commission recommendations on personnel management were Public Law 359, approved October 15, 1949, increasing salaries of higher officials, and Public Law 429, approved October 28, 1949, revising the Civil Service Classification Act.

A further enactment of the first session in keeping with the program of the Hoover Commission was Public Law 231, approved October 16, 1949, providing a long-range program for improvement in methods, procedures, equipment, and supplies in the Post Office Department.

The record of the second session will show the enactment of at least five laws based on recommendations of the Hoover Commission, including some highly important measures.

The first to be enacted was Public Law 507, approved May 10, 1950, authorizing establishment of a National Science Foundation.

The next was Public Law 673, approved August 8, 1950, authorizing the President to delegate certain functions, including the signing of documents. This should be an important timesaver for the President.

The Post Office Department Financial Control Act, Public Law 712, approved August 17, 1950, will make possible abolishment of antiquated accounting procedures and adoption of reforms advocated by the Hoover Commission.

Accounting reforms in other parts of the Government service and budgetary methods recommended by the Hoover Commission are provided by the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act. This measure, Public Law 784, was approved September 12, 1950.

Improved records management under the General Services Administration, along lines recommended by the Hoover Commission, is provided by amendments to the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949. This measure, Public Law 754, was approved September 5, 1950.

Two or three other Hoover Commission measures, which are pending in Congress, may reach the statute books during the closing days of the session.

SUMMARY OF ACTIONS UNDER HOOVER COMMISSION REPORTS

REPORT NO. 1—GENERAL MANAGEMENT OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

In this report the Hoover Commission dealt with reorganization powers proposed for the President, and also with the essentials of effective organization of the executive branch. The Commission reiterated recommendations previously made in a letter to Congress for the granting of authority to the President to submit reorganization plans. In the second part of the report the Commission urged creation of a more orderly grouping of the functions of Government into major departments and agencies under the President, establishment of a clear line of control from the President to these departments and agency heads and from them to their subordinates, stronger staff services for the President and department heads, and other steps to promote effective, responsible, and economical management.

Enactment of the Reorganization Act of 1949, Public Law 109, approved June 20, 1949, carried out the Commission's recommendation for the granting of reorganization powers to the President.

Public Law 673, approved August 8, 1950, authorizing the President to delegate certain functions, was not a specific recommendation of the Hoover Commission but is in harmony with its recommendations for more effective organization.

H. R. 2613 and S. 942, designated as the General Executive Management Act, was drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission. It provided general authority to implement all recommendations in the report on general management of the executive branch. The bill became obsolete by reason of provisions in various reorganization plans and other measures.

The Secretary of State and Secretary of Defense were vested with clear authority and responsibility for the organization and conduct of their departments in Public Laws 73 and 216 enacted in 1949. Reorganization Plan No. 3 of 1949, and Plans Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, and 26 of 1950 extended this principle to the Post Office, Justice, Interior, Commerce, Labor, and Treasury Departments, respectively. The laws and plans have provided for additional staff assistance.

Reorganization Plans Nos. 5 and 6 of 1949 and Nos. 8, 9, 10, and 13 of 1950, extended the principle of top management responsibility to the Civil Service Commission, the Maritime Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Civil Aeronautics Board, respectively.

Better staff assistance for the President was provided in Reorganization Plans Nos. 4 of 1949 and 25 of 1950, relating to the National Security Resources Board.

One of the tasks of the next session will be to determine what new legislation or reorganization plans are needed to complete action on recommendations relating to general management.

Progress has been made toward adoption of Hoover Commission recommendations by administrative action. The Administrative Management Division of the Bureau of the Budget is furthering the cooperation of all departments and agencies in improvement of management. An Advisory Committee on Management Improvement, appointed by the President, also is active in this field.

REPORT NO. 2—PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

The Hoover Commission proposed a far-reaching revision in structure and methods of personnel management in order "to build a career service which will select the best of our citizens on merit, free of political influence, with incentives in the form of genuine opportunities for promotion in the service, and which will eliminate the unnecessary and inefficient employees."

Enactment of Public Law 359, approved October 15, 1949, increasing salaries of higher officials, and Public Law 429, approved October 28, 1949, revising the Civil Service Classification Act, was in line with recommendations of the Commission.

Reorganization Plan No. 5 of 1949, strengthening the authority of the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission with respect to administrative responsibilities, was in harmony with a Hoover Commission recommendation.

Hearings were held during the early months of the 1950 session by both the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the corresponding Senate committee on a bill—H. R. 5181 and S. 2111—drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission. This measure, incorporating recommendations of the Commission for decentralizing functions relating to recruitment, examination, and certification of personnel, encountered opposition and was replaced by a measure sponsored by the administration—H. R. 8925 and S. 3830.

As introduced, the substitute bill did not meet with the approval of the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report. After a number of amendments had been made by the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, H. R. 8925 was endorsed by the Citizens Committee as representing a marked advance toward recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

H. R. 8925 has been on the House Calendar for a number of weeks. Opponents thus far have succeeded in preventing action. S. 3830 has been considered by the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, which as yet has taken no action.

The personnel recruitment bill will be reintroduced in the next session, probably in a form more completely conforming to Hoover Commission recommendations. Enactment of adequate personnel legislation will offer a major opportunity for those interested in adoption of the Hoover Commission program.

A personnel bill of lesser importance, in general conformance with a Hoover Commission recommendation, H. R. 7824, has been passed by both Houses and awaits final action. This measure provides a new performance rating system.

Progress has been made toward adoption of some of the personnel recommendations of the Hoover Commission within the scope of administrative action.

REPORT NO. 3—OFFICE OF GENERAL SERVICES (SUPPLY ACTIVITIES)

The Hoover Commission regarded as of fundamental importance its recommendations for reorganization of the Government's housekeeping services, including those relating to the purchase, utilization, storage, and disposal of supplies and other property, the keeping of official records, and the management of public buildings.

Enactment of Public Law 152, approved June 30, 1949, creating a General Services Administration, is one of the major accomplishments in the Hoover Commission program.

In the second session of the Eighty-first Congress there have been a number of proposals in legislation and reorganization plans to perfect the mechanism established under the General Services Administration.

Public Law 754, providing for a more effective preservation, management, and disposal of Government records, was approved by the President on September 5, 1950.

Reorganization Plan No. 7 of 1949, and plans Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18, and 20 of 1950, all had to do with the General Services Administration, plans No. 7 of 1949 and Nos. 15, 16, and 17 of 1950 removing certain activities not properly belonging to this agency, and plans Nos. 18 and 20 of 1950 shifting to it functions appropriate to its statutory responsibilities.

H. R. 7429 and H. R. 7430 to clarify General Services Administration responsibilities for central management of Government traffic have been under consideration by the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

REPORT NO 4—THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The Hoover Commission, in its report on the Post Office Department, made nine recommendations, substantial parts of which have been carried out.

The first recommendation was that the Postmaster General should continue to be a Cabinet officer appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, but should not be an official of a political party, such as the chairman of a national committee. The present Postmaster General is a career official conforming to these specifications.

The second, third, and fourth recommendations related to the organizational structure of the Department. These recommendations were carried out in part by Reorganization Plan No. 3 of 1949. Parts of the recommendations were objected to by the Postmaster General.

The fifth recommendation was that the confirmation of postmasters by the Senate be abolished with a view to elimination of partisan considerations from the postal service. H. R. 5643 to carry out this recommendation has not been acted upon by the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. A companion bill, S. 2213, was killed by the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service by the device of indefinite postponement.

The sixth recommendation related to reorganization of budgeting, accounting, and auditing procedures. This has been carried out in substantial part in Public Law 712, approved August 17, 1950, the Post Office Department Financial Control Act.

The seventh recommendation had to do with a revision or repeal of restrictive laws and regulations, which have hampered the operation of the Post Office Department on a business-like basis. To a limited extent, this recommendation has been carried out in Public Law 712. Public Law 231, approved October 16, 1949, for a long-range program for improvement in methods, procedures, equipment, and supplies, also looks in this direction.

The eighth recommendation was that the Congress authorize and instruct the Postmaster General to fix rates for registered mail, insured mail, money orders, postal notes, special delivery, and collect-on-delivery mail which would make each of these services self-supporting. Authority of this nature is provided in a section of H. R. 2945 for a general increase in postal rates, which has been passed by the House and is before the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

The ninth recommendation was for a separation of subsidies from air mail compensation. Extensive hearings on this issue were held during the present session before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has approved H. R. 9184 to carry out the Hoover Commission recommendation.

As matters now stand, the principal recommendations of the Commission for which legislative proposals must be reintroduced and pressed in the next session are those for elimination of politics in the appointment of postmasters, for authority to fix rates for special services, and for a separation of subsidies from air mail compensation.

Some of the other recommendations which have been carried out only in part will require reconsideration.

REPORT NO. 5—FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The Hoover Commission's recommendations for statutory authority to reorganize the Department of State on a more efficient basis were carried out in Public Law 73, approved May 26, 1949.

This law vested authority for the conduct of foreign affairs, previously held by subordinates, in the Secretary of State. Under this authority, the Secretary of State was able to commence a thorough-going reorganization in keeping with principles advocated by the Hoover Commission. The law made provision for an Under Secretary and 10 Assistant Secretaries of State.

Full implementation of the law is a matter for administrative action within the Department.

REPORT NO. 6—DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The Hoover Commission held that the Department of Agriculture is urgently in need of reorganization. The Commission recommended an extension of the functional organization of the Department and a better grouping of activities related to the same major purpose. It proposed a thorough overhaul of the organization of the Department at State, county and farmer levels.

Reorganization Plan No. 4 of 1950 was rejected by the Senate. This plan would have strengthened the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with Hoover Commission principles. It omitted, however, many of the specific proposals of the Hoover Commission.

A bill drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission (H. R. 5179 and S. 2055), and embracing most of its recommendations, was introduced and referred to the Committee on Agriculture in the respective Houses. This measure, which received no serious consideration, will require revision before introduction in the new Congress.

The Department of Agriculture is the only Cabinet Department in which basic organizational principles of the Hoover Commission have not been established either by legislation or reorganization plan.

Special attention to the problems of this Department will be needed in the new session.

REPORT NO. 7—BUDGETING AND ACCOUNTING

Recommendations of the Hoover Commission with respect to budgeting and accounting were of special significance. The Commission asserted that the budget and appropriation process is the heart of the management and control of the executive branch and that there is great need for reform in this field. The conduct of the accounting system of the Government, the Commission said, affects all other administrative problems. Complicated checks and balances in present accounting practices, the Commission asserted, make for unnecessary inefficiency in every activity. Improvement of the accounting system was urged as one of the very first steps toward economy in governmental operations.

The new Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950, Public Law 784, approved September 12, 1950, goes a considerable distance toward the goals of the Hoover Commission, although not in all respects in accord with its specific recommendations.

H. R. 9038, which became Public Law 784, was a substitute for H. R. 5823 and S. 2054, drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission. The substitute measure evolved from hearings and conferences of members of the Committees on Expenditures in the Executive Departments in the two Houses with financial officials of the Government.

The Budget and Accounting Procedures Act omits a basic recommendation of the Hoover Commission for the shifting of primary responsibility for accounting procedures from the Comptroller General, an agent of the legislative branch, to a new Accountant General of the Treasury Department in the executive branch. The powers given to the Comptroller General, while at variance with the shifting of authority proposed by the Hoover Commission, would center responsibility for accounting to an extent that is lacking at present. These powers are such as to make possible the implementation of accounting reforms developed in the Hoover Commission report and in the present joint voluntary program of the Comptroller General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Director of the Budget.

The budget provisions of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act are in complete conformance with the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. Statutory direction is provided for a performance type budget, based upon functions, activities, and projects.

REPORT NO. 8—NATIONAL SECURITY ORGANIZATION

The Hoover Commission said that while gains had been achieved under the National Security Act of 1947, there was continued disharmony and lack of unified planning, interservice rivalries, and lack of close working relationships among important elements in the Military Establishment. The Commission pointed to serious organizational defects, the lack of central authority in the direction of the Military Establishment, a rigid statutory structure established under the 1947 law, and divided responsibility. These had resulted, the Commission said, in a failure to assert clear civilian control over the Armed Forces.

Unification of the three military services in substantial conformance with the recommendation of the Hoover Commission was accomplished under Public Law 216, approved August 10, 1949. Enactment of this law, embracing amendments to the National Security Act of 1947, has been one of the major achievements in the Hoover Commission program. The speedy mobilization under very difficult circumstances to meet the Korean crisis testifies to the value of the 1949 law.

Public Law 36, approved April 2, 1949, creating a Deputy Secretary of Defense, also was based on a Hoover Commission recommendation.

Reorganization Plans No. 4 of 1949 and No. 25 of 1950 relating to the National Security Council and the National Security Resources Board were in the direction of a better defense organization.

Reorganization Plan No. 8 of 1949 relating to the Military Establishment was withdrawn after enactment of Public Law 216.

Among minor bills in harmony with recommendations of the Hoover Commission under consideration during the 1950 session is S. 1740 for interservice transfer of commissioned personnel of the armed services.

Additional legislation will be required in the next session for the more complete implementation of the Hoover Commission report. In the meantime the fullest success under the present unified structure of the defense establishment requires wise administrative policies.

REPORT NO. 9—VETERANS' AFFAIRS

The Hoover Commission recommended a reorganization of the Veterans' Administration in accordance with principles in its report on general management. Much of this reorganization can be accomplished by administrative action. No bills or reorganization plans have been presented.

One measure which was pending during the present session would create a Veterans' Insurance Corporation as recommended by the Hoover Commission. Bills drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission on this subject (H. R. 5171, H. R. 5288, and S. 2019) were not acted upon either by the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs or the Senate Finance Committee. Further consideration of the proposal will be desirable in the next session.

REPORT NO. 10—DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The Hoover Commission proposed a grouping of all major nonregulatory transportation activities of the Government in the Department of Commerce as a major feature of a general reorganization.

Reorganization Plan No. 7 of 1949 transferred the Public Roads Administration to the Department from the General Services Administration. Reorganization Plan No. 21 of 1950 abolished the Maritime Commission and created a Federal Maritime Board and a Maritime Administration in the Department of Commerce. The Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report approved the placing of a regulatory agency, the Maritime Administration, in the Department because of close relationship between that agency and the Maritime Board.

Reorganization Plan No. 5 of 1950 strengthened the authority of the Secretary of Commerce in a manner similar to plans applying to several other departments.

A bill drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission (H. R. 5180 and S. 2056) was considered obsolete by reason of Reorganization Plan No. 5.

Some remaining recommendations of the Commission are likely to be embodied in new legislation in the next session.

REPORT NO. 11—TREASURY DEPARTMENT

The Hoover Commission said that the enormous expansion and far-reaching implications of Government finance made it imperative that the Treasury Department be thoroughly reorganized. Transfers to and from the Department were proposed in order that it might again be made the real fiscal center of the Government.

Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1950, strengthening the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, was rejected by the Senate because of objections to the inclusion of the Comptroller of the Currency among officials whose statutory powers were absorbed.

Reorganization Plan No. 26 of 1950, which excluded the Comptroller of the Currency, subsequently became effective.

The reorganization plan made obsolete a bill drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission (H. R. 5174 and S. 2058).

A bill for Federal bonding of employees (H. R. 8706) as recommended by the Hoover Commission was passed by the House in July 1950 and has been under consideration by the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Recommendations of the Commission for transfers of agencies to and from the Treasury Department remain to be acted upon either through legislation or reorganization plans.

REPORT NO. 12—REGULATORY COMMISSION

The Hoover Commission made general recommendations applicable to nine regulatory agencies. These included the placing of all administrative responsibility in the chairman of each commission, improvement in administrative procedures, shifting of executive functions to departments, and bipartisan representation.

Reorganization Plan No. 6 of 1949 strengthened the administrative authority of the Chairman of the Maritime Commission in accordance with the Hoover Commission recommendation. Reorganization Plan No. 21 of 1950 abolished the Maritime Commission and created in place of it a Federal Maritime Board and a Maritime Administration in the Department of Commerce.

Reorganization Plans Nos. 8, 9, 10, and 13 of 1950 strengthened the administrative authority of the Chairmen of the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Civil Aeronautics Board, respectively.

Reorganization Plans Nos. 7 and 11 of 1950, which would have strengthened the powers of the Chairmen of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Communications Commission, were rejected by the Senate.

Reorganization Plan No. 12 of 1950, relating to the National Labor Relations Board, which raised issues outside the question of effective organization and therefore was not regarded as part of the Hoover Commission program, was rejected by the Senate.

Several bills applying general recommendations of the Hoover Commission to specific regulatory commissions were introduced in the two Houses, some of them being drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission. These bills were tabled in committee as a result of action on reorganization plans.

Further consideration of Hoover Commission recommendations, especially as applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Communications Committee, and the National Labor Relations Board, will be desirable in the next session.

REPORT NO. 13—DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Besides recommending a reorganization of the Department of Labor of the same nature as proposed for other departments as a means of improving administration and fixing responsibility, the Hoover Commission favored a return to the department of agencies shifted elsewhere in previous years. This proposal was intended as a means of restoring to the Department its former significance in the field of labor and thereby making for greater efficiency in the Government.

Recommendations of the Commission for thus strengthening the Department of Labor were carried out in Reorganization Plans Nos. 2 of 1949 and 6, 14, and 19 of 1950.

Plan No. 2 of 1949 transferred to the Department of Labor the functions of the Federal Security Administrator with respect to employment services and unemployment compensation.

Plan No. 6 of 1950 provided for administrative reorganization of the Department of Labor and strengthening of the powers of the Secretary of Labor.

Plan No. 14 of 1950 provided for the coordination by the Secretary of Labor of the administration of labor standards under various laws.

Plan No. 19 of 1950 transferred the Bureau of Employees' Compensation and the Employees' Compensation Appeals Board from the Federal Security Agency to the Department of Labor.

No legislation embodying recommendations of the Hoover Commission with respect to the Department of Labor was pending during the 1950 session.

REPORT NO. 14—DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

The Hoover Commission proposed that the Department of the Interior be given more clearly the mission of development of subsoil and water resources. As these activities require large public works, the Commission recommended that other major public works also be managed by this Department. To this end the major construction activities of the Government would be concentrated there.

Reorganization Plan No. 3 of 1950 provided for administrative reorganization of the Department of the Interior and a strengthening of the powers of the Secretary.

Reorganization Plan No. 15 of 1950 transferred public-works programs in Alaska and the Virgin Islands from the General Services Administration to the Department of the Interior.

Bills to effectuate major recommendations of the Hoover Commission, notably the transfer of the civil functions of the Corps of Army Engineers to the Department of the Interior, were introduced during the Eighty-first Congress but received no consideration.

Transfer of the Army engineers to the Department of the Interior, with a view to placing rivers and harbors improvement and flood control under the same management as reclamation and thus avoiding the wasteful conflicts now occurring, should be a major task in the Hoover Commission program for the next session. This might be accomplished by either legislation or a reorganization plan.

REPORT NO. 15—SOCIAL SECURITY, EDUCATION, AND INDIAN AFFAIRS

The Hoover Commission recommended establishment of a new Cabinet department to embrace social security and educational functions. It would include the Bureau of Indian Affairs. It would not take in the health activities of the Government.

As a result of submission of reorganization plans which were not in complete conformance with recommendations of the Hoover Commission, the Congress acted adversely.

Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1949 creating a Department of Welfare, and Reorganization Plan No. 27 of 1950 creating a Department of Health, Education, and Security were both rejected, the former by the Senate and the latter by the House. Neither plan was certified by the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report as in conformity with recommendations of the Hoover Commission. Under both plans, the Federal Security Agency, including the Public Health Service which, under the Hoover Commission program, would be placed in a proposed United Medical Administration, would have been elevated to Cabinet rank. Little else would have been accomplished. Plan No. 27 was objectionable from the standpoint of Hoover Commission principles because of its continuance of autonomous powers of the Public Health Service and the Office of Education.

Only one minor reorganization plan became effective in this area of Government. Plan No. 16 of 1950 transferred assistance to school districts and water-pollution control activities from the General Services Administration to the Federal Security Agency.

Legislation embodying the Hoover Commission's recommendation for creation of a new department received no consideration. Identical bills (H. R. 5175 and S. 2060), drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission, would have created a Department of Welfare along the Hoover Commission lines.

Further consideration of recommendations in this field will be necessary in the next session.

REPORT NO. 16—MEDICAL ACTIVITIES

The Hoover Commission recommended the establishment of a United Medical Administration into which would be consolidated most of the large-scale activities of the Federal Government in the fields of medical care, medical research, and public health. The proposed United Medical Administration would provide the major part of all hospital care required by the military forces in the continental United States and would be responsible for medical care for veterans. The purpose would be to eliminate overlap, waste, and inefficiency.

Identical bills (H. R. 5182 and S. 2008), drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission, was the subject of hearings before the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. It would create a United Medical Administration as proposed by the Hoover Commission.

This proposal is one of the major Hoover Commission recommendations on which action will go over until the next session.

REPORT NO. 17—FEDERAL BUSINESS ENTERPRISES

The Hoover Commission made a wide variety of recommendations for reorganization of Government business enterprises, only a few of which received attention during the Eighty-first Congress.

Four reorganization plans submitted by the President had to do with activities of the Housing and Home Finance Agency and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Reorganization Plan No. 17 of 1950 shifted public-works planning from the General Services Administration to the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Reorganization Plan No. 22 of 1950 transferred the Federal National Mortgage Association from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Reorganization Plan No. 23 of 1950 transferred the financing of prefabricated housing from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Reorganization Plan No. 24 of 1950 placed the now independent Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the Department of Commerce. This plan was rejected by the Senate. It was not in conformance with a recommendation of the Hoover Commission that it be placed under the Treasury Department.

Recommendations by the Commission that the Export-Import Bank and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation also be placed in the Treasury Department did not come before Congress.

H. R. 6325, designated as the Federal Income-Producing Activities Control Act, is a pending measure in general conformity to principles enunciated by the Hoover Commission.

No legislation based on recommendations in the report on Federal business enterprises was drafted by counsel for the Hoover Commission.

Numerous recommendations relating to Government corporations, lending and insurance agencies, housing, farm credit and power agencies, remain for consideration.

REPORT NO. 18—OVERSEAS ADMINISTRATION, FEDERAL-STATE RELATIONS AND FEDERAL RESEARCH

The Hoover Commission recommended that the Congress direct a comprehensive study of the entire problem of overseas operation and administration. It suggested that it might be desirable ultimately to create a separate Administration of Overseas Affairs, under which would be integrated overseas administrative activities, excluding the diplomatic and consular services of the Department of State.

Report No. 18 also included reports on Federal-State relations and on Federal research.

With respect to Federal-State relations, the Commission made various recommendations, including the establishment of a continuing agency with primary responsibility for study, information, and guidance in this field.

The Commission in its report on Federal research recommended that authority be granted to the President to coordinate research and to strengthen interdepartmental committee organization for this purpose and that a National Science Foundation be established.

A bill to create a Commission on Overseas Administration, S. 2072, was passed by the Senate in August 1949. It was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments in the House.

A bill to create a temporary National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, S. 3147, was reported from the Senate Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments in June 1950 and is on the Senate Calendar. The House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has had the problem under consideration.

Public Law 507, approved May 10, 1950, establishes a National Science Foundation. It was the first Hoover Commission recommendation on which action was completed in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

REPORT NO. 19—CONCLUDING REPORT

The Hoover Commission in its concluding report discussed problems of organization and administrative management common to most agencies and reviewed its major recommendations, but with the exception of a few minor proposals offered no new recommendations.

REMAINING PROPOSALS IN HOOVER COMMISSION PROGRAM

Recommendations of the Hoover Commission which were not disposed of during the Eighty-first Congress and await further action in the Eighty-second Congress convening in January 1951 constitute a formidable program combining legislation and possible reorganization plans.

The remaining proposals include the following:

First. Reorganization of the Department of Agriculture, the only Cabinet department whose administrative structure was not streamlined under the Hoover Commission formula during the Eighty-first Congress.

Second. Strengthening of the administrative organization of three regulatory agencies, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, and the Labor Relations Board, for which reorganization plans were rejected.

Third. Creation of a new Cabinet department to include social security and educational functions.

Fourth. Creation of a United Medical Administration into which would be consolidated activities in the fields of medical care, medical research, and public health with a view to elimination of overlap, waste, and inefficiency.

Fifth. Completion of action on recruitment and other personnel management recommendations on which some progress was made during the Eighty-first Congress.

Sixth. Further steps to strengthen the unification of the armed services to which the Hoover Commission program already has made a notable contribution.

Seventh. Transfer of the civil functions of the Corps of Army Engineers to the Department of the Interior with a view to elimination of present wasteful conflict in the development of natural resources.

Eighth. Elimination of politics from the postal service by abolishing Senate confirmation of postmasters.

Ninth. Authority to the Postmaster General to fix rates for special services on a self-supporting basis.

Tenth. Separation of subsidies from air-mail compensation as a means of shedding light on transactions of this nature.

Eleventh. Determination of the organizational status of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Export-Import Bank and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which the Hoover Commission proposed to place in the Treasury Department.

Twelfth. Reorganization of other business enterprises, including those in the farm credit, housing, and power fields.

Thirteenth. Provision for a study of methods of integrating overseas activities of the Federal Government.

Fourteenth. Creation of a continuing agency for improvement of relations between the Federal and State governments.

Fifteenth. Other proposals scattered through the 19 reports of the Hoover Commission, which were set aside for further study or escaped attention during the Eighty-first Congress.

The Eighty-second Congress should complete the job of reorganizing the executive branch of the Federal Government along lines recommended by the Hoover Commission, insofar as the proposals are found to be feasible and desirable. Thereafter, the success of the program will hinge largely upon administrative action. The fixing of responsibility and the granting of adequate powers are basic tenets of the Hoover Commission program. If the Congress does its part, it should be less difficult to fasten the blame for inefficiency in the Government.

Ninety-fourth Infantry Division Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. LIND

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. LIND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following resolution passed at the first convention of the Ninety-fourth Infantry Division Association on Sunday, August 6, 1950, at the Hotel Statler, Boston, Mass. This resolution is timely, to the point, and expresses the sentiment of a great group of good Americans who have served their country in World War II. The men of the Ninety-fourth Infantry Division have rendered excellent service in time of war and are again, through their expression of confidence in their Government, repeating this service during these serious times.

I congratulate their president, Mr. Harry J. McLaughlin, of York, Pa., and the men of this great organization on their fine spirit of Americanism.

Whereas the Ninety-fourth Infantry Division Association represents some 35,000 Americans who served from September 15, 1942, to May 8, 1945, during which period the division engaged in the battle of northern France, Ardennes, Rhineland, and Central Europe, and suffered some 10,957 casualties.

And whereas we as combat veterans know full well the meaning of war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we pledge our unswerving support of our country and the United Nations in their policy of seeking to stop Communist aggression in Korea. We recognize that if unchecked in Korea, Communist aggression will go on to seek other victims among freedom-loving people.

We ask the President of the United States and Congress to once more utilize the manpower and the industrial strength of our people to face the enemy of our people and ideals.

We ask for universal military training so that the young men of this country will be better trained and better enabled to protect themselves in the event of combat.

We pay tribute to our fellow Americans now in uniform who are engaging the enemy in Korea. We join with all Americans in support of the leadership of Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker, commanding general of the Eighth Army in Korea, under whom we served when the Ninety-fourth Infantry Division was a part of the XX Corps in the European theater of operations.

We wish Godspeed and good luck to those members of our division who are now in Korea or elsewhere in the Army, or who will be called to service.

We ask for an end to business, labor, and politics as usual. We call for American loyalty and unity. We condemn the hoarders, the black marketeer, the profiteer, and the slacker. We denounce those who would weaken our country at this time.

We call upon all Americans to join with us in an all-out effort; and further be it

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent by the secretary to the President of the United States, the Presiding Officer of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary General of the United Nations, and to Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker.

The resolutions committee was composed of Attorney Bernard Frank, Allentown, Pa., William Godenzsweig, Washington, D. C., and Harry J. McLaughlin, York, Pa.

The resolutions were passed unanimously at the first convention of the Ninety-fourth Division Association on Sunday, August 6, at the Hotel Statler, Boston, Mass.

The Need for Economy in Government and Control of Inflation Persists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, like millions of other loyal but deeply concerned citizens of the United States, I listened intently to the radio address of the President last Saturday night. I subsequently read the full text of that statement by the Chief Executive to the American people.

It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the address was good. Many parts of it were realistic and to the point. But many things which ought to have been said were omitted. Furthermore, it is still a fact that deeds are far more significant than words.

Nowhere in the President's address did I find an outright request or demand that the Government, or those elected or appointed to operate the Government, be called upon to set an example by making the sacrifices which he stated are essential in solving the three "hard, tough problems," which must be solved in order to protect the world from the threat of communistic domination. There is still a sound basis for maintaining that no organization, whether it be government, military, fraternal, business or otherwise, can be any better or stronger, or successful in operation than its officers or leaders. It is, in the final analysis, their actions and not their words which determine the outcome of their endeavors.

Mr. Speaker, the present Chief Executive has undoubtedly been given more power than any other President when a state of declared war did not exist. Millions of Americans look to the President, in fact feel dependent upon him, for guidance and leadership. That is why so many of our people concur with his statement that the defense program cannot be achieved on a business-as-usual basis. But it is also the reason why our citizens cannot understand his failure to denounce and disclaim any policy of politics-as-usual.

Mr. Speaker, let us, in order, consider the solutions the President offered for the three major problems he mentioned.

He stated that the production problem can be solved by harder work, longer hours, the development of new techniques, increased efficiency, and more manpower. And he is right. But he failed to mention what directives or orders he will issue as the head of the largest single employing agency in this great country, and probably the most inefficient, to reduce and eliminate waste, duplication, and unnecessary expenditures of taxpayers' funds—and release manpower.

What could have been more appropriate, Mr. Speaker, then for the President in the course of his Nation-wide broadcast to the American people last Saturday evening to have stated that he was ordering every Federal department and agency, except the Federal Bureau of Investigation and those dealing primarily with military and defense matters, to reduce where possible without impairing established and necessary public service its number of employees by not less than 10 percent within the next 6 months. At the same time he could have assured the citizens of America that he would have subsequently reported to them how effectively that order was being complied with and carried out.

The effect of the issuance of such an order by the President would have been tremendous. Not only would such action create a very substantial additional reservoir of manpower and save millions of dollars for hard-pressed taxpayers but at the same time it would have demonstrated that our Federal Government practices what it preaches and is willing to set an example for those who must produce the materials and equipment for our national defense and security.

The second major problem discussed by the Chief Executive was the method to be used in paying the bill for increased defense. The Chief Executive said that insofar as possible this increased cost should be met by additional taxation. And again, Mr. Speaker, he was right.

Nevertheless, it is becoming increasingly self-evident that, unfortunately, the entire bill for increased defense costs cannot be financed on a strictly pay-as-you-go basis. Consequently, our tremendous national debt will be further increased. It is generally conceded that any further increase in our national debt will either now or at some time in the future result in further inflation and depreciation of dollar values.

Substantial economies in Government expenditures and a release by the Government of unnecessary manpower would serve to restrict the further growth of our national indebtedness and make available additional manpower for the production of much needed goods and services.

In emphasizing the necessity for the payment of increased taxes by our citizens the President also had another excellent opportunity to set an example which would have promoted a greater willingness to accept and carry this additional tax burden. That example could have been set by the President if he had requested that all of his own personal compensation and allowances, as well as the salaries and allowances of Members of Congress, be subjected in entirety to the same rate of taxation as will be imposed on all other citizens.

This suggestion, Mr. Speaker, has been made on previous occasions by the distinguished senior Senator from Delaware, JOHN J. WILLIAMS, but has lacked the support which Presidential endorsement might be expected to produce for such a recommendation.

The final problem discussed by the President in his Nation-wide address was that of controlling inflationary forces. There is no doubt that this is a difficult problem for a nation which has been spending beyond its means for almost two decades and which is now in the process of a vast rearming and defense program. Nevertheless, it must be tackled and it must be solved.

Strong and repeated requests have been made that all the citizens refrain from making any purchases which are not absolutely necessary. Nevertheless, our own Federal Government, of which the President is the Chief Executive, continues to be the greatest purchasing and spending agency on record.

It would therefore appear to be appropriate for the President to have announced that as long as our vast defense program is under way, he would disapprove any legislation for public works, reclamation, power development, and similar projects which are not clearly essential for our national defense. To assure that politics as usual in this field be avoided on the one hand and that essential public improvements not be jeopardized on the other, the President might have suggested the creation of a board of review, comprised of such outstanding public servants as the Honorable Herbert Hoover and Mr. Bernard Baruch. To such a board could be given the power and responsibility of reviewing all public-works appropriations and the recommendation to the President of those which should be rejected and those which should be approved as necessary to our defense undertakings during the period of emergency. It is my opinion that such a board would be a tremendous factor in stabilizing our economy as much as can possibly be done in these times and of effecting monetary savings and the full utilization of our manpower.

Mr. Speaker, economy and efficiency in government—with a constant thought for the welfare of our citizens and for their responsibilities as taxpayers—is at all times important. Realization of that fact is more prevalent today than it has been. And since such economy is important at all times, it is imperative today.

Maj. Gen. Keller E. Rockey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. GLENN BEALL
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, if World War II taught us one lesson, it was the necessity of having a closely knit unified command.

To win a modern war a nation must have a hard-hitting, quick-moving, mobile striking force on the land, sea, and in the air. Hitler taught us that lesson at the beginning of the last war, but we taught him and all the world much more before it ended.

All branches of our Armed Forces are essential—Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Air Force and Coast Guard—each one performs magnificently. There is enough glory for them all.

Many of our generals and admirals on land, sea, in the air and beneath the sea won immortal renown. Among all our valiant heroes there is none who fought with greater valor, or with more success, than Maj. Gen. Keller E. Rockey, of the Marine Corps.

General Rockey, born in Indiana, graduating from Gettysburg College, serving in World War I, in Haiti and Nicaragua, and in World War II, won for himself the highest honor that could be bestowed upon any man in any branch in all our Armed Services.

In my limited time I shall not attempt to enumerate the many high honors that have been conferred upon him by the different branches of the armed services and many foreign governments, which will be detailed in another report, because he has received practically every decoration in the catalog of our Military Establishment.

Mr. Speaker, bear in mind that the Marine officer, or soldier, is the only one who, in all our defense forces, serves on land, sea, and in the air. Before a marine ever flies he must have served at least 2 years on the ground and on the sea. Consequently he knows the problems that confront any individual who fights in the defense of his country.

General Rockey came up the hard way. From ordinary beginning and obscure origin he has, through personal merit, risen to the heights of distinction and honor.

Only in the United States of America could such a man achieve the recognition and render the service he has to his country. With a rugged constitution, inherited from worthy ancestors; with a resolute will; with untiring industry; with unconquerable courage, his faith and fortitude born of Christian parents has enabled him to lead men of all classes, creeds, and colors to follow him down the hard and bitter road, up the steep and painful slopes of high endeavor to glorious victory.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot and I shall not attempt to add to the laurels of so great a man. Words fade in the shadow of his glowing deeds.

Keller Rockey was a severe taskmaster but he was true to the Marine tradition. He never demanded of others anything he was not willing to give of himself. As he retires this month at the age of 62 and after the many years of faithful, loyal, and patriotic service he takes with him not only my good wishes but the benediction and blessings of the people of the old Free State of Maryland and of the people in all the States of this Union.

My people in Maryland join me in offering this tribute to a great, grand, and gallant soldier, a true, loyal, and red-blooded American, who has contributed so much to preserve the Republic which Washington founded, which Lincoln kept, and which we all shall give our last full measure of devotion to save.

Increased Benefits Granted Under the Amended Social Security Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, due to the great interest in the amount of coverage granted under the recently enacted amendments to the Social Security Act, I would like to insert in the RECORD, some information which I believe will be helpful to many.

Almost 10,000,000 more jobs will be covered, to include the nonfarm self-employed, domestic workers, agricultural workers, and, on a voluntary basis, certain employees of nonprofit organizations and of State and local governments.

The more than 3,000,000 aged persons, widowed mothers, and surviving children now receiving benefits under the system, will receive automatic increases averaging 77½ percent, beginning with checks received in October 1950. For the lowest-benefit payments, this increase will be 100 percent.

Persons who retire in the future, can qualify for even larger benefits under a new formula, which will increase them by about 110 percent over the amounts under the old law.

It will not be necessary for retired workers and their wives, the widows and dependent parents and children now receiving benefits, to apply for these increases, since they will be made automatically, using a so-called conversion table which appears in the law. Increases in benefits provided in this table are as follows:

If the primary insurance benefit under the old law is—	The primary insurance amount under the new law shall be—	And the average monthly wage for purpose of computing maximum benefits shall be—
$10	$20.00	$40.00

$45	68.50	250.00
$46	68.50	250.00

The effect of these increases on the benefit check of a widow with two children is suggested by the following table:

Widow with two minor children now receiving benefits

$25	46
$30	53
$35	59
$45	76

For persons who retire in the future, the new start feature of the 1950 amendments means that benefit rights may be computed on a work record beginning with 1951, instead of 1936 as in the old law. This change represents a liberalization in two ways: First, wages are generally much higher now than they were in 1936, and thus the amount of the average monthly wage is increased; and second, earners who have not been continuously in covered employment since 1936 could not include wages or time in uncovered jobs in computing the average monthly wage. Frequently this acted to decrease its amount greatly. In this respect, the fact that more jobs are also covered by the 1950 amendments will also help to increase the average wage for earners who transfer from one job to another.

One very important effect of this new start for older workers, will be to increase their chances for becoming eligible for full benefit rights. As has been noted, persons aged 62 and over can become eligible for the doubled benefits under the new formula by working for only six quarters—1½ years—in covered employment. The first of these new benefits will, therefore, be paid in May 1952 or about 1½ years after January 1, 1951.

Under the old law, approximately 35,000,000 jobs were covered by old-age and survivors insurance. The 1950 amendments add approximately 10,000,000 more, to bring the total coverage up to around 45,000,000. Of the approximately 15,000,000 jobs not included, an estimated 7,500,000 are protected by other public retirement systems for the Federal civil service, the Armed Forces, railroads, and State and municipal jobs. The largest occupation groups excluded are self-employed farmers and certain professional persons.

Americans working in the following occupations are compulsorily covered in the new law, but not covered in the old law:

SELF-EMPLOYED

The new law extends coverage to include self-employed persons who have net annual earnings therefrom of at least $400. For example, self-employed persons are covered if they operate a store, beauty parlor, filling station, barber shop, bar, jewelry shop, laundry, pharmacy, theater, hotel, flower shop, tourist court, printing shop, photographic studio, advertising agency, second-hand shop, shoeshine stand, manufacturing plant, real-estate agency, and so forth. Also covered are self-employed writers, photographers, appraisers, adjusters, artists, private teachers, sign painters, private detectives, independent contractors, and so forth. Members of a partnership are considered as self-employed.

"Net earnings," for purpose of coverage includes net profit from a trade or business carried on by an individual or partnership, excluding rental income unless it is received by a real-estate dealer as part of his business; dividends and interest on stock and bonds—except such income received by a securities dealer as part of his business; capital gains and losses; and income from an estate or a trust.

Such self-employed persons will file yearly social-security returns in connection with their regular income-tax returns, effective beginning in the year 1951. If an individual works for an employer part of the time and is also self-employed, both incomes will count up to the limit of $3,600 per year.

But specifically excluded from coverage as self-employed individuals are farm operators—the largest group—lawyers, physicians, dentists, osteopaths, chiropractors, naturopaths, Christian Science practitioners, optometrists, veterinarians, professional engineers, architects, funeral directors, and certified, registered, licensed, or full-time practicing public accountants.

It should be noted, however, that this exclusion applies to farmers and professional groups specified above, only if they are self-employed, since salaried farmers, lawyers, and so forth, would be covered under the new law—as under the old law—as employees.

DOMESTIC SERVICE

Compulsory coverage for persons performing domestic services—maids, cooks, laundresses, butlers, gardeners, practical nurses, and so forth—if they receive $50 or more in cash wages during a quarter by working full or part time on 24 or more days for one or more household employers.

Such services performed in a farm home are included as agricultural labor.

FEDERAL CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES NOT NOW UNDER A RETIREMENT SYSTEM

Although most Federal employees are covered by other Federal retirement systems, approximately 200,000 who are not so covered in special systems will be included under old-age and survivors insurance. This provision will cover most short-term Federal employees now under temporary appointments, as well as employees of national farm-loan associations, production-credit associations, Federal credit unions, the Tennessee Valley Authority (if not under the TVA retirement system), post exchanges, State, county, and community committees under the Production and Marketing Administration, and certain employees of the Federal Reserve System.

DEFINITION OF EMPLOYEE

As newly defined, the term "employee" accepts the usual common-law rules covering the employer-employee relationship, and also includes full-time life-insurance salesmen; full-time traveling or city salesmen (except house-to-house salesmen) taking orders for their principal for goods to be resold or consumed from retailers, hotels, wholesalers, jobbers, and contractors; agent-drivers and commissioned drivers engaged in distributing meat, vegetables, fruit, bakery products, beverages (other than milk), or laundry and dry-cleaning services; and industrial homeworkers who work according to an employer's specifications. (NOTE.—Many part-time life-insurance salesmen, house - to - house salesmen, operators of leased taxicabs, and newsboys over age 18 who are not covered as employees will be eligible as self-employed persons.)

Employees in the following occupation groups (which were not covered in the old law) can be covered in the new law by voluntary arrangement, as follows:

NONPROFIT INSTITUTIONS

Optional coverage is provided (beginning January 1, 1951) for employees of charitable, religious, educational, or other private nonprofit institutions (except ministers and members of religious orders in the performance of their required duties), if the employer agrees to accept coverage, and not less than two-thirds of his employees express a desire for coverage. If such an agreement is reached, coverage is extended only to those employees who requested it at the time of such an agreement, but any new employees hired after the effective date of coverage will be automatically covered. Such agreements must extend for a minimum period of 10 years or for 8 years prescribed plus the 2-year advance notice required for termination of the agreement.

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

Optional coverage is provided (beginning January 1, 1951) for employees of States and their political subdivisions if the State government negotiates a coverage agreement with the Federal Security Administrator for such coverage. Excluded from such possible coverage are employees in positions covered under other public retirement systems (viz, policemen and firemen), employees engaged in work-relief projects, or patients or inmates who perform services in a hospital or other institution; also excluded, at the request of the State, may be services of an emergency nature, or those performed by elected officials, part-time workers, workers paid on a fee basis.

Senator Morse Helps Good-Neighbor Policy With Respect to Mexico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the recent loan of $150,000,000 to Mexico by the Export-Import Bank represents a forward step of great magnitude in promoting a good-neighbor policy between this country and Mexico. Great credit should be given to the distinguished and able Senator from Oregon, the Honorable WAYNE MORSE, for the interest he has taken and the part he has had in bringing this matter to a satisfactory conclusion. It is pleasing to learn that his great service has been recognized in an editorial appearing in the Laredo Times, issue of September 10, 1950. This editorial, which I include as part of my remarks, reads as follows:

Mexico's $150,000,000 loan from the Export-Import Bank represents a big step forward for realistic thinking in Washington and Mexico City.

For the past several years Mexico has been trying to negotiate several loans through Washington, which have been turned down.

One of these suggested loans went so far that President Truman himself publicly announced that the loan would be made and that he was 100 percent for the loan. The very next day the State Department announced that the loan had been refused.

This confusion in our State Department is a matter of record on more things than on loans to Mexico. Therefore, this new policy concerning the progress of Mexico is refreshing.

The McAllen Monitor, which is considered one of the most outstanding small papers in the United States, a few days ago commented editorially that it was about time that some of the progress that we are passing around in the United States reach the places where it can actually be more beneficial. Thus the Monitor endorsed the $150,000,000 Export-Import Bank loan to Mexico.

There has already been too much said about the fog and confusion and the disloyal people in our State Department.

It is time that we blow the whistle of victory when our State Department comes around to realize that the safety and progress of North America is inseparably tied up with the progress and security of Mexico.

This fog we speak of in the State Department (which we admit has a silver lining now) did receive some lifting from a Senator who one would think would be too far removed from Mexico to realize that country's importance to the safety of the United States.

This Senator visited in Mexico for about 10 days last winter and while there reviewed, just as a matter of hemisphere solidarity, the needs which Mexico had requested from Washington—such as a loan.

This was Senator WAYNE MORSE, of Oregon, who is considered the most forward looking Republican in the United States Senate and has the distinction of voting more with the progressive Democrats than he has with the Republican Party. In fact, he is considered about 70 percent with the Truman Administration.

Senator MORSE, after leaving Mexico, reported back to Washington. There he said that he felt that Mexico had been sadly neglected and that it was about time that Washington woke up to the fact that not only charity but also progress and solidarity start at home.

Therefore, he recommended to President Truman and the various Government agencies that Mexico (which he considered an excellent 100 percent risk) receive substantial loans from Washington.

As we have already stated, Senator MORSE votes with the Progressive wing of the Democratic Party more than with his own Republicans. Yet in his own party the forward-looking Republicans are beginning to feel that if they are to win the White House in 1952 that no less place than the vice presidency can be offered Senator MORSE.

We mention this loan and Senator MORSE because we want to emphasize that it is about time that Senators from all of our 48 States wake up and realize that to preserve democracy we must not only talk the good-neighbor policy but we must demonstrate it.

At this point we say that if our Texas Senators and Congressmen in Washington would turn their eyes to the south of the Rio Grande more often and help Mexico they would be helping our own country increase its strength and reserves so that democracy can be preserved for all time against the ravage of communism.

Montana's Rights to Waterton-Belly Water Must Be Protected

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Montana [Mr. D'EWART] in urging that the International Joint Commission use every possible means at its disposal to come to an agreement with Canada for an equitable use of the Waterton-Belly water. I know that this Commission and the Montana delegation have all been working toward this end and I am alarmed at statements to the effect that Canada intends to use all of this water. Should this happen, we will of course be forced to take drastic steps and the Montana delegation will use every means at its disposal to corral all the water through the development of an all-American plan.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD the following letter which I have today sent to A. O. Stanley, Chairman, United States Section, International Joint Commission, Washington, D. C.:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 14, 1950.

Hon. A. O. STANLEY,
Chairman, United States Section,
International Joint Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: You will recall that in company with Senators MURRAY and ECTON and Representative D'EWART, I had a meeting in your office last week relative to the use of Waterton-Belly water. You will recall also that all four of us, the full Montana delegation, were somewhat alarmed at statements made by the Canadians that Canada proposed to use all of this water.

I would like to call to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that Montana needs this water also and has over many years planned to use all or part of it. We realize that Montana has the right and the power to use the water first but we would like to cooperate with our Canadian neighbors and we would not dream of taking it all to the detriment of Canada unless we are forced to do so and that proves to be the only way to get a fair share of this water which originates in our State. Montana has held off pushing for an all-American plan because we had hoped that this matter would be worked out amicably both to the satisfaction of Montana and Canada. I want to urge upon you, Mr. Chairman, that you and your group continue to do everything you possibly can to see that Montana's rights are protected in the use of the Waterton-Belly water. If it becomes evident that an equitable apportionment cannot be expected as a result of this reference, I can assure you the Montana delegation in cooperation with other State delegations, will explore ways and means to find some way to develop an all-American plan for the use of this water.

Must close now but thanking you for your courtesy in meeting with the Montana delegation last week, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MIKE MANSFIELD.

Hon. William T. Granahan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to me to take this opportunity to express my high regard for our distinguished colleague, the Honorable WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN, of the Second District of Pennsylvania, and to place before the House a commendation of Mr. GRANAHAN, voiced by Mr. Elihu D. Stone, of the American Zionist Council, a great American and humanitarian of whom we are all justly proud.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that we, as Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, should not permit to go unnoticed the words of high tribute expressed in homage to Mr. GRANAHAN in recognition of his distinguished services to the Nation as a Member of the House.

By his untiring devotion to duty and profound concern with the legislative measures before the House, he has demonstrated not only his ability to cope with the urgent problems with which the Nation must contend, but also his awareness and determination to meet the needs of the constituents he is privileged to serve. Mr. GRANAHAN, a veteran of World War I, is a man of character, integrity, and action, whose career in public office reflects credit on our Nation and his community.

It is with great pleasure that I include in the RECORD, under leave, as part of my remarks, the communication addressed to the gentleman on June 21 by Mr. Elihu D. Stone, to which I have previously referred:

AMERICAN ZIONIST COUNCIL,
WASHINGTON BUREAU.

Hon. WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN GRANAHAN: The joint declaration by the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France relative to the Near East, which was made public by the President on May 25, is a significant document which may lead to the establishment of peaceful relationship between Israel and Arab neighbors if honestly carried out.

Your kind and effective cooperation in urging our State Department to take action for the purpose of promoting peace and tranquillity in the Near East is deeply appreciated.

The said declaration, as I analyze it contains the following points:

1. For the first time in modern history the Big Three—the United States of America, England, and France—agreed on concerted and coordinated action in that sensitive region of the world, the Near East. It is a wholesome substitute for the pursuit of the hitherto policy of unilateral action resulting very often in conflicting action. It imposes collective responsibility.

2. The calling for a pledge on the Arab countries and Israel to refrain from any and every aggressive or warlike action against one another as a condition precedent to the future delivery of arms should serve to discourage the Arab warmongers.

3. The pledge by the Big Three to place Israel in a condition of equality and parity with the Arab states with reference to delivery of arms, and the establishment of a balance of arms between them, if honestly carried out, should serve as an encouragement toward establishment of permanent peace between the Arab states and Israel.

4. The unequivocal declaration by the Big Three of their opposition to the development of an arms race between the Arab states and Israel implies a policy of vigilant watchfulness obligating the Big Three to stop the shipment of arms whenever the threat of such an arms race manifests itself.

5. The Big Three pledged themselves to take immediate and joint action whenever and wherever a threat to peace in that section of the world may appear. They agreed to take such joint action within and outside the United Nations. The term outside is most decisive. It implies speedy and prompt action by the Big Three to prevent a threat of aggression from being converted into actual aggression.

Like any other similar document, this declaration will not execute itself. It is as strong as the reliability of its authors and no more.

We assume and we must assume that the Big Three—the United States, England, and France—acted and will continue to act in good faith.

However, in the light of past sad experiences and disappointments, we must rely upon the vigilance of the friends of Israel like your good self to see to it that the Department of State carries out honestly the terms of the said Big Three declaration. As you well know, the past record of the Near East Division of our Department of State is one of unfriendliness to Israel. The Bevin line dominated.

Your noble services to the cause of Israel will always be remembered. The Jewish people are a grateful people; they never forget their friends.

You, dear Congressman, have proven yourself to be a true and tested friend.

With kindest regards and best wishes,

Sincerely,

ELIHU D. STONE.

Let's Have a Little More Common Sense in the Potato Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it seems that each day something new happens that demonstrates how unrealistic our whole potato program has been. The latest that has come to my attention is the neglect to utilize our so-called potato surplus for the manufacture of industrial alcohol to be used in the production of synthetic rubber. We need rubber. It is in short supply. We need industrial alcohol for its production. We are in short supply. Potatoes are considered surplus. We continue to dump them even though they could be used to advantage in our synthetic rubber program.

It is discouraging to realize that the first of the Truman Administration's "control" programs is threatened by "burro-cratic" stubbornness. On September 1, the first of the allocation programs went into effect in which use of rubber for civilian needs was cut 17 percent. On September 7, the "watch-dog subcommittee" of the Senate Armed Services Committee took sharp issue with the Administration's handling of the stockpiling program and failure to reactivate the Government-owned synthetic rubber plants. Clearly indicated in the committee's report were further cuts in rubber available for auto tires and other civilian needs.

Strangely enough, two of the biggest synthetic plants now idle use a process in which industrial alcohol is a necessary ingredient. I am informed that the supply of industrial alcohol is short. The Department of Agriculture has bought over 2,000,000 bushels of potatoes in New Jersey under the price-support program and has ordered them dumped. It is expected that they will buy several more millions of bushels of potatoes before the harvest has been completed.

Across the river in Philadelphia is one of the largest industrial alcohol plants in the country, that as recently as last February used surplus potatoes in the manufacture of alcohol. At that time, the Secretary of Agriculture was able to get special freight-rate concessions from the Pennsylvania Railroad to move potatoes from New York State and from Long Island to Philadelphia.

Why is not similar action taken now, that the potatoes may not be completely wasted and raw materials made available that synthetic-rubber production may be increased? Why not a little more common sense?

Senator Lehman Accepts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Senator HERBERT H. LEHMAN in accepting the nomination of the Democratic Party:

REMARKS OF SENATOR HERBERT H. LEHMAN ACCEPTING NOMINATION OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Chairman and delegates to this convention, this is a gratifying moment. My satisfaction today is increased by knowing that you have just nominated for Governor of New York my old and good friend, Judge Walter Lynch. You may be sure that I will be proud and happy to stand on the same platform and run on the same ticket with a man of his caliber and integrity.

In your wisdom, you have nominated in him a man of selfless devotion to the public interest. He has not sought public notice or acclaim. But I know of his long and distinguished record in Washington, always on the side of the public interest. In recent years he has been the leader in the fight for liberal tax and social-security legislation. He has been a good Democrat and a great liberal.

I know of his sound judgment and his legislative skill. But most of all I know of his fighting heart. That is what he and all of us will need in the weeks head. With that fighting heart and courage, he is going to win. I know, because I am going to win with him.

I have come to Rochester and to this hall today almost directly from the floor of the United States Senate. I secured the permission of the Senate to be absent so that I could be here. But I may not long delay my return. Every day, almost every hour, questions of momentous importance to our country, and to the world, are being considered and decided.

Tomorrow or the next day, we will vote on internal security legislation. I am going to vote for President Truman's bill to combat subversive Communist elements. I am going to vote for the legislation recommended by J. Edgar Hoover, director of the FBI.

I, myself, have sponsored legislation to put all Communists and would-be spies and saboteurs in detention camps during times of invasion or other national emergency. In my judgment that would in a practical manner really meet the Communist threat to our internal security. I hope my bill will pass.

But I am going to vote against the Mundt-Ferguson bill. That bill would not harm Communists at all, because they could and would evade it. That bill would, on the other hand, endanger ordinary patriotic citizens and legitimate patriotic organizations, such as labor unions and even church groups which take an active interest in social questions.

But be assured when I go back to Washington—tomorrow and next January—I am going to fight, and to keep on fighting, just as hard as I know how against communism, and against Communists. And also for Americanism and for all Americas. I will persist in my efforts to defend all our rights.

Mr. Chairman, I came to Rochester because I wanted to see and speak in person to the duly elected representatives of the political party—my political party—which is going to take over the government of New York State next January. If candidates are elected on their record, and on the issues—and I sincerely believe that New Yorkers vote that way—I have no doubt that a new administration is going to take over in Albany next January, and that you, my friends, will have nominated those men.

On the record, and on the facts, the people will vote for our candidates.

In every national crisis since the Civil War, the American people have turned to the Democratic Party for leadership. Today as never before the people need bold, courageous, and imaginative leadership. Let us proceed in that tradition and with that confidence.

The delegates to the New York State convention of the Democratic Party have greatly honored me in offering me again the nomination for the high office of United States Senator. I accept this nomination with a deep sense of the responsibility which it entails. I accept it with warm appreciation of this expression of continuing confidence.

The greater part of my adult life has been devoted to public service. At no time have I felt the call to such service as urgently as today. Our Nation is confronted with problems of such magnitude that they challenge each of us to bring to their solution the greatest contribution of which he is capable.

During my first term in the United States Senate I have found that in this forum, above all others, I can best serve the people of my State and of my country.

The overriding problem with which the new Congress, like the old Congress, will be concerned, is the menacing threat of Soviet communism. To counter this threat I have supported and shall continue to support every measure designed to strengthen the military defenses of the free world, and the internal defenses of the United States.

Yet I am convinced that military and security measures are not alone sufficient. Not by far. They must be supplemented by furnishing the world with a fighting example of democracy at its best.

Clearly reaction offers no acceptable answer to communism in the field of ideas. The only effective answer lies in the American tradition of enlightened liberalism. This means that we must continue to seek for ourselves, as well as for others, an ever-improving standard of living and an ever-widening range of opportunity, an ever-continuing sense of freedom and justice in a world at peace. I say this in full recognition of the fact that progress toward these ends may necessarily be temporarily slowed because of the priority that must be given to the demands of military mobilization, defense and foreign aid required to meet and overcome the pressing dangers of this day.

It is in this spirit and these beliefs that I look forward with undiminished enthusiasm to six more years of service to my State and my country.

Democratic Candidates "Marined" by Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Jack Ramey, one of the top newspapermen of the country, has written a very lucid and informative article on the subject, Democratic Candidates "Marined" by Truman.

Much has been said about this subject but Mr. Ramey covers it so completely I felt that readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would be glad to read this very able summation of the important topics discussed in the article:

"MARINED" BY TRUMAN

When President Truman completed his Marine-ing with a full apology to the Marine Corps in his abject haste to retrieve an abysmal, unexplainable blunder, it was apparent that he might become the biggest load Democratic candidates would have to carry in the November elections.

Easiest thing in the world for a wrongdoer is to do intentionally a thing he knows is an error, and then rush with an apology to the persons harmed, with a full expectation—even knowledge—that they are going to judge him a good fellow for eating his words or acts and forget the affront.

Nine times out of ten that apologetic, subservient crow-eater is going to pull the same procedure upon the next victim unaware of his methods.

Mr. Truman, may the heavens help us, is beyond compare as a Presidential blunderer adept at doing things without thinking. Without thinking, he says. Then he apologizes, and every marine and the entire country is to accept it, please, for this is the President speaking. When the one person in the entire Nation supposed to know better would be the President.

There's never been a President like Mr. Truman. That is conceded. He accepted a speech from Henry Wallace for examination and approved it, and Mr. Wallace immediately vocalized his communistic diatribe in New York City and the trouble popped right back into the lap of Mr. Truman, who, Mr. Wallace said rightly, had approved the speech.

Mr. Truman got out of that one the hard way. His reason for approving the speech: He had not read it. He knew Mr. Wallace's leftward leanings—or, as President of the United States, he should have known them—but his simple explanation was that he had not read the speech. A glance at the trouble-maker's speech would have sufficed, but the President had omitted the glance.

For his Missouri confederates, inadequate for the administration places he finds for them, he never so much as apologizes. They are his friends, and he's going to stick with them through every flood of criticism. Mr. Truman and his friends can do no wrong. The country is stuck with them.

There is throughout this country a vast distrust of Dean Acheson's capabilities as Secretary of State and of Louis Johnson's performance as Secretary of Defense.

Mr. Truman tells the country succinctly that they are going to remain in the administration so long as he is President, because Mr. Truman believes in them. There is no doubt that Mr. Acheson and Mr. Johnson try their best. It still is a fact that virtually everything they say is derided by the citizens, because the citizens' faith in Mr. Acheson and Mr. Johnson long since evaporated.

Mr. Truman's duty is not to himself and his belief in his selections, Mr. Acheson and Mr. Johnson. His duty is to the majority of the citizens' conviction that Mr. Acheson and Mr. Johnson, splendid private citizens though they be, are not big enough for their administration positions.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur is taken to task for his statement regarding Formosa's necessity as a UN defense against possible Russian attack. He was ripped apart because he failed, it was said, to consult policy-makers in the Defense and State Departments before issuing the statement the administration tried to squelch.

Russia hops upon the statement as proof of United States imperialistic intention.

Now, what were the facts?

General MacArthur had talked to one United States policymakers after another in Tokyo. He knew their intentions, and he was talking with Washington every day, and he knew what had happened in Korea, and he must have known that the administration was writing off Formosa.

A diplomat and a world stagewise militarist who knew his every word brought publicity not only in the United States but around the world, he must have considered that statement well, and he must have determined that he was going to issue it, no matter what the outcome.

His reason? General MacArthur had decided—and so stated—that Formosa, on the Soviet perimeter, was the best place for blunting any air or sea attack upon the United States from Russia. He had determined that Formosa was more than worth the gamble, that, even though it eventually might be lost, it would more than overbalance the chance by placing United States air strength where it could trade blow for blow with the Russians, and from the most advantageous position.

Now, I submit that the only reason General MacArthur issued his statement was that he knew, he must have known from his conferences, that the administration was opposed to placing forces upon Formosa, and that he considered the United States populace should be apprised of the contrary opinion for use of Formosa, and why.

A lesser general might not have issued the statement, because it would have meant his walking papers home. General MacArthur realized it would cause trouble, but that the administration would not dare move him out of Japan for it. He simply was a figure large enough to place a foreign policy view opposing the administration's opinion before the people without being railroaded for it.

What Moscow thinks, what propaganda it makes, of General MacArthur's statement can be disregarded. Moscow is going to do whatever Moscow thinks it can do in defeating the UN intention, spearheaded by the United States, of preventing world-wide Communist expansion.

General MacArthur had a point to make—Formosa's strategic geographic importance for countering any attack instituted by sea or air from Russia.

The militarist-diplomat achieved his point, although the administration tried its best to have the statement withdrawn, and yielded only when it found a magazine already published was ready to hit the newsstands and could not be withdrawn.

There was no necessity for General MacArthur to apologize. Nor did he.

Unloading a Liability

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared in the New York World-Telegram of yesterday, September 13:

UNLOADING A LIABILITY

Defense Secretary Louis Johnson's resignation came as no surprise, despite President Truman's recent statement that Mr. Johnson and Secretary of State Acheson would never leave his Cabinet.

This is an election year.

Some of the Secretary's decisions, the bad consequences of which have been revealed by the Korean War, had made him a political liability.

Mr. Johnson's hardboiled economy program made him many enemies. But he is a determined, courageous man, who might have taken hostile criticism in stride if he had not put all his defense eggs in one basket.

He accepted the popular thesis that victory in war could be achieved by air power alone, and more particularly by strategic bombing. When the United States became involved in a war in which the atomic bomb could not be used it found itself with a Defense Establishment not geared to wage any other kind of war.

So Mr. Johnson became another casualty of Korea and of politics.

He also was the victim of certain circumstances over which he had little or no control.

Long before he took office blunders in American foreign policy—blunders for which Mr. Truman has basic responsibility—had set the stage for the abandonment of Nationalist China and the eventual Communist invasion of Korea.

Moreover, it had been decided not to defend Korea from such an invasion. When that decision was reversed overnight, and properly reversed, Mr. Johnson and our other military planners naturally were not prepared for the emergency suddenly thrust upon them.

Secretary Acheson sponsored many of the unwise policies which contributed to Mr. Johnson's undoing. Mr. Acheson inherited those policies, especially the disastrous China policy, from his State Department predecessor, Gen. George C. Marshall.

Yet President Truman has selected General Marshall to succeed Mr. Johnson, and will ask Congress to make that possible by changing the law which forbids appointment as Secretary of Defense of any person who within 10 years has been an active officer in the Regular armed services.

General Marshall is a professional soldier—a great one—to whom this country owes great gratitude for military services of the highest order.

But the law which requires the Department of Defense to be headed by a civilian is a wise law, supported by sound American traditions. Changing that law to make an exception in the case of General Marshall would establish a dangerous precedent. This newspaper believes that Congress should not change it.

Moreover, the general's legacy of mistakes in State Department policy would handicap him heavily as head of the Department which now must try to overcome the consequences of those mistakes.

Calling up a big name from retirement for that job impresses us as a political attempt to gloss over a situation distasteful to Mr. Truman. But it is not good politics for General Marshall, for the Defense Establishment, or for the country. The position demands an able, vigorous, wise civilian administrator, free from any necessity to defend past errors, free to devote his full time and energy to defense of America.

Universal Military Training Should Be Enacted Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is a source of great dissatisfaction to me that the second session of the Eighty-first Congress is planning to recess without any action on a bill to provide universal military training.

It has been argued that the question of universal military training is too controversial a subject to spend time on before the fall elections. I am inclined to disagree with that theory. Since the subject has been raised, I have received a great many letters from constituents urging that universal military training be enacted without delay. The writers were not only veterans of World War I and II, but also parents of boys who will be affected by universal military training, and parents of men who fought in the last war. It is my observation that the matter is not as controversial as is commonly thought. I believe that a vast majority of Americans have reluctantly accepted the inescapable fact that universal military training is necessary now, whether we like it or not. Beside the individual popular clamor for universal military training, the press of the Nation has lined up in favor of it, with only a few, and characteristic, exceptions.

The United States is the only major nation in the world which does not have a military training program. How much longer are we to slumber?

It may be true, as some say, that the Army itself does not want universal military training because of the shortage of personnel with which to train the recruits. If that is the case, I say let us take remedial steps immediately. Let the Army pick out men already within its ranks who are best fitted as instructors and cadre personnel. Let the Department of Defense begin to reopen camps which could be used for such training.

It is true, of course, that universal military training, even if enacted tomorrow, would provide no men for the Korean conflict, but the passage of such a bill would be of great psychological value throughout the world. It would serve notice on the Kremlin that we are willing to sacrifice and work for our goals, no matter how long it takes.

At the moment, the United States is enjoying the luxury of time in which to prepare ourselves for the future. It should be completely clear to everyone that we must move immediately toward some systematic method of providing military manpower for the days ahead. Such legislation should be enacted before this Congress goes home.

The Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee—Article by Robert K. Walsh

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESTER C. HUNT
OF WYOMING
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Robert K. Walsh, published in the Sunday Star for September 10, 1950, in regard to the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE PREPAREDNESS UNIT GETS OFF TO ROARING START—SUCCESSOR TO TRUMAN COMMITTEE STIRS UP FEDERAL AGENCIES WITH ITS RECOMMENDATIONS

(By Robert K. Walsh)

"Like father, like son" is a description that will have to be used in more than a relative sense when applied to the new "Truman committee" in the Senate.

Born less than 2 months ago, the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services is a creature of the Korean crisis. It is, nonetheless, a natural heir of the special committee that functioned from March 1941 to 1948 for investigation of the national-defense program.

By its own admission, and unquestionably with the paternal blessing of former Senator Harry S. Truman, Democrat, of Missouri, who headed the war investigating committee from March 1941 to August 1944, this currently created subcommittee proposed to "reactivate the Truman committee which showed so effectively what a legislative investigating committee could do during a grave emergency when close understanding between the legislative and executive branches is essential to the national security."

But the new seven-member group, headed by Senator JOHNSON, Democrat, of Texas, is no longer a fledgling, if indeed it ever had time to enjoy preliminary pursuits.

The impact of its first interim report, published last Thursday, has been heavy on Capitol Hill. Moreover, the subcommittee's activities that prompted the recommendations of that report have stirred many administrative agencies into an explosive chain reaction in recent weeks.

PRIMARY OBJECTIVES

It is no disrespect to the Truman committee's methods and achievements to observe that the preparedness subcommittee already has set something of a record in blending unanimity, quietness, scope, and the one-two punch.

The effectiveness of its first report—whether or not all its findings were correct—was doubly compelling because the subcommittee and its still small staff have worked with a minimum of words and covered a vast area since last July 17.

The subcommittee's prime job at the moment, as explained by Chairman JOHNSON, is to rid the Government—and that means Congress, too—of the "siesta psychology."

Its main operations to date have dealt with proposals for conserving and developing the supply of natural and synthetic rubber and with putting the surplus property disposal system in line with national emergency demands. It is concerned not merely with the Korean situation, but any possible kind of future war, hot or cold, military or economic, declared or undeclared.

The subcommittee, despite its youth, and notwithstanding its fondness for comparative quiet, cannot be accused of hiding its light under the Capitol dome.

"Facts discovered by the subcommittee in its short existence has justified its creation," the members declare. "The improvements in preparedness which have already resulted from its activities show that it must continue and expand its efforts."

NO RABBIT CHASING

Under the resolution that created it, the subcommittee hardly can harbor a passion for anonymity. It is supposed to report at least every 30 days to the Senate Armed Services Committee on the results of its watchfulness.

Last July the following members assembled under the chairmanship of Senator JOHNSON, sponsor of the resolution by which the full committee established the Preparedness Subcommittee: Senators CHAPMAN, Kentucky, KEFAUVER, Tennessee, and HUNT, Wyoming, Democrats; BRIDGES, New Hampshire, SALTONSTALL, Massachusetts, and MORSE, Oregon, Republicans.

"We were not created to tell the generals and admirals how to fight battles, but rather to make sure that they and their men have what they need to fight those battles," the chairman told them.

"We will not hunt headlines. Politics will be left at the committee room door. We will strive for unanimity. We will see uncolored, unemotional facts. There will be no second-guessing, battle-front strategy. We propose to be blunt but not unfair; zealous but not persecuting; helpful but not compromising."

And, as a postscript, another member assured reporters that "we don't want to go rabbit chasing."

Even before it was born—or reborn, as the case may be—the subcommittee had a large slice of work cut out for it.

SURPLUS SALES STOPPED

The surplus-disposal program had become a problem before Korea made it acute. The rubber supply had aroused considerable concern. Senator JOHNSON, for instance, urged the Office of Rubber Reserve in the RFC early in July to take faster and longer steps in reactivation of synthetic rubber plants.

There also was a major question—discussed at the subcommittee's first meeting—of the way in which the Defense Department spent almost $49,000,000,000 since the 1946 military demobilization.

Subcommittee sources say they did not have to be prodded by the course of events during July and August to center their attention on industrial preparedness and military material requirements in the United States.

"We wanted to make certain," they said, "that we are not continuing to demobilize with one hand while trying to mobilize with the other."

In its effort to speed the slackened tempo of the postwar period in and out of Government, the subcommittee came up with evidence that caused the General Services Administration recently to freeze the sale of all Government-owned property previously declared surplus.

In its first formal report and the infrequent public and private comments of its members and staff, the subcommittee often has employed fighting language. In this it has been referring to itself as much as to Korea.

STIRS MUNITIONS BOARD

"The subcommittee," it says, "has fought at every Government level for reactivation of our synthetic rubber-producing program. The word 'fought' is used advisedly."

Furthermore, it has waded into what could be a first-rate feud with the Munitions Board.

Complaining that it has not yet received a satisfactory reply to its inquiries about establishing a firm, aggressive acquisition program for natural rubber, the subcommittee stated last week:

"Either the Munitions Board has a program or it has not. If it has a program it could readily be described. If it has no program it should be candidly admitted. In any event, if the diligence to which the Munitions Board addressed itself to our inquiry is any measure of the manner in which it attends to its other duties, its competence would seem to leave something to be desired."

In any event, the subcommittee says its suggestions so far have been heeded by several key agencies. And, it indicates it has just begun to fight wherever it believes necessary to cope not only with shooting in Korea but with the distinct threat of a war of attrition in which the total resources and the total productivity of the Nation must be kept constantly available."

MODEST HEADQUARTERS

For such a far-flung battle line the subcommittee at present maintains GHQ in one room off the Armed Services Committee's suite in the Senate Office Building.

Besides its chief counsel, Donald C. Cook, it has a staff of only two secretaries but avails itself of specialists from the full committee staff. With an appropriation of $25,000, it manages to save money also by calling on specialists from administrative agencies.

Widely known in Washington as Vice Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Mr. Cook began his Government career 17 years ago on the SEC staff in the Legal and Public Utilities Divisions.

From 1943 to 1945 he was special counsel to the old House Naval Affairs Committee. After a year as executive assistant to the Attorney General, he became Alien Property Custodian in 1946. He returned to private practice of law here for 2 years before going back to SEC as Vice Chairman.

Whatever idea the subcommittee had of beginning with a leisurely look into the Defense Department and related matters was soon dispelled. That, according to members, does not mean the subcommittee dashes about in all directions.

MANY SIMILARITIES

Nor does it means, they assure fellow Members of Congress, that the subcommittee will necessarily collide with other congressional "watchers" or investigators. The House Armed Services Committee, for example, has more than a half dozen subcommittees checking on various phases of the national defense conditions and planning.

In the public view, however, the preparedness subcommittee is far more likely to be compared constantly with the Truman committee, or at least the wartime phase of that committee's record.

Many similarities are obvious already to anyone who remembers the work of the former committee, and especially the policy that the then Senator Truman laid down against investigating matters of military strategy or tactics.

Further resemblances may develop when and if the Preparedness Subcommittee reaches the stage of public hearings or adopts the "case system" generally followed by the old war investigating committee.

But the times have changed and the subcommittee seems bound to change with them. The studies it is making and on which it will report from time to time carry echoes from the early 1940's, but they touch on yet wider and more troublesome topics.

The Preparedness Subcommittee is not embarrassed about being acclaimed as the Truman committee's successor. It merely wants the public to understand that it has a mind as well as a way of its own.

St. Joseph's Church, Buffalo, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTHONY F. TAURIELLO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Members of Congress will want to join with me in extending felicitations to the pastor and parishioners of a church in my home town of Buffalo which last Sunday celebrated its one hundredth anniversary.

I refer to the little church built log by log by the farm folk of Elysville, N. Y., in the autumn of 1849. When it had been completed in January of 1850, it was dedicated to God and named for St. Joseph. As the years went by, Elysville became the Buffalo Plains and later the University Heights section of Buffalo. The log church was supplanted by a stone church on the same site at Englewood Avenue and Main Street.

The Reverend Bernard Fritsch, S. J., was the first pastor of St. Joseph's which was founded by half the families who belonged to St. John's Mission Church in Northbush, now the intersection of Englewood and Belmont Avenues, town of Tonawanda.

During the first 35 years of the church's existence, 26 priests served as pastors, some for a few weeks and some for 5 years. Frequently, secular priests were so scarce that members of religious orders were called upon for brief pastorates.

The Reverend George Zurcher, who was pastor from 1885 to 1900, built a new brick church and rectory in 1894. It was in the period from 1908 to 1944, during the pastorate of the Right Reverend Joseph Schemel, one of St. Joseph's most highly respected pastors, that the school, the present rectory and the church were built and, by 1939, all were free of debt. In June 1944, Monsignor Schemel celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination and died 3 months later at the age of 72.

The present pastor of the church is the Right Reverend Albert Rung who was named pastor in 1945, after serving 16 years as pastor of St. Mary's Church in East Eden and 12 years as pastor of Blessed Trinity Church.

The history of St. Joseph's Church is one of considerable struggle and a great amount of hard work over the years. It has achieved an enviable record in religious, educational, and community matters and occupies a respected place in Buffalo.

I am proud to acquaint the Members of Congress with the successful achievements of this fine parish and of its present pastor whose spiritual leadership and indomitable perseverance augur well for the future of the church.

I am sure that the members will join with me in extending to Monsignor Rung, to the good Sisters of St. Joseph who teach at the school and to the parishioners, cordial greetings on this centennial celebration, and all possible good wishes for the coming years.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am herewith including an article from the Buffalo Evening News of September 11, relating the story of the anniversary celebration.

FOLLOW EXAMPLE SET BY ST. JOSEPH'S, BISHOP O'HARA SAYS

The Most Reverend John F. O'Hara, CSC, bishop of the Buffalo diocese, Sunday morning commended to a world seeking peace the example of devotion set by parishioners of St. Joseph's Church.

"The world can have peace," Bishop O'Hara declared, "only when it has the formula that has blessed this congregation throughout its 100 years"—that of obedience to God and the living of His rules.

Bishop O'Hara presided at a solemn high mass which initiated a 5-day program commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the church at 3269 Main Street. The Very Reverend Raymond Schouten, S. J., Canisius College president, delivered the sermon.

"Too many people want to change the rules of God," warned the bishop.

MILESTONE TO GLORY OF GOD

"Only when they are God's rules that we live by can we have peace in the world and international understanding. You have demonstrated that here in your 100 years which have been blessed. Ask God to spread that spirit all over the world."

Father Schouten said the anniversary is a cause for profound rejoicing because it marks a "milestone to the glory of God."

In a century of Catholic education, "boys and girls of St. Joseph's have been * * * trained in the ideal of working for our neighbors, working for God, and being good citizens of the land where they were born—100 years of the saving influence of correct education, 100 years of young men and women setting up homes from the altar of God."

MESSAGE OF GOD'S LOVE

"All over the world parishes and churches have been destroyed, devoted Christian followers killed and maimed," he continued. "Yet here we have a miracle of 100 years of solid accomplishment and God's grace poured into the city of Buffalo through devoted Catholic hearts."

St. Joseph's anniversary, Father Schouten said, also is a cause for reflection upon "God's wondrous design of love. * * * From all eternity God has planned so many souls to be a credit to Him * * * and for 100 years souls have lived * * * here to be a credit to Almighty God. The message of God's love is written in large letters all over this parish."

FIVE HUNDRED INSPECT NEW CONVENT

The Right Reverend Albert Rung, pastor, celebrated the mass. He was aided by his assistant pastors, the Reverend Paul J. Eberz and the Reverend Arthur T. Sullivan. Assisting Bishop O'Hara were the Reverend Charles A. Klauder, pastor of St. John the Baptist Church, Kenmore, and the Reverend William M. Martin, pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes.

The Very Reverend John Lodge McHugh, assistant pastor of St. Joseph's Cathedral, was master of ceremonies to the bishop.

The Most Reverend Joseph A. Burke, V. G., auxiliary bishop, was assisted by the Very Reverend John Obendorfer, CSSR, pastor of St. Mary's Church, and the Reverend Gerald McCann, OFM, of St. Patrick's Church. The Reverend Martin Marnon, of the Little Seminary, also participated.

More than 500 former and present parishioners inspected the new convent for the Sisters of St. Joseph, adjoining the church, during a reception Sunday afternoon and evening in the school hall.

Complaint Against General Electric Co.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

SEPTEMBER 14, 1950.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Pursuant to the provisions of the Federal Trade Commission Act, International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, CIO, herewith applies for the issuance of a complaint against the General Electric Co. IUE-CIO charges that General Electric Co. has engaged in acts and practices which prejudice and injure the public and constitute unfair and deceptive acts and practices in commerce within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

General Electric Co. is a New York corporation having its office and principal place of business at 570 Lexington Avenue, New York, N. Y. The company is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of electrical equipment in interstate commerce.

At present the General Electric Co. is engaged in a labor dispute with the International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, CIO, and its thousands of members in the General Electric plants. To maintain whatever "institutional good will" it still possesses and for the purpose of inducing the purchase of its products, the General Electric Co. has caused to be published, in newspapers which have been circulated among its purchasers and prospective purchasers located in the various States in the United States and in the District of Columbia, false, misleading, and deceptive statements and representations. Such statements and representations pertain to the value of the offer which the General Electric Co. has made to IUE-CIO, to the nature of the working conditions at plants of the company, and to the character of the company's labor-relations policies. Typical of the statements and representations contained in such advertising matter are the following:

"What is the GE offer?

* * * * *

"2. $125 a month guaranteed minimum retirement incomes, with no ceilings; pensions go up as pay and service go up. * * *

"Other plans in the news have $100, $104, or $117.50 as the maximum for 25 years service—and some go to $125 for 30 years.

"3. A whole new broad program of life, sickness, and accident insurance; hospitalization, surgical, and maternity benefits.

"These benefits are right up with the best of the recently publicized settlements, or in the rest of major industry.

* * * * *

"5. That means 10 to 15½ cents an hour in wage increases offered in the 90 days of negotiations.

"And the increased pensions and insurance programs in addition are worth still another 15 to 28 cents an hour to our employees.

"And the new holiday offered—Election Day—means another day's pay without work.

"The total of the wage offers and the value of the insurance and pension programs is obviously worth 25½ to 43½ cents an hour, plus the extra holiday."

A copy of the advertisement in which these statements and representations appear is attached to this letter.

The statements and representations quoted above are false, misleading, and deceptive.

"First, the pension plans referred to in the above advertisement as having recently received wide publicity are noncontributory in nature. By comparing its own plan with such noncontributory plans GE has given the impression that its pension plan is also noncontributory. This misleading impression is strengthened by the fact that the advertisement is silent concerning the type of pension plan which is the subject of GE's proposal. In truth and in fact, the GE pension plan is not noncontributory, but calls for substantial contributions by GE workers.

"Further, in actuality the insurance and other benefits offered by GE are not as advantageous as similar benefits involved in recently published settlements or in effect in the rest of major industry.

"Finally, GE has grossly perverted the truth in implying that its offer to IUE-CIO is worth 25 cents to 43½ cents an hour. In fact its offer is worth far less. GE has admitted this. In other advertisements, it has attempted to explain away its falsehood by contending that in the assertion quoted above, it referred not to the value of the increases offered by it, but the combined value of present programs and offered improvements. Even so, the assertion is false. The falsehood is patently demonstrated by the fact that the company has tried to justify the alleged value of its pension and insurance programs by asserting that the figures given are what an individual would have to pay for similar protection outside the company, not what they do cost under a group program. There can be no reasonable construction of the company's statement concerning the total of its wage offers and insurance and pension programs that is not in flagrant conflict with the truth."

The effects of the foregoing misrepresentations are as follows:

1. Large sections of the consuming public are influenced in their purchases by the labor relations policies of producers. The General Electric Co. grossly misrepresented to consumers its actual labor-relations policy. It has grossly misrepresented to them the actual working conditions in its plants. Thereby the General Electric Co. has materially deceived purchasers and prospective purchasers of its products.

2. By its conduct General Electric has also engaged in major misrepresentations to its workers concerning the services and other compensation it would furnish them in return for their labor.

3. The General Electric Co. has falsely disparaged its competitors, their working conditions, and labor policies. By doing so, it has engaged in unfair methods of competition.

IUE-CIO is fully aware of the necessity for preservation of the fullest possible measure of free speech on the part of parties to industrial disputes. In no way is IUE-CIO seeking to cause any infringement of that freedom. GE has a right to express its opinions. We request, however, that the Federal Trade Commission act to prevent gross misrepresentations of fact by the General Electric Co. in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Enforcement of such legislation would not in any way impair General Electric's freedom of speech.

We are fully aware, of course, that our request may be unprecedented, and seem to require a novel application of the law. We believe that such application would be within the principle of the law. No corporation, no matter how large, should be permitted to use its unrestricted access to the public press to gain unfair economic advantage over its business competitors through deceiving the consuming public and its employees by publication of grossly misleading, deceptive, and mendacious statements as to its conditions of employment.

Very truly yours,

JAMES B. CAREY,
Chairman, Administrative Committee.

Special Political Letter by A. L. Schultz

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT A. MEYER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, one of the great political analysts and writers of the country is Mr. A. L. (Dutch) Schultz, of the Topeka State Journal. His sage observations and comments have long been respected by all Kansans. His faculty for hitting the nail on the head and boring through to the fundamentals of issues has great weight among the thinking people not only of Kansas but of the entire Middle West. This faculty is well evidenced by his weekly column of August 30 in which he sets forth the reasons for the grave anxiety which grips the people of this country today.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include his comments herewith:

TOPEKA, KANS., August 30.—Kansans have lost faith in the soundness, the clear thinking, and even the integrity of men in high places in their Government in a measure never before registered in this State.

Nobody is going to be able to immediately change that thinking. It will require months, maybe years, to restore confidence in official Washington. In a period of weeks public doubt, suspicion, and resentment against policymakers in the National Capital has mounted almost to complete distrust. It is in no measure political. It doesn't apply to any group or class of citizens. It affects people of all ages, all groups, all creeds, and in all walks of life from the little man with a broom or a truck patch to the highest salaried executive in the community.

Something seems to have loosened the flood gates of a pent-up public resentment that has been gathering in volume for months. There is no one feature of National Government to which a person can point as the real cause of this shattered faith that seemingly extends into every locality. The reports which are brought to Topeka from every element of sentiment sounding combine in providing a common story. People are confused, bewildered, uncertain, and in a large measure—afraid. The cause of their fear isn't entirely clear. Really, most people don't know. Their unrest stems from a loss of confidence in Washington philosophies, and in the sound judgment and stability of men who shape and execute domestic and foreign policies.

The Korean situation contributed tremendously to this crash in confidence. Don't put an improper interpretation on that sentence. Kansans and people everywhere in the Nation have the same deep-rooted loyalty to their Government that has made this country great in every crisis. Kansans won't complain about dollars spent for victory. They will sacrifice and pay in blood and tears. Yet away down inside, just about every Kansan has a feeling that something has gone wrong. Defenses don't add up to the scores of billions granted by Congress. Fighting forces are not equipped as advertised. Swaggering claims of the high command are not sustained by conditions on the fighting front.

You don't laugh those things off. Boys only recently home from the late world conflict, are surrendering jobs and opportunities. They are leaving newly established homes, saying good-by as they go to fight another war. Controls over prices, profits, wages—controls so easy to grant, so hard to regain—are greedily grabbed by the White House.

Hundreds of Kansans are volunteering—without pay—to aid the war effort. Yet those patriotic impulses are being deadened by acts of arrogant, bombastic labor dictators who threatened to back their country to the wall to win selfish gains. Neither management nor labor will gain public approval of moves which endanger national defenses, disrupt transportation, or produce economic chaos.

Each day there are new stories of private enterprise forced to surrender to racketeers with "influence." It is rather easy to understand how the little fellow—the forgotten man of a few years ago—develops the idea that the "influence" trial leads down Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington. And it is the little fellow who has to pay.

One by one, bit by bit, the man on the street and the woman in the home are putting together the suspicions and resentments which have developed over a long period. There is a tremendous notion that a supine Congress has all too often been more concerned with the approaching election than the stability and salvation of the country. Suspicion, doubt and fear have contributed to a state of confusion that ought to alarm folks in high offices. There is tremendous, deep-rooted feeling that the confidence of the people out in this great grain-growing area has been betrayed.

That notion is not based on any single act. There is a conviction that business is being pillaged and wrecked with public funds which should be used to encourage and build better, sounder private enterprise. There is deep resentment against the use of public money to put Government in competition with taxpayer groups. Maybe it is all just an awakening of dulled sensibilities at the end of a drunken doze during an orgy of Government squandering. Yet it is evidence of a trend of major importance.

Gradually the thought has developed that Government regulation, control, and competition is destroying freedom and opportunity. No single factor has been sufficiently powerful to smash the reservoir which held back a flood of increasing resentments. The threat of a welfare state didn't do it. Socialized medicine wasn't of sufficient force. Deficit spending jarred but didn't smash confidence in Washington. Government competition with private lending agencies didn't do it. Protests came when the Government used tax money to drive taxpaying private power projects to the wall. There was grass roots protest when rail and communication interests were intimidated and coerced. Trade agreements threatened destruction of the Midwest's livestock, grain, oil, and mineral interests. The workingman faced loss of his high wage scales when products of his toil were offered in competition with outputs from so-called slave-labor countries.

No single loss of freedom by the American citizen, though, brought the revolt that today threatens destruction of confidence in Washington policy makers. Now there is evidence that public faith in national leadership is at an all-time low. The average citizen is demanding that the country get along with the least possible Government dictation. Kansans themselves may react rather violently when the legislature comes to Topeka next winter. There is increasing thought, for example, that welfare expenditures should be made known to folks who pay the bills. That course would have been adopted some years ago, too, except for pressure on the lawmakers by the then Governor, Payne Ratner.

Every day there is new evidence that a resentful, balky Kansas is out to seek freedom from Washington dictates. The protests run to pattern. They are not from any political party. They are from men and women of all creeds and all walks of life. They want their voices heard on Capitol Hill and at the White House.

More Kansans have written to Members of Congress in the last 3 months than during any normal 5-year period. Those letters are a common outpouring of complaint. There is a mutual appeal for advice and assurance by bewildered men and women who voice disillusionment in the strange philosophies of their Government. Those letters reflect increasing suspicion and even a conviction that men in high offices have not told taxpayers and voters the truth about conditions. This accumulation of evidence arousing distrust has tended to add weight to stories about communistic infiltrations in offices of state. There are fears that lax, stupid, and even wanton neglect has caused loss of defense secrets of untold value.

Those things all add a touch of frenzy to appeals to Congress to take a tighter grip on controls. This demand goes hand in hand with the plea to safeguard and protect private enterprise against oppression and destruction. There is a fear on the lips of people who write those letters or sound those thoughts.

Something frightening may well be behind it all. America has known ground swells and protests in other years. They were leveled at private groups. Big business was often the target. Now business which provides employment pays taxes and develops markets is threatened in the same measure that human freedoms are endangered. It is a trend far greater than immediately realized This loss of confidence in men at the head of our Government is a threat of major magnitude.

Why Congressional Immunity?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESTER C. HUNT

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a broadcast on the subject Why Congressional Immunity? participated in by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] and myself on September 2, 1950.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY CONGRESSIONAL IMMUNITY?

The ANNOUNCER. The National Broadcasting Company presents The American Forum of the Air, founded 22 years ago by Theodore Granik, and dedicated to the full and public discussion of all sides of all issues, coming to you from the NBC Theater in Washington, D. C.

Now, here is your moderator, Theodore Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. Recent congressional investigations, with charges and countercharges, have stirred vigorous debate on the question of congressional immunity—that part of the Constitution which reads:

"And for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

There are some who feel that this gives to Members of Congress the privilege to make defamatory, smearing statements, with complete immunity from laws as applied to all other citizens.

But Senator LESTER C. HUNT, of Wyoming, has introduced a resolution lifting this congressional shield, making Members of Congress legally responsible and legally liable for their words and actions.

However, others feel the principle that Members of Congress shall not be held to answer in a libel or slander action for what they may say in the Halls of Congress is a part of the very bedrock of our legislative process. They contend that it would be the sheerest folly to abandon the system, simply because it has been abused on a few occasions.

So the American Forum of the Air has invited the author of the resolution, Senator HUNT, to discuss the issues involved with Senator JOHN C. STENNIS, of Mississippi, one of the Senate's leading constitutional authorities.

Senator HUNT, is our congressional immunity being used today for the purpose originally intended by our founding fathers?

Senator HUNT. It is not. A study of the origin of this provision in the parliamentary law of England, a study of the Constitution of the United States when it was adopted and discussion being entirely lacking on this provision, I would say we are using it today for an entirely different purpose from that which was intended.

I might elaborate on that for a minute just to show you what I mean.

In the English Parliament years ago, the King could do no harm. So it was during the reign of Queen Elizabeth that certain members of Parliament were taken to task, were imprisoned for remarks they made with reference to the throne.

A few years later, when Charles I was king, he left his residence one day, left the palace, and he said to his Queen, "When I return I will be master of my kingdom." He was on his way down to Parliament to arrest five men.

However, when he arrived at Parliament, the five men had heard of his coming and the purpose of his visit, and so they had left the halls of Parliament. When he demanded the chair, he was forced to say, "I see my birds have flown."

Immediately after that this immunity was written into the English law to protect the members of the Parliament from the Crown, from the King.

Our founding fathers adopted it for exactly the same principle that is, when our Government was founded, there were many who did not believe but what George Washington, instead of being President when elected, would be a sort of king.

So we wrote it into our Constitution without any debate, without any discussion, and for the specific purpose of protecting the Members of Congress from the Executive.

Chairman GRANIK. Now, Senator Stennis.

Senator STENNIS. Senator HUNT, I agree that that was largely the origin of this rule in the English Parliament, but that was in the infancy of the parliamentary law. The King was overcome soon thereafter, and there flourished the great system of English parliamentary law that has been the fountainspring of our freedom ever since

You speak of this rule as having been casually adopted in America. Why, it was in every colonial law. It is in the constitution of every State. It is written in boldly into the face of our Constitution itself, and it here, as in England, has been the main fountainspring of our parliamentary system's growth and source of our real, true freedom, defended always by the press and by those that have been favored by the people to sit in the constitutional halls.

Chairman GRANIK. What steps would you take to eliminate the abuses, Senator HUNT?

Senator HUNT. Mr. Granik, there are two steps that we may take to remove this abuse. The first would be a resolution providing for a repeal of this particular part of the Constitution, which is in section 6.

Another approach to it would be the introduction of a bill, which I have introduced, providing in part, that for any defamatory statement made on the floor of Congress, the Congressman shall not be held liable, but as a representative of the Government, as an employee, may we say, of the Government, the Government itself is liable for the remarks.

Chairman GRANIK. Under the resolution, is the individual liable, Senator?

Senator HUNT. Under the resolution at the present time, as our Constitution stands today, nobody is liable. We have complete immunity.

Chairman GRANIK. I mean under the resolution you propose?

Senator HUNT. Under the resolution I propose, if it were adopted by three-fourths of all the States of the Union and the Congress, then I, as a Senator, and the judge, as a Senator, the Senator from Mississippi, would have exactly the same privileges as you enjoy today, and no more. And I don't think he should enjoy any more.

Senator STENNIS. Senator HUNT, let us define our terms here just a minute. Let me point out that the common acceptation of this so-called immunity is that it is something in favor of the individual Member of Congress.

Now, here is a case from Massachusetts that has a very pertinent summary, where a judge wrote it up this way:

"These privileges are thus secured, not with the intention of protecting the members against prosecutions for their own benefit, but to support the rights of the people by enabling their representatives to execute the functions of their office without fear of persecutions, prosecutions, civil or criminal."

That is the real purpose. It is not to protect the member as an individual, but it is to protect him in the discharge of his official duty and responsibility as a spokesman for the people. That is fundamental.

You have a law here that has some merits in it, but you propose primarily to repeal this cardinal principle of the Constitution.

That is why I respectfully submit the Doctor is in error.

Senator, I use that term of "Doctor" because you are a doctor, and it is a term of affection with me.

But it rests on a fundamental principle.

Senator HUNT. I do not think that your concept of the use of this privilege at the present time is correct at all. In the United States, Senator, I have this privilege: Of defaming, of smearing, of slandering any citizen of the United States. He is then my victim. He has absolutely no redress. There is no way that he can protect himself. There is no way that I can be punished for saying things on the floor of the United States Senate that I should not say. No civil suit can now be started against me for any action that I may take on the floor of the United States Senate.

I disagree with you that it is being used today for the good of the people as a whole. I say it is being used as a special privilege for a few, very few, irresponsible Members of Congress, who say things in debate and in their remarks and get them printed in the RECORD, things that never should be in there.

Let me say to you, too, Senator, that here is another feature.

Chairman GRANIK. Would you let Senator STENNIS comment on your remarks first, Senator HUNT?

Senator STENNIS. You said that today you have the privilege of slandering someone on the floor of the United States Senate. Let me put it this way: You have the duty of exposing before the American people any person, be he in the Government or out of the Government, in Wyoming or in Mississippi, or in Maine, you have the duty of exposing anything about him that is corrupt, or anything that is injurious to the public welfare.

In so doing, doing it courageously and definitely and positively, you might frequently step over the line—unintentionally, of course—of the very strict rules that we have in law covering slander and libel. A step over the line far enough will sweep away whatever possessions you may have and leave you a pauper unless you have immunity.

So the few that are injured—and you are correct, there are some injured and there are some abuses—are greatly minimized in view of the great blessings and benefits that flow to the people as a whole.

Chairman GRANIK. Would it be possible that this would deter Members of the Congress from making libelous statements on the floor of the Congress?

Senator STENNIS. Do you mean the bill would, or the resolution, or the repeal of this?

Chairman GRANIK. I mean the resolution and the bill.

Senator STENNIS. I think the constitutional provision would deter some of those that are irresponsible. I think it would do some good along that line.

But it is like cutting off a leg because you have a sore toe. That is not an extreme illustration. We have a cardinal, fundamental principle here of our freedom.

Chairman GRANIK. Now, Senator HUNT.

Senator HUNT. Are you contending that, as a United States Senator, you have the right on the floor of the Senate, to call somebody a Communist, not with the true knowledge of facts that he is a Communist?

He may be an enemy of yours, you may have some ulterior motive; so you call this enemy of yours a Communist. What do you do? If he is a businessman, his business is ruined. If he has a position, he probably loses his position. That is because today we have this instrument of television and we have radio, with instant recording all over the United States. That man is smeared then throughout the United States for the rest of his life, and because it is Nation-wide, regardless of where he may go, he cannot lose that stigma.

It follows him every place.

Do you mean to say that there should be no means whereby that man can get redress for the injury that has been done to him?

Chairman GRANIK. Will you answer that, Senator STENNIS?

Senator STENNIS. I will not say that he should not have redress. My point positively is, though, that the remedy is not to repeal this cardinal principle of the Constitution that does give this freedom of speech and gives a man an opportunity to conscientiously carry out his duty.

I think you have part of the remedy in your bill that would give him some redress, but I think your constitutional amendment is erroneous altogether.

Your bill then provides for a remedy in that he could sue the Government and get a monetary return. I do not go with you that far. I think this injured citizen—and there are some—should have a remedy to the courts and a chance to clear his name, and that the Government would have to pay the cost of the court and even attorneys' fees.

But I would not give him a monetary return. I think you have great merit in your bill, but I want to preserve the Constitution without touching this provision of it. I see your point.

Senator HUNT. If he loses his business, if he loses his job and his job opportunities, if he suffers other great monetary losses as a result of this smear, do you contend that it is right or proper?

Senator STENNIS. No.

Senator HUNT. Do you not think, Senator, that our Constitution, in its entirety, was built around the right of our constituents to protection and not to protect us from our constituents?

Senator STENNIS. If he loses his business—and you state that very strongly—if he loses his business, that is one of the rare hazards of being an American citizen. Now, he can go to another country where you do not have freedom of speech on the Senate floor and Congress, and that same man would not have any business, no freedom, nothing to lose. No one else will have any freedom; he would not have any freedom.

Senator HUNT. Senator, you are taking the position that the state is superior to the individual. I say to you that in these United States, our democracy, our American way of life, is built around the proposition of the dignity of the individual over the state. You are placing the state above the individual. We are not living in that kind of a country.

Senator STENNIS. I like your idea there, the way you state it, but we put the individual supreme in every way that we can. But there are some things in which he has to yield to the good and the welfare of the state, and this is the outstanding one thing where the individual has to yield for the good of the whole.

Senator HUNT. Let me tell you another evil that is coming out of this community. The courts are constantly extending this immunity. It extends to you, Senator, at the present time, not just while you are addressing yourself and making remarks on the floor of the Senate, but as you go from your office to the Senate floor, you can make derogatory remarks about any person, and you again are immune from any punishment of any kind.

It is extended to committees; it is extended to subcommittees. It has been extended now to appointee officers, and it has been extended to quasi-judicial units of the Government. It has even been extended in one case to employees of a committee.

Then here is another thing that is very bad about it: If a newspaper, for instance, wants to publish some certain derogatory statement and can get you to make that statement on the floor of the Senate and then have it published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, then that newspaper can take it and scatter it all over the United States. It also can be broadcast Nation-wide over the radio.

Chairman GRANIK. All, right Senator STENNIS.

Senator STENNIS. This privilege is too sacred and too important to be unduly extended, and I do not think it should be, although it has to extend beyond the mere legislative chamber itself. The courts have laid down this test:

Is the member engaged in legislative business at the time he makes the defamatory statement?

In other words, is he on a mission for the people?

If he is, then he has the people's protection. If he is not, he is responsible and should be responsible for what he says.

Now, let me call attention to something else to which it is extended. The privilege extends to grand jurors, too. They bring in a long bill of indictment here and just read the riot act in a man's home town before the public and publish that in the newspapers. They accuse him of every crime under the sun, and the foreman signs it, and the rest of them all vote for it. You never thought of holding them liable for what they say in that indictment, because if they were you could not get a man who could afford to sit on the grand jury.

The judge is immune to it.

Senator HUNT. Let me ask you a question, Senator.

Senator STENNIS. All right.

Senator HUNT. You will agree with me that certain derogatory, certain slanderous, certain libelous, certain smearing statements, are made in the Halls of Congress, will you not?

Senator STENNIS. Unfortunately; yes.

Senator HUNT. They are not made often. The Senator from Mississippi does not need the protection of this immunity; many, many other Members of Congress do not need this immunity or this privilege. You do not need it.

There are a few who do need it, and, to my way of thinking, those few should not have it.

Let me go on and ask you: What is the advantage to a Member of Congress when he uses such tactics, when he takes advantage of this special privilege that we have, which our constituents, the people, do not have?

The moderator here does not enjoy it. What does the Member gain?

First, he gains notoriety. And primarily, that is what he is looking for, publicity.

Secondly, he injures his enemy. That is rather inconsequential.

In the third place, he makes of himself a Congressman to be feared, on which point I am sure you will agree with me.

For those various reasons, together with many others, I cannot see why we continue to use this protection. It never was meant to protect us from the people, but to protect us from the Executive.

Senator STENNIS. History is against you on that. It was not to protect the legislators, but to put them where they can serve the people.

You say that I do not need it and I am flattered by your compliment. I can certainly say, knowing you as I do, that I do not think you will ever need it, as the law is now; but if you repeal that privilege, you will wish you had it. You will find then the reason why it was put in.

Senator HUNT. I hope the time will never come when I need it.

Senator STENNIS. Take that privilege away and you will need it as certainly as night follows day.

Senator HUNT. Let me make one more point. You know, Senator, that it is with great difficulty that we get proper men to head our departments of Government today; I mean in the upper level. Why is that? Is it because of monetary reasons? Because of insufficient salary?

No; that is not the reason. The real reason is because these outstanding men in the country today do not care to come into the Government and subject themselves constantly to these smearing and slanderous remarks.

Senator STENNIS. Senator, you have served the people long and well, and you have been subjected to slander and libel yourself. You have loved your country more, though, than you despised the abuse that you had to take. That is why you are here. The people have more faith in you for it.

Chairman GRANIK. Let me get a question from the floor. Let us hear from one of the constituents. Go ahead.

Mr. WYLER. I am William Wyler and I am a lawyer. I have a question for Senator HUNT.

Do you not think that the adoption of your resolution would mean that the people will be deprived of the voice of their representatives in the Congress by continually having them called away to face damage suits and court action in addition to making them afraid to speak out on many legislative issues?

Senator HUNT. No; not at all, because my bill provides that the suit shall be against the Government, not against the Congressman. It further provides that it is not necessary even for him to appear as a witness.

Further than that, let me answer your question a little indirectly by saying I think it would be a very splendid thing for our constituents to have the right to bring this suit. First, to clear themselves in their own community, be tried by 12 true and good men who would clear them of this smear. And I think, too, then the Members of Congress, who may take advantage of this privilege, would be a little more reluctant, perhaps, and a little more restrained in their statements in the future if any individual they had smeared was cleared by a jury of 12 men.

Senator STENNIS. Senator HUNT, may I say this to be sure that it is understood. You talk about your bill. Your bill is proposed as a remedy during the interim between now and when you get the constitutional repeal, if you do. Once you repeal the Constitution, you will have no bill, then, no remedy, and everyone who is a Member of the legislature will be absolutely subject to these suits and harassment and all the attention that goes with it.

Is that not true?

Senator HUNT. Why shouldn't they be? Why should they say anything and not be held accountable for it by the people?

Senator STENNIS. I want to be sure the issue is understood.

Chairman GRANIK. Another question. Go ahead, sir.

Mr. JAQUET. My name is George Jaquet, and I am a management analyst. Senator STENNIS, I should like to ask a question, please:

In what other way than through Senator HUNT's resolution can we prevent recurrence of gross abuse of the senatorial privilege such as by one Senator in recent months when personal reputations were damaged and our country held up to world ridicule by a reckless disregard for the truth and by often unfounded accusations?

Chairman GRANIK. Senator STENNIS?

Senator STENNIS. I make no reference to anything that has recently happened. I am referring to the history of this matter. For gross abuse of this privilege the people usually take care of those things in the elections. Now, the Senate of the United States could do a great deal within their own rules and within their own power under the Constitution. They have the right to, in effect, punish a Member. They have the power under the Constitution to make their own rules.

And I think that the Senate could improve a great deal on its power of censure.

The people have a power. And I think Senator HUNT has something in his bill providing for a remedy in the courts. But my point is: Do not repeal this constitutional provision, but give the individual Member the responsibility, the responsibility of speaking out and the responsibility of taking a chance.

Chairman GRANIK. What about that congressional improvement, Senator HUNT?

Senator HUNT. We have taken care of ourselves, Mr. Granik. We have taken care of that very nicely by a Senate rule which says that no Senator in debate, shall directly or indirectly, in any form of words, impugn another Senator's actions or conduct or motive as being unworthy and unbecoming a Senator.

So we have our constituents at our mercy. We have taken care of ourselves by the Senate rule. We are immune from whatever any other Senator may say and we have the privilege to go ahead

Senator STENNIS. May I just say a short word?

That rule that Senator HUNT refers to, that is a rule to apply to us when we get mad with each other. Everyone there is not as cool as Senator HUNT and his colleague, JOE O'MAHONEY. We have to have some rule to cool our tempers down. That is not something special for ourselves; that is to make things move along Chairman GRANIK. May I take another question from the lady?

Miss YOUNG. I am Elizabeth Young, employment counselor. My question is addressed to Senator HUNT, and it might have been amended if I had known what you were going to talk about.

It seems to me that the Government office needing the greatest protection against intemperate attacks is the office of the Secretary of State. Do you think of any way, Senator HUNT, that this office might have that protection without abrogating any of our democratic processes, or without relinquishing your own rights to constructive criticism?

Senator HUNT. Yes, there is a way. I have suggested two ways: First, the repeal of this constitutional provision, and second, the bill that we have been discussing. As to your contention that we keep our democratic rights and not lose any of our privileges, I contend that this so-called democratic right that we have is an arbitrary right; it is not a democratic right at all.

It is not in harmony with our American way of life.

Chairman GRANIK. I am sorry, Senator HUNT, it is time for our summaries.

Senator STENNIS, your summary?

Senator STENNIS. I stand firmly and unyieldingly on the proposition that this valuable and necessary rule of immunity from damage suits and criminal prosecution for what they may say in the course of legislative duties was not created nor is it now continued for the benefit of Members of Congress. It was created and continued for the benefit of the people so that they may be better served by their public servants.

It is, in effect, the people saying to the legislators, "You do what you think is your duty. Speak up and speak out, point out the rotten apples in the barrel, be they among the people or in the Government. Say what you think you should say to protect the people and then for our part we will not let the offended person jerk the rug out from under you by hailing you into court and suing you for your last dime, nor prosecuting you criminally for libel."

Now, under this system, England and the United States have built up the greatest system of parliamentary law in the world, and we are today the world's citadel of freedom.

Do you want to knock that out?

Chairman GRANIK. I am sorry, Senator STENNIS.

Senator HUNT, your summary?

Senator HUNT. Indeed I do believe it should be knocked out. I contend this provision was written into our Constitution almost verbatim from the English law It was done so for exactly the same purpose; namely, to protect the members of Parliament from the King, and to protect the Members of our Congress from the Executive.

That is obsolete at this time, and we no longer have need for it; it is just the reverse. The Executive needs some protection from us.

I further contend that as long as we have special privileges the courts may continue to expand their coverage and I know that is going to be bad, and I know you, as a Judge, will agree with me.

I further contend that the spirit of our Constitution and our democratic way of life is that the people should be protected, not the elected officials protected from the people.

And I want to say further that if we had such a provision, it might shorten some of the speeches in the Senate of the United Sttaes, and I think that would be good.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen.

You have been listening to a discussion, "Why Congressional Immunity?" Our speakers have been Senator LESTER C. HUNT, Democrat, of Wyoming, and Senator JOHN C. STENNIS, Democrat, of Mississippi.

Thank you very much, gentlemen.

ANNOUNCER. For reprints of this discussion, send 10 cents to Ransdell, Inc., Printers and Publishers, Washington 18, D. C.

Join us again next week at this same time for a discussion on the vital question, "Our Foreign Policy."

Our speakers will be Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN, Democrat, of Alabama, and Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, Republican, of California.

The American Forum of the Air, founded and moderated by Theodore Granik, has been presented as a public service by the National Broadcasting Company, and has come to you from Washington, D. C.

Draft of World War II Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I received a very clear and highly intelligent letter from one of my constituents, Mrs. Gerald W. Thiel, of Bay City, Mich., whose husband is a World War II veteran. She discusses a problem which is most disturbing not only to the wives of these veterans, but also to the veterans themselves.

I shall not at this time discuss this situation except to say that I am in complete harmony with the views expressed and commend them to the Members of the House and Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein the letter from Mrs. Thiel:

SEPTEMBER 7, 1950.

Representative ROY O. WOODRUFF,
Tenth District, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: First I would like to introduce myself. I am John B. McCullough's granddaughter.

My husband, who is a World War II veteran, has asked me to write you concerning the proposed draft of World War II veterans.

My husband works for Consumers Power, and I am a secretary for the Wallace H. Chanel Insurance Agency. Both of us come in daily contact with veterans, and therefore know how they feel about this proposed draft. They are very bitter about the whole idea. Their opinion adds up to this: "If there is total war, and only then, they would be willing to serve."

They have all recently come back to civilian life, and now Draft Director Lewis B. Hershey is proposing to draft them again. Do you think this is fair?

There are thousands of young men now being deferred who should be drafted. They are laughing and boasting about being deferred and telling the veterans that they will sit home or go to college and let the veterans be drafted.

My husband and I, and the veterans we have talked to, feel that they should not defer these young men to go to college. These young men should go before the Government even considers the drafting of nonveterans with dependents. The excuse right now for this proposed draft is that the single 19-25-age group of young men is not passing the mental and physical qualifications. The veterans definitely feel that these standards should be lowered to the standards of World War II. Their reasoning goes thus: "Veterans of World War II served under the more liberal World War II standards, therefore they believe these young men aren't any better than they were or are, and they should serve under the standards of World War II."

These opinions aren't only our opinions, but those veterans and civilians that my husband and I have talked to.

Another greatly discussed topic is that of UMT. The people would like to know why it hasn't been passed yet? Why not do it now when the need for it may become very great in the future? My husband and other veterans were on their way overseas when they were 17 years old. Are the 17-19-years-olds of today any better than these veterans?

The veterans and people are 100 percent behind UMT. Why put off what you can do now? The Korean war should hasten its passage, not retard it.

If the country wants a large Army, build it of single, young, nonveteran men. They claim that 800,000 young men come of age for the draft every year. There should be quite a few now available providing the Government Armed Forces aren't so choosey.

We will greatly appreciate your cooperation and assistance in the above-mentioned matters. The veterans feel that they have done their part and want a fair deal. We believe that if you, Representative WOODRUFF, and your colleagues know how we feel, you will see that the fair thing is done.

A reply will be appreciated. Thank you.

Sincerely,

Mrs. GERALD W. THIEL,
Bay City, Mich.

Oh, Say Does That Star-Spangled Banner Yet Wave?—Broadcast by Paul Harvey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a broadcast entitled "Oh, Say Does That Star-Spangled Banner Yet Wave?" by Paul Harvey, under date of August 3, 1950.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OH, SAY DOES THAT STAR-SPANGLED BANNER YET WAVE?

This brings us up to date on the day's essential developments. Pending later advice from the fighting fronts, let's just visit for a few minutes.

By now we pretty well understand each other.

So I hope I can say this without being misunderstood.

At any event, I have to say it.

I am aware that in time of crisis we cannot afford the luxury of much individual freedom and you can't fight a war in your backyard without tracking in some dirt.

But this is not directly connected with the Korean War.

It began a long time before.

When Americans * * * who would not under any circumstances walk headlong into disaster began "backing into it" while looking at something entirely different.

In the business of news analysis we usually try and determine where we're going first by taking a good look at how we got where we are.

Our problems are not new ones.

Christ was born in Bethlehem because Joseph was on his way to pay his taxes.

And Christ was born in a manger, because there was a housing shortage when he got there.

You know what fouled up the Roman Empire?

It wasn't all the armies of Hannibal.

It was simply because from about 146 to 49 B. C. internal Roman history was a welter of class wars and conflicts within the republic. Street brawls, corrupt governors, attempts at reform, and the gradual rise of individuals to military power—culminating in Caesar.

Rome's senatorial oligarchy had waged successful wars, but Roman citizens were corrupt. The Roman Government upkeep weighed ever more heavily upon the hard-taxed people. Immorality rose to a crescendo with the crucifixion of Christ. And the Empire, after about 200 years, hit the skids. The great Empire of Rome, with more effective cold-war tactics and better hot-war weapons, fell away * * * because within it had decayed and degenerated morally, socially, and economically to where, like an angry scorpion, it turned on itself and died of its own sting.

The Empire at its height lasted about 200 years. That's just about our time in the new world—and here we go again. What happened to Rome and Spain and Greece and China, decay within, can happen now either to the United States or Russia.

The one which remains strong within will survive. Which will it be?

Let's lay it on the line.

Russia shows no signs of weakness.

Where the United States shakes its guns in the face of the Kremlin yet permits hard-hearted Reds and soft-headed pinks to infiltrate our own Government, our educational institutions, our press and information facilities, and our vast labor unions.

In Korea tonight where the Communists are shooting our boys tying their hands—we shoot back.

Is that what we're waiting for over here?

Don't, because it won't happen that way.

No, Russia is handling the United States no differently from the way she's handled China.

Simply furnishing the United States the weapons—and watching us destroy ourselves.

And they're diabolical weapons.

Explosive lies in harmless appearing pamphlets.

Shrewd lawyers full of legal double-talk aimed at ridiculing our courts.

And treasonous pirates masquerading as a political party.

Uncle Sam's taking a terrific beating. He's lasted this long only because the old boy has a remarkable Constitution.

I mention this because everywhere I hear sufficient concern for what's happening in Korea—yet few appear aware or seem to care that while we're saying no to communism in Korea—we're buying the same soiled product for home consumption under a different label.

Here it's called planned economy.

One hundred and fifty years ago the United States of America was a contemptuously disregarded political experiment on the wrong side of the Atlantic. Today we are the most prosperous Nation on earth. In 150 years. And the economic vehicle we rode to the top was democratic American capitalism. Don't let the word frighten you. "Capitalism." It has been our good servant. Yet some want to trade a good servant for a bad master.

Today we must decide whether the economy which made us great shall be continued or abandoned. Or, and it amounts to the same thing, be modified beyond recognition. The whole world awaits our decision.

Why should we change?

When the car's running, why should we tamper with the carburetor?

Matthew 9: 12: "They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick."

And another undeniable truth that's as old as the gospel of St. Luke 11: 17 reads, "But He, knowing their thoughts, said unto them, every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation."

I didn't mean to preach. I just hate to see Americans emulate the near-sighted dog in Aesop's fable—who dropped the luscious morsel he held in his teeth to snap foolishly at the reflection of the larger morsel he thought he saw in the water.

Oh, it can happen here. For 1,000 years England was impregnable. Napoleon and Hitler couldn't storm across the Channel with all their bombs and guns.

But Karl Marx made it without firing a shot.

I personally, would rather see my Nation die—valiantly and cleanly under the H-bomb—than rot away under any cancerous form of any Godless slave-statism.

But the signs are all about us: Flag poles without flags. Only 51 percent of our eligible voters bothered to vote in the last Presidential election. Only about half.

Where 15 years ago all a vigorous college student asked for himself was opportunity, opportunity, opportunity.

Now he asks instead, security, security, security.

We're not selling free competitive capitalism to our young people simply because a lesser product is better advertised.

And it's the same way with the other certain signs of decay.

We have freedom of religion, but we don't go to church.

So we stand to lose it because we haven't bothered to use it.

Immorality has sunk as low as a television neckline and now a burlesque show is brought right into your child's nursery.

And bigger government and higher taxes have created a vicious cycle which we can prove from countless historical precedents, always ends in economic ruin.

In the United States of America tonight we're plowing under, diluting, and throwing away the very things our men in Korea are buying with their lives.

Perhaps, you say, it has always been, so it will always be.

It is a natural evolution.

That is absurd as it would have been for a physician to give up on appendicitis, when this century was in its teens, because appendicitis then, generally was fatal.

I say let's profit from history. Let's learn how changes happen.

Let's learn what are the likely developments today and tomorrow, and then let's change our course before it is too late.

How stupid can we be; to keep making the same identical mistakes for 2,000 years.

In 1776 the world came to a fork in the road. The world divided. The Old World took the road to the left. The New World took the road to the right. Look what's happened in the few short years since.

We now have to take care of them.

When America's early pioneers first turned their eyes toward the West, they didn't demand that somebody take care of them when they got ill or got old. They didn't demand maximum pay for minimum work, and even pay for no work at all. Come to think of it, they didn't demand much of anything—except freedom.

They looked at those rolling plains stretching away to the tall, green mountains and lifted their eyes to the blue skies and said, "Thank you, God, I can take it from here."

That spirit isn't dead in this country.

It's been ridiculed by the Red medicinemen to where it's gone into hiding. It's been unsold to our children in our schools and to our workers in our factories and our fields, but if there's a spark left, let's breathe new life into it while there is yet time.

So many will not hear nor heed this warning.

The gravy train is running in three sections and factory whistles are making too much noise.

They figure God will save America, without giving Him any reason why He should.

Let's try.

Each in his own way, let's try.

Let's live for the things for which tonight our sons die.

There are green years, new frontiers, for America's new pioneers.

If we can just revive that wonderful land which once was—where any man willing to stay on his toes—could reach for the stars.

Paul Harvey—good night.

Marshall, Johnson, Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of September 14, 1950:

MARSHALL, JOHNSON, TRUMAN

President Truman has abruptly thrown Defense Secretary Johnson out of his Cabinet to save the skin of Secretary Acheson, the arch bungler who brought about the Korean war. To direct the war against the Korean Reds he picks George C. Marshall, who was the principal agent in betraying China to Stalin's agents, and thereby making Korea indefensible.

This futile changing of the guard was accomplished with Mr. Truman's usual maladroitness. As recently as August 3 he asserted that neither Acheson nor Johnson was going to resign "as long as I am President." Just what status that leaves Mr. Truman is uncertain but it is too much to hope that he has at last confessed, even obliquely, his own hopeless inadequacy for his job.

The new appointment has the further peculiarity of being illegal. Mr. Truman will ask Congress to repeal the provision of the Defense Unification Act which bars as Secretary of Defense anyone who has been in military service during the 10 years preceding his appointment.

This was a sound precaution to keep the military under civilian control, and General Marshall offers no special talents to justify waiving it. Before they change any laws, the Members of Congress should start out by asking him where he was on the night of December 6, 1941, when the warning should have been sent to Pearl Harbor, but wasn't, and comb his record from there on.

They will find a good deal that bears on his fitness for the office for which he has been designated. As one of those deeply involved with Roosevelt in the Pearl Harbor conspiracy—he was saved from official censure only by President Truman's repudiation of the Army investigating board's report—General Marshall rode through the war as the military darling of the New Dealers.

As Ambassador to China, General Marshall, on instructions from Mr. Acheson, then Under Secretary of State, exerted every effort to compel Chiang Kai-shek to admit the Communists to his government. Failing in this, Marshall enforced an armistice between the Nationalist and Communist armies by withholding promised American military aid to Chiang. This action gave the Communists time to build up their forces with Russian aid and eventually to conquer China.

As Secretary of State General Marshall was no more successful in guarding American interests than he had been in China. The European aid plan given his name has been labeled a failure by subsequent acts of the Truman administration.

Secretary Marshall was going to stand off the Communists by pouring billions in economic aid into Europe. Now it is alleged that we must give the continent military protection—that the Marshall plan only fattened the western Europeans for Stalin to eat whenever he pleases.

If Congress permits him to take office, General Marshall will find a kindred spirit in Secretary Acheson, the architect of his folly in China. Mr. Truman's impulsive military action in Korea was a complete repudiation of Acheson's policy in Asia.

MOVE WILL SAVE ACHESON

Only last January the Secretary of State announced that we had no interests in Korea or Formosa, a view that was indorsed by President Truman. Marshall, when he was Secretary of State in 1948, told a congressional committee that with Communists in control of Manchuria and North Korea, South Korea was an untenable military position.

When a President disowns a policy, he usually disowns its author with it. The outcry against Secretary Johnson was in large measure a counter-offensive by Acheson's friends designed to save the Secretary of State. Johnson bought his job with campaign contributions and was guilty of some serious mistakes in it, but the greater malefactor is Acheson.

Insofar as any change in policy can be predicted under a President who very obviously doesn't know his own mind from day to day, the substitution of Marshall for Johnson may be a move to rescue Mr. Truman from his unhappy Korean adventure. Are those two old collaborators in appeasement, Acheson and Marshall, prepared to buy Stalin off by the recognition of Red China and the abandonment of Formosa?

Prof. Owen Lattimore would no doubt hail this a triumph of statesmanship.

School of International Studies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, in his column a few days ago, Drew Pearson referred to an announcement which was about to be made by the president of Johns Hopkins University and myself jointly dealing with the taking over by Johns Hopkins of the School of International Studies in Washington as a graduate school of the university. Mr. Pearson interpreted this move as being a big boost for Owen Lattimore, who is connected with the Walter Hines Page School at Johns Hopkins. Mr. Pearson also intimated that, because I was the chairman of the board of trustees of the School of International Studies and a lifelong Republican, this constituted an endorsement by myself as an individual and as a Republican of Mr. Lattimore's views.

This entire article is a complete distortion of the facts. I have never met Mr. Lattimore, and disagree emphatically with his views. In all the negotiations between myself and the distinguished president of Johns Hopkins, Dr. Detlev Bronk, with respect to the merger of the school with the university, it was made absolutely clear that this merger had nothing whatever to do with the Walter Hines Page School.

Drew Pearson was fully aware of the true facts.

In order that the record in this matter may be complete, I am quoting herewith Drew Pearson's statement, made on September 10, which appeared on the same day as did the official release issued by President Bronk and myself dealing with the same matter, a paragraph from which I am also quoting:

WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND—JOHNS HOPKINS PREPARES TO ELEVATE OWEN LATTIMORE

(By Drew Pearson)

WASHINGTON, September 9.—Johns Hopkins University is preparing an announcement that will make GOP Senator JOE MCCARTHY, the State Department's No. 1 detractor, most unhappy.

It may also upset Republican plans to make Owen Lattimore, the former State Department consultant whom MCCARTHY has been denouncing as a Communist "tool," an issue in this year's campaign.

For Johns Hopkins will soon announce that its Walter Hines Page School of International Studies, of which Lattimore is director, will take over a similar institution in Washington—the School for Advanced International Studies.

This will make Owen Lattimore even more important in the educational world. It will also show that Johns Hopkins still thinks Lattimore is a good American.

Also significant is the fact that a high-ranking member of MCCARTHY'S own party, GOP Representative CHRISTIAN HERTER, of Massachusetts, helped arrange the merger—showing that HERTER agrees with John Hopkins. HERTER, a lifelong Republican, is chairman of the Washington school which is to be taken over by Lattimore's institution in Baltimore.

[From the official release issued by Johns Hopkins University, September 10, 1950]

President Bronk pointed out that affiliation of this School of Advanced International Studies with the university does not involve duplication of the work now being carried on in the university's Walter Hines Page School of International Relations. The Page School, Dr. Bronk explained, is primarily a research institute devoted to far eastern affairs, and its personnel consists principally of senior faculty members and students who have already obtained their doctoral degrees. Its major activity at the moment is an exhaustive study of Mongolia—its literature, culture, and place in the international scene—and will not be directly related to the new school.

Soil Preservation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I ask permission to have reprinted an article from the August issue of the Iowa State Watershed Bulletin reporting the recent meeting of the President's Water Resources Policy Committee at Sioux City, Iowa. Especially I want to call attention to the splendid statement made by William Gannon, of Valeria, Iowa who addressed the gathering. Mr. Gannon is an ardent conservationist and an inveterate champion of soil preservation.

TWO PROBLEMS BEFORE US IN HANDLING WATER CONTROL

The President's Water Resources Policy Committee, attempting to devise some consistent national policy governing use of natural resources, heard many divergent views regarding Missouri Basin development.

The Sioux City was the first of eight scheduled throughout the country.

Speakers on flood control, soil conservation, irrigation, navigation, wildlife and recreation appeared before the Commission.

Governor Peterson declared that people of the Missouri Valley are opposed to a valley authority. He said the valley authority may work in Tennessee but it may not work in the Missouri Valley, because this development is 13 times as big.

Skunk River Bill Gannon, of Valeria, Iowa, and vice president of the Iowa State Valley Association and speaking as the representative for the association, said: Mr. Chairman and kids:

Please pardon me for calling you kids. We are all kids here today, because we are here in school. I would like to call it the third or fourth grade at that. I, just a common farmer, have not passed the first grade yet. I have a lot to learn.

Two years ago I was appointed chairman of the Skunk River and tributaries project. That watershed is 200 miles long, 20 to 50 miles wide, about 3,000,000 acres in the watershed, and is part or all of 18 counties. So a lot of boys call me Skunk River Bill.

I also was appointed vice chairman of the State Watersheds Association. That association represents all of the watersheds of Iowa.

Now I would like to try to give just a few answers to a couple of your most important questions you have asked.

HOW CAN EROSION BE REDUCED?

By sound land practices.

Soil conservation.

Crop rotation, keeping the soil more spongelike; put more humus in the soil.

Plow under legumes. Any way every fourth year. (For heaven's sake don't burn your corn stalks.)

More grass farming.

Iowa should be raising three or four times more livestock.

Contouring; strip cropping; terracing.

Gully and water control; dams; hold water back.

Make the water walk off, not run off.

Good wide waterways.

Do the things that are necessary to get that water down into our soil.

Build up our water table that has been getting lower and lower for some time.

Spend more effort on upland water control.

Keep more of the raindrops where they fall.

HOW CAN WE GET CLEANER WATER INTO OUR STREAMS?

One answer is: Stop soil erosion. (Now you cannot stop soil or any other kind of erosion by large dams on the main stream.) It makes no difference if you build a dam that costs $1,000, $1,000,000 or $100,000,000 I claim you should have soil erosion control on the watershed above the dam first.

We should all pray that God will forgive us for wasting his precious top soil like we have been doing in the past. This soil, this farm that we call ours: it is not ours; we are just His stewards. God created this soil here for unborn generations, that they may have a livelihood in the years to come. If we do not do more to save this soil than we have been, God help America.

The farm that I live on in central Iowa is a little over 100 years old. The fifth generation of Gannons are playing on that farm now. What about 100, 300, 500 years from now if some of us do not change our way of land uses. Conservation in Iowa is only 11 years old. We should have had meetings like this 50 or 60 years ago.

More and more farmers are doing a better job every year, but that number should be doubled many times. The absentee land owner, the tenant operator, the farmer who still belongs to the old school: We must do something to get them to do a better job.

Maybe we should have a conservancy law in regard to soil conservation. We are not only losing our soil, we are losing our mineral elements that are necessary for better grains and grasses. How many of us know that in bad erosion years we lose 21 times more food elements out of our soil than one growing crop takes out?

Men, do not get me wrong: I know that some of our dams are necessary, but I also know that some of our interested parties can think only of dams. If a dam is necessary, let us also think of protecting that dam, not let the water basin slowly fill up with silt until a few years from now the water-carrying capacity of that dam site is lost.

By upland control you are not only making this soil of ours more productive, a better place to live, better communities, better living standards, but you are also solving a big percentage of our flood troubles.

By building hundreds of small dams on our upland, for gully and water control, you are solving more than one problem. You, with the help of crop and soil management, are keeping the soil where it belongs. You are keeping the silt out of our main streams. You will have a better place for fish and wildlife. And at the same time, in many, many places, you will solve most of your flood-water trouble. We have five or six small watersheds in Iowa that are doing just that now.

So with hundreds of that kind of upland watershed projects in Iowa and other States, maybe we would not have to build some of the proposed large dams. I claim that if it can be done in small watersheds—now you know it takes many small watersheds to make a large watershed—so it seems but common sense to me that if you have control of your small watersheds, you cannot help but have control of a large percentage of the water in your main streams.

Now, my dear kids, if what I have said doesn't sound reasonable, please keep this one thought in mind anyway:

Put your shoulder to the wheel; help some of us do what should be done to keep this topsoil where it should be and not let it be washed down to silt up our main streams and some of it on down into the Gulf of Mexico. No matter where it stops, it is lost forever.

How many years does it take to build up 1 inch of topsoil?

Medical Monopoly Still Upheld

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 19, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of common knowledge that there is a shortage of doctors and other medical personnel in this country, a shortage already being aggravated by the crucial needs of the Armed Forces in Korea and elsewhere.

All of us remember the shortages of doctors for civilians during World War II. There are many who know of rural areas in this country which have needed more doctors badly ever since, which are again in danger of still more acute shortages.

Yet I have here an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal which tells the story of yet another able and competent physician from abroad who is unable to practice in Wisconsin because of the American Medical Association's monopolistic domination of the medical profession in this country.

Dr. Hania Ris, of Madison, Wis., is licensed to practice in Maryland and New York. Her husband is now on the faculty of the University of Wisconsin so she wishes to practice there. Her competence has been certified by the American Board of Pediatrics. She is a graduate of the University of Zurich.

Yet the Wisconsin State Board of Medical Examiners has refused to grant her a license for more than a year. Why? Because the AMA does not accredit the University of Zurich for a series of indefensible reasons as outlined in the attached editorial.

This is just one more bit of the evidence piling up that the AMA is currently guided by individuals who have no faith in the American system, but would clamp a self-controlled medical monopoly on the people of this country.

It also raises the question of permitting an organization of private citizens to dictate to a governmental body on a matter vital to public health. Neither this action nor the many others like it in which the AMA has been involved should be tolerated.

I attach the editorial from the July 15 issue of the Milwaukee Journal:

MEDICAL MONOPOLY STILL UPHELD

Dr. Hania Ris of Madison has had another go-around with the State board of medical examiners. The situation remains normal. She is no closer than ever to being allowed to practice in this great progressive (?) State.

Here are the dismaying facts, some old, some new. Dr. Ris is licensed to practice in Maryland and New York, but her husband is here, on the University of Wisconsin faculty. The American Board of Pediatrics has certified her special competence. Yet for a whole year now she has sought a Wisconsin license in vain.

Why? Because her medical degree is from the University of Zurich, in Switzerland. The State board arbitrarily bans foreign educated doctors unless their schools have been accredited by the American Medical Association. The AMA has now accredited 38, but hasn't got around to Zurich yet.

Last February, under pressure, the State board agreed to let foreign-educated doctors submit evidence that they were adequately schooled despite lack of accreditation for their schools. This now appears to have been an empty gesture. Dr. Ris has submitted such evidence. The board is still quibbling.

Now the new gimmick. AMA headquarters have said they expect to approve Zurich "within a few months," but only as to graduates who were Swiss citizens and got Federal licenses, or received "certificates of medical study." Mere M. D. degrees from Zurich won't satisfy.

Dr. Ris was a Pole (she is now a naturalized American) and couldn't get a Swiss Federal license. Zurich didn't start giving "certificates of medical study" to its graduates until 3 years after she got her M. D. The medical qualifications for a license or a certificate were the same as for a degree, but Dr. Ris is still caught in the web of technicality. Even accreditation of her school won't set her free.

For all the pious talk by our State medical leaders about protecting us from unskilled practitioners, the Ris case is not easy for plain people to understand.

Why must rules of thumb determine who is a competent doctor and who isn't? Why can't the examiners simply find out for themselves whether Dr. Ris knows her business, and act accordingly?

Or, if they must rely on the AMA, why must it be so ponderous? Zurich is not behind an iron curtain and never was. Switzerland was never subject to either Hitlerism or world wars. Surely it could have been determined within days or weeks—instead of many months—whether or not Zurich had an adequate medical faculty and curriculum in the thirties.

The shortage of doctors in Wisconsin is far from cured, and now the Armed Forces are calling for them again. This will prolong and increase the shortage.

How long do the medical leaders think they can try the patience of Wisconsin with their legalistic mumbo-jumbo in this situation?

Inter-American Response to the Korean Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LANSDALE G. SASSCER
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would like to include the article written by my friend, Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, associate editor of World Affairs. Thanks to his first-hand knowledge of personalities and movements in the other American Republics, Dr. Thorning, a strenuous worker for the good-neighbor policy, is admirably qualified to describe the Latin-American reaction to the conflict in Korea.

LATIN-AMERICAN REACTION TO THE KOREAN SITUATION

(By Joseph F. Thorning)

It would be gratifying to be able to report a tremendous surge of practical support for the United States throughout the American Republics, with respect to the conflict in Korea. Juridically, of course, the Organization of American States has gone on record, denouncing the Soviet-inspired North Korean invasion of South Korea. The American Republics, on paper, accord their cooperation to the United Nations. But, with regard to an effective supply of ground troops sorely needed to restore order through the Korean Peninsula, there have sprung up a number of obstacles that can be removed only by patient diplomacy and more liberal trade practices in North America.

It is interesting to note that the resolution calling upon the Organization of American States to show solidarity with the United States originated with one of the smallest and most democratic nations in the Western Hemisphere: Costa Rica Dr. Otilio Ulate Blanco, President of the Republic, immediately upon the outbreak of hostilities, instructed the Costa Rican Ambassador in Washington, Dr. Mario Echandi Jiménez, to take the initiative; just as Costa Rica had been the first American State to declare war upon Japan when the crime of Pearl Harbor was perpetrated. Thanks to this instant, strong Costa Rican move, the position of Organization of American States was established, with unanimity. Legally, the Americas are united about Korea

What concrete measures have been adopted in order to implement this juridical position? One indication of a desire to help was the offer of the Republic of Bolivia, through Ricardo Martinez Vargas, to dispatch 30 Bolivian Army officers to the fighting front to serve with the United Nations forces there. Without doubt, this must be deemed a gesture of good will. Celebrated for their bravery, the Bolivians would not flinch from the ardors of the Korean campaign. The sad fact remains, of course, that what the United Nations requires in the Far East are foot soldiers. Infantry, "the queen of battles," appears quite as indispensable as at Thermopylae or Waterloo. In order to do the job, officers have to command men. A head without a body is useless. Consequently, the Bolivian proffer, although inspired by high motives, had to be rejected. Incidentally, it may be remarked that, on several occasions within the past 2 years, sizable units of the Bolivian Army have been needed at home in order to put down riots excited by extremists of both the right and the left. The extremists, in turn, have their opportunity in the miserable conditions of work and life that prevail in the tin-mining districts. In other words, defense of human rights abroad calls for a decent standard of living in the Americas.

Another indication of solidarity was given by the Republic of El Salvador. On August 17, Foreign Minister Miguel R. Urquia informed Secretary General Trygve Lie that his country would be glad to facilitate the sending of volunteers to the United States for the necessary training before they were sent to the field of operations. Obviously, in the cast of modest-sized republics, such as El Salvador, Honduras, Panama, and Costa Rica, it would be folly to expect that young men without battle experience be thrown into the ring of fire around Pusan. A minimum of 18 months' indoctrination would be necessary for all volunteers. In the meantime, the tide of battle is bound to fluctuate in Korea. Nevertheless, it may be wise for the United Nations to consider the possibilities of recruiting "token" forces of volunteers from each of the American Republics. This would be a good move in case the Soviet-dominated Chinese attempt further intervention and aggression.

The record shows that the first American Republic to speak of outright "military" cooperation was Colombia. This was the straightforward announcement made, within 48 hours of notice about the Korean invasion, by the Colombian Ambassador, Dr. Eduardo Zuleta-Angel, who, before coming to Washington, had a distinguished career in the Foreign Ministry at Bogotá. Ambassador Zuleta-Angel insisted that it would not be enough to pass legal resolutions, or to furnish tropical commodities for the fighting forces. It was the view of the Colombian statesman that every American be prepared to shed his blood in order to resist slavery and to promote freedom Therefore, Dr. Zuleta-Angel openly proclaimed the duty of the Americas to "organize a number of battalions for service in the Orient." The Colombian leader acknowledged that such military organization would demand considerable liaison work. Among the problems to be solved he enumerated the following: Coordination of caliber of guns and ammunition; uniform methods of training; harmonization of supply systems; and acclimatization of troops accustomed to balmy weather in Central and South America. Unquestionably, the rigor of the Korean winter was much in the forefront of Ambassador Zuleta-Angel's attention. At the same time, this scholar-statesman did a great deal, by reason of his prestige among his colleagues, to crystallize American sentiment with respect to organized military cooperation.

At this point, it is natural to inquire: "What about the United States of Brazil?" The question is relevant, because, in World War II, Brazil was one American Republic that got around to placing its own divisions on the line of fire in Europe. Every American remembers the good will and the good service of the Brazilians in Italy. Moreover, most North Americans have immense respect for Brazil, not only thanks to a long tradition of friendship (the United States of America was the first country to recognize an independent Brazil), but also because this sister republic, both in population and extent of territory, is in a class by itself. Experts on far-flung strategic requirements would add that the famous northeast "hump" of Brazil projecting far into the Atlantic Ocean, served magnificently during World War II as a vital "corridor of victory." Without the technicians, guns, munitions, and supplies funneled through this corridor to French Dakar and North Africa, the fate of Marshal Erwin Rommel and his ravaging tanks might have been somewhat different.

Although this chapter of recent history may be overlooked, or forgotten, in some North American circles, it is a vivid memory throughout the American Republics. Since the Brazilians are, by nature, a loyal and generous people (one has only to read the biography of Joaquim Nabuco by Carolina Nabuco to recognize this truth), they expect the Government and the people of the United States of America not to use the question of coffee prices as a political football.

The present Brazilian Ambassador, Mauricio Nabuco, like his father, Joaquim, is an illustrious American. Eager to maintain the good will of the United States consumers of coffee, Brazil's best customers, Ambassador Nabuco has been distressed by the "slanted" attacks on his country by Senate politicians who, apparently, do not realize the repercussions which their words have among the other Americans. As long as such misrepresentations fill the press, it is likely that the Brazilian Government will be slow in outfitting army divisions to protect Korea. And the example will not pass unnoticed in Latin America.

In this connection, it must be stated that there are 16 coffee-producing nations in this hemisphere, although all 16 are not exporters of coffee. Colombia, a close neighbor of Brazil, is likewise an exporter of high-quality coffee. Intense indignation followed upon the publication of the so-called Gillette report submitted to the United States Senate by the Committee on Agriculture. Neither the Colombians nor the Brazilians look upon themselves or their merchandisers as monopolists or greedy extortioners. They do not believe that their deliberations in the Social and Economic Council of the Organization of American States have to be scrutinized or supervised by a representative of the United States Justice Department, presumably alerted to observe, report, and penalize any violation of the United States antitrust laws. What a curious way, the South Americans opine, to win friends and secure solid support for champions of liberty.

It is important to know that the Honorable Edward G. Miller, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, understands and sympathizes with our good neighbors on the coffee issue. Born in Puerto Rico, reared in Cuba, and educated in the United States, Secretary Miller is that rare combination: a North American who feels, thinks, and acts like a Latin. The fact that the United States official principally charged with the progress of inter-American friendship, agrees wholeheartedly with the Latin American diplomats on the necessity of providing lucrative markets for South American products, including Chilean and Peruvian copper as well as Colombian-Brazilian coffee, should be sufficient motive for the United States Senate and the North American public to stabilize the Latin economy in such ways as would enable the Organization of American States to organize armed strength for the benefit of the United Nations. Trade, friendship, and collective security go hand in hand.

Hon. Carl Vinson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL J. KILDAY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times of Sunday, September 10, 1950, contains an article by William S. White titled "Carl Vinson Has Been Unified, Too."

As a member of the Committee on Armed Services, I fully appreciate the service and ability of our chairman, Hon. CARL VINSON. In these trying times all of the services, the Congress, and the people are fortunate in having Mr. VINSON as chairman of the committee handling legislation affecting the Military Establishment. I include that article as follows:

CARL VINSON HAS BEEN UNIFIED, TOO—ARMY, NAVY, AND AIR FORCE LEARN FROM A SUAVE GEORGIAN WHAT THEY CAN EXPECT

(By William S. White)

(William S. White of the Times Washington Bureau has covered many aspects of congressional action on military affairs.)

WASHINGTON.

So far as Congress sees it, Representative CARL VINSON of the little inland Georgia town of Milledgeville is admiral of the ocean seas, field marshal of the armies and, as to the air, wing commander of everything.

There was a time when he was boss only of the United States Navy—the high patron for 15 years, as iron-handed chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee, of all the blue waters from the Caribbean to the China Sea.

But these were in the old, unreconstructed days before the Armed Forces, and Mr. VINSON, too, were unified and solidified—which meant, for the forces, a unification into rather more establishments than before and, for Mr. VINSON, a solidification into a place of congressional power so high that it might have brought a certain dizziness to a less earthy man.

The Unification Act amalgamated the old rival Committees on Military Affairs and on Naval Affairs into the House Committee on the Armed Services. This, of which Mr. VINSON is the chairman and absolute boss, is a formidable body of 35 men so big that, collectively, it sits upon 3 staggered tiers in its hearing rooms in the old House Office Building, with Representative VINSON front and center rather like an ancient monarch surrounded by ministers whose proximity to the throne depends upon the years that lie upon their heads.

The juniors are thus far away and their voices seem—but only seem—to be heard a little faintly as Mr. VINSON and his bipartisan elder regency with the senior Republicans sitting just to his left and the senior Democrats just to his right, settle the high and low affairs of national defense—Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine, whatever.

It is not that the juniors are ignored, however. The chairman keeps a nice balance between protocol and practicality. While he gives far more outer deference to the graybeards, as congressional custom infallibly demands, he gives far more work to his favorites among the committee youngsters. These, until he has tried them out, he sometimes calls "ensign." When a new man has done a good task, however, Mr. VINSON may suddenly begin to call him "commander." When, one day, he changes this salutation to "captain," the member knows he has arrived.

His old "ensigns," whether still in the House or now promoted to the Senate, are deeply devoted to him, and the long finger of his influence is thus not limited to his own side of the Capitol. One of the former "ensigns," Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON of Texas, who made "captain" before he left the House, still keeps deferentially in touch with his old chairman, and now and then goes over to the House to report in person to Mr. VINSON on matters of mutual interest. Men call on Mr. VINSON; Mr. VINSON does not call on them.

Indeed, the chairman, who used to be called the Admiral but now is more commonly known as the Old Operator, by virtue of the fact that he is no longer limited simply to caring for the Navy, is in a position of a prophet handsomely vindicated in his robust later years. No prophet has more honor in his own country—which in this case is Congress and the Pentagon. For Mr. VINSON—"Cahl" to the other southerners, not one of whom has quite the richness of his own Southern accent—was complaining bitterly as early as 2 years ago of economies in the Military Establishment.

He was in the extraordinary position of a congressional leader who was urging the Pentagon to spend not less but more. Now, his own personal chief of staff, he is at work on an unfolding, and personal, Vinson plan for mobilization—more tanks, more marines, more carriers, more of everything for the cutting edges of the military force. It is often a fact that the administration proposes but VINSON disposes, and the powerful logic, in Congress, of any Vinson plan should never be underrated.

Not to be underestimated, either, is the thing that is the life force of his being, a curious, politically perfect, intermingling of the art of attack and the science of withdrawal and compromise. This has carried Mr. VINSON to his not inconsiderable summit and it has preserved him, personally as a politician who must be elected and professionally as a leader among other politicians, these many years.

Not so long ago no man of influence in Congress was so implacably opposed to unification of the armed services; the proponents, mainly the Air Force men, looked with a great fear upon Mr. VINSON and the administration leaders were in despair. But somehow, with many changes in the original text and with the slow attrition of popular pressure, the VINSON rock was softened and unification became the law. Its most important convert was Mr. VINSON himself.

This, to the Navy was an incredible issue to events, and nothing more sadly incredible in it than to see CARL VINSON accept the principle of a partial merger—VINSON for whom admirals in the past gladly had served as little more than office boys; VINSON, whose burning conviction had made the Navy the unquestioned elite of the Armed Forces, and the proudest pet of an adoring Congress.

The old blue-water men began to shake their heads a bit, while Mr. VINSON himself kept the dignified and forbearing silence of a father who has, for reasons he considers sufficient, temporarily put aside an elder, and really favored, son in behalf of another. But not this, even, was to be the end. Soon, VINSON, of Georgia—the old "Battleship Carl" of another day—began to take a great and direct interest in the Air Force. W. Stuart Symington, then Secretary for Air and now Chairman of the National Security Resources Board, began what was perhaps the most unlikely, difficult, and rewarding bit of personal lobbying in the recent history of Washington. First he got Mr. VINSON into an airplane—the chairman before that had been at home only on anything that sailed. What followed was, to the service people, nothing less than history, poignant or elating, depending on where one stood.

For Representative VINSON "put on the crushed cap," as it was said by the Navy partisans, and went all-out for the Air Force. Over the objections of the President that a defensive imbalance was being created, he joined in 1948, and then led, a rebellion in the House for 70 air groups. He thus unquestionably gave a powerful, if not the decisive, impulse to what he was later to indicate was a questionable high command preoccupation with strategic air power at the Navy's expense.

The Navy people, who before this had been in anxious sorrow at what had happened to Mr. VINSON, were now simply aghast and in despair. For them, the established church had fallen; all, so it seemed to them, was lost. But then it was the same Mr. VINSON who, in due season, gave to them, last year, the first great forum from which to voice their heretofore throttled complaints; it was the Vinson committee that made the investigation of the troubles of unification. And it was Mr. VINSON, too, who began to protest at the Pentagon and elsewhere and to restore some of the Navy's combat strength. When he had insisted on so much more for the Air Force, it was said by his friends, he had never intended that this was to mean much less for the Navy and Army.

In other words, Representative CARL VINSON, of Georgia, as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has pursued at times what has seemed a most unseamanlike course of unexpected zigs and violent zags. His view would be that all these were necessary and that all preparations for any war mean, necessarily, the selection of the least undesirable alternatives. There is never enough money; there is never enough firepower; there is never enough time.

The Vinson philosophy, in everything, is that the best world possible is this present best of possible worlds. By doing things the way he has done them, by zigging and zagging sometimes, he has had a major hand in providing for the defense of the United States so many uncounted billions of dollars that, if stacked against the sun, they would cast so fantastic a glitter as almost to be seen from here to Moscow.

To be a committee chairman in Congress requires, first and foremost, longevity and continuity of service. One cannot, of course, be a statesman here until first, and continuously, he is a successful politician, in Milledgeville or elsewhere. Mr. VINSON is the archetype of the successful politician. His predominantly rural district in Georgia is generously sprinkled about with great Federal installations connected with the armed services which did not reach that distant area by accident or by academic considerations like the annual rainfall and incidence of humidity.

So long has he been entrenched in Congress—36 years, to put a figure upon it—that he has sensible reason to fear for his reelection every 2 years as the years roll by. But he is an immensely practical man and he doesn't like to be annoyed by even possible opposition in the Georgia Democratic primary, which, of course, is all that matters. So, he keeps an ear to the ground, not by running about shaking every hand in his district but by staying in touch with five or six "Vinson men" in each county who pretty much run things and keep him advised, well in season, of any prospective trouble.

In the matter of possible opponents in the primaries, he stands no nonsense. Once he heard that a Mr. Lewis might engage him, for the nomination. Promptly, he telephoned the junior of the Georgia Senators, RICHARD B. RUSSELL, in these words:

"Dick, I do not want you to let that cousin of yours run against me."

Senator RUSSELL protested that to his knowledge he had no cousin with such designs.

"Well," Mr. VINSON complained, "anyhow he married one of your cousins. Get him out of there, Dick." Senator RUSSELL, hurriedly promising to do what he could, made some research and discovered that Mr. Lewis had married a very distant connection of the Russell family—what is sometimes called "a Southern cousin." Anyhow, the crisis for Mr. VINSON was averted; he was unopposed.

"Cahl's" highly developed sense of self-preservation has often, and more subtly, been illustrated. It is said of him that when the time for Congressional redistricting comes around every 10 years he has not once failed to have been on the side of the man who that year was or was going to be Governor of Georgia, and thus in a decisive position as to what Congressional Districts would be reshuffled by the Georgia legislature, and how.

All this would provide, perhaps, some rather interesting speculation about the relative value of absolute consistency in ordinary political affairs as against the value to a nation—and Mr. VINSON's value to this Nation, quite simply, is great—of the man who manages, with a little bending here and there to political necessity, to stay on where he can serve.

His demagogies, if they exist at all, are small; his sins in this direction are of the genial, venial kind. There is, to a reasonably close observer, absolutely no trace of partisan politics or political chiseling in the House Committee on the Armed Services. If CARL VINSON has got a few extra Federal dollars for Georgia, he has earned them and more from the United States of America.

His service on the committee is intense and by the accounts even of his enemies it is brilliantly informed. His work begins at 7:30 in the morning; at 4:45 p. m., nearly every day, he leaves the Capitol to go home to an invalid wife. Not even the Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator MILLARD E TYDINGS of Maryland, is thought to be quite so well up on military subjects, since he has not had Mr. VINSON's tremendous length of service.

These committees lay out the basic military policies. They decide whether there shall be a draft, for example, and how. They give general direction to the highest military authorities, from Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson on down. They authorize the money—the billions upon billions of it—and they they must get the Appropriations Committee and finally Congress itself, to come through.

Over the House committee of 35, Mr. VINSON presides with a sort of seemingly absentminded paternalism that fools nobody. He knows, and intimately, everything that goes on in the big staff organization which a far more executive-minded Republican predecessor as chairman, the late Walter G Andrews of New York, provided in the days of Republican control.

Under Mr. Andrews, the committee organization quit looking much like a congressional group and had the sharp efficiency of a corporation office and much of the snap of a military company. These go on, though much softened at the edges, in the VINSON regime. Mr. VINSON, most of the time, has the outward casualness of any rural southerner on his front porch—though he reserves his tobacco chewing for his actual front porch in Milledgeville—but nothing is allowed really to go slack.

He is so homespun, in a Georgia way, as almost to suggest a case of art improving upon nature, and it is his habit, though he knows the military language down to its last polysyllable, to put things to military witnesses with a challenging air of simplicity. When one speaks, for example, of "logistical problems," Mr. VINSON may say to him earnestly: "You are speaking of how you are going to get those things from here to there?"

For the most part, like many of the oldtimers, he rarely bothers the House with his rhetoric, but when a crisis is up for one of his bills he moves about the lobbies without an obvious care in the world, buttonholing the Members with a kind of happy friendliness and, in effect, signing them on the dotted line. He keeps a great voting power, in his committee and in the House, by not overexercising his position as one of the House leaders—by not intruding, for example, on issues that don't mean much to him anyhow.

The members of all House committees are designated by the parent of them all in this regard, the Committee on Ways and Means. But Ways and Means, by one of those unspoken understandings that are a part of congressional life, does not offer to Mr. VINSON for Armed Services anybody whom Mr. VINSON, privately, has not already nominated. Thus, to a very considerable extent, he controls the selection of his associates and though he certainly would never make a point of it, the point nevertheless is not lost on them.

Then, he has another technique that has always stood him well when voting is close on something for which he is responsible. When a Member wants anything legitimate from the Military Establishment he gets it, and quickly, by applying to CARL VINSON. A Vinson request "downtown" does not mean tomorrow; it does not mean this afternoon. It means this morning, now. The Old Operator through the years has unforgettably impressed this fact upon all concerned.

The soft manner, in this and in everything else, imperfectly conceals a profoundly determined personality, which is shown in the conferences between deputations from the Senate and House that become necessary when the two bodies have passed differing versions of the same bill. Each delegation goes forth charged by its House to yield not to the other. The resulting process is a kind of collective bargaining.

Recently, on a military bill, Mr. VINSON liked certain provisions in the Senate text better than those he had been able to obtain from his own House. In the conference, Senator TYDINGS, for the Senate, was pressing for those provisions. Representative VINSON plainly was going to give in, after offering what might be called a token resistance. The senior Republican conferee present from the House, Representative DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri, began in vehement pain to shout his protests to Mr. VINSON: "Mr. Chairman, you are going against your own House."

"Now, Mr. SHAWT, Mr. SHAWT," Mr. VINSON said softly, waving his hands in vague deprecation. "Just wait a minute—just wait a minute." Mr. SHORT waited. Mr. VINSON prevailed, and got his Senate provisions.

Thus, the small legends gather about the former "admiral." The one of which his colleagues are most fond is that which deals with what Mr. VINSON calls his "ice cream pants." These, the sort of striped flannels that in his youth used to go with a blazer, the chairman wears, so the superstition runs, only on days when things are going well. What these "things" are is never clear—whether an improvement in the Military Establishment, a looking-up in the prospects for a Vinson bill, or, conceivably, the successful frightening-off of one more prospective opponent down in Georgia.

The wearer of the ice-cream pants is enigmatic at times; an elderly man, 67, with vanishing hair and a bulge at the middle. But there is a bright, smiling, knowing eye, with a touch of cynicism in it and shining out beyond that a deep, long-proved devotion to the military safety of the United States.

Louis A. Johnson—Editorial From the Fairmont (W. Va.) Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial that appeared in the Wednesday, September 13, 1950, issue of the Fairmont Times.

This editorial is about Col. Louis A. Johnson, an esteemed resident of my State.

Colonel Johnson has served his Nation faithfully and honorably in many high positions. He has traveled the ofttimes tortuous path of public life with a firm determination of duty and devotion to his Nation.

I commend the Fairmont Times for its excellent editorial, and urge every Member of the Senate to read it.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUIS JOHNSON

News of the resignation of Louis Johnson as Secretary of Defense will sadden the hearts of thousands of West Virginians. Mr. Johnson seemed to personify, more than any other West Virginian in the public service, the intense interest of our people in the momentous events which "follow fast and follow faster" throughout the world today. In all levels of our society there has been a feeling that so long as Mr. Johnson was at the helm, everything would work out as it should and the country would be secure from all enemies either foreign or domestic. This may have been naive thinking, but such is the pride of our people that we have minimized the storm of criticism that has whirled about the head of our Clarksburg neighbor since shortly after he assumed office in April 1949

Those of us who know Mr. Johnson and admire his great ability feel certain that those events which spawned the criticism and forced him to resign his office, will all be justified by history We believe the future will tell us that we were not unprepared for the war in Korea Without posing as a military historian we would say that never before in the history of our country were we ever so well prepared to meet that challenge as when the Korean Reds surged over the border.

Many of Mr. Johnson's political enemies were made when heeding the almost universal demand for economy in the war budget, he cut deep to pare down the fighting forces to eliminate the fat and the inefficient. The result has been that not since Gen. Robert E. Lee's brigade of "Texicans," who were his shock troops, has this country seen fighting soldiers such as we have in Korea today.

In public life no man can protect himself from the political wolves when they begin to howl. One example might be cited of a pair of writers who demanded that Mr. Johnson give them a national scoop, and when he refused, hounded him to the limits of unfair criticism and vituperation.

Looking back over the years every man who held such a position in time of war suffered the slings and arrows of unfair criticism and abuse. Newton Baker, Secretary of War, and Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, in the first World War, went through the same thing but did not resign Secretary of War Alger in the Spanish-American affair of '98 was almost hounded to his grave by charges that he fed his soldiers tainted food. And so it has been with them all in greater or lesser degree. All perhaps, except Secretary Stanton in the Civil War. He disposed of his political enemies by the simple expedient of having the writ of habeas corpus suspended and locking them up in military prisons.

Louis Johnson, a victim of his critics, was courageous enough to step down, but in this hour of his political defeat he is still close to the hearts of the people of West Virginia.

Rail Tragedy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article which appeared in the Coshocton Tribune, dated September 12, including a statement issued by Lt. Col. Frank Towenend, commanding officer of the One Hundred and Ninth Field Artillery Battalion, from Pennsylvania, relative to the activities of the citizens of the community of Coshocton and West Lafayette at the time of the recent rail tragedy.

As the Congressman from that district and a citizen of that community, I can express to Colonel Towenend our sincere sympathy for the families and friends of the men under his command who lost their lives. The actions of the residents of this community in offering assistance was typical of the willingness of our people to be of every possible service to those in need.

THANKS EXPRESSED BY ARMY OFFICER FOR PUBLIC'S HELP

A statement of sincere gratitude to Coshocton, West Lafayette, and other communities giving assistance in yesterday's troop-train tragedy was issued today by Lt. Col. Frank Towenend, commanding officer of the One Hundred and Ninth Field Artillery Battalion, from Pennsylvania, which was riding aboard the ill-fated train.

His statement follows:

"On behalf of officers and men of the One Hundred and Ninth Field Artillery Battalion, I would like to publicly express sincere gratitude and thanks for the magnificent response of citizens of Coshocton and surrounding communities for the care and treatment of men involved in the rail disaster.

"Fortunately when the wreck occurred we were close to a city so well prepared to meet emergencies that within what seemed to be a matter of minutes a well-coordinated emergency plan was in effect and efficiently being operated.

"We were all amazed at the tremendous amount of assistance which seemed to appear at the scene without any call whatsoever coming from us.

"To single out any one service would probably be unfair. But we would like to mention the farm women of the neighborhood who first reported the accident and then appeared before daylight with containers of hot coffee.

"This battalion will always be grateful for your prompt and willing assistance." (Signed) Lt. Col. Frank Towenend, commanding officer, One Hundred and Ninth Field Artillery Battalion.

BODIES OF 33 SOLDIERS PREPARED FOR BURIAL IN IMPROVISED MORGUE

The bodies of 33 victims on the troop train from Pennsylvania, plowed into early Monday morning by the Spirit of St. Louis, were prepared for burial Monday night in the building occupied by the West Lafayette Transfer, Railroad Street, West Lafayette, owned by Commander John E. Phillips, Jr., of Post 46, American Legion.

Funeral directors and their assistants from West Lafayette, Coshocton, and Tuscarawas County worked all night.

At intervals they took time out for coffee and lunch at the American Legion home, where members of West Lafayette Unit 466 and Coshocton Unit 65 worked in shifts during the night.

You had only to let any resident of West Lafayette know what was needed Monday and they were off to get it.

Soon after the accident West Lafayette Unit 46 was ready with sandwiches and coffee. Within a short time Boy Scouts and other volunteer workers joined their efforts to speed up the service. Individuals came from everywhere with large kettles of coffee ready to go. Others made sandwiches. Some went to the scene of action and took cards for the boys to write messages home and then brought them back for mailing. Others took magazines, aspirin, and cigarettes.

Then the train workers had to be fed. That emergency was met too. High school students and business people went in, rolled up their sleeves and assisted at Dickerson's restaurant, serving about 300 people in addition to their regular trade. Many were fed at Thompson's restaurant. Some did their bit by washing dishes.

The worst tragedy in the history of the community brought hundreds of curious to town. There were two steady streams of traffic from early morning until 10 o'clock in the evening. East of town cars were parked along the highway and in the fields for a distance of almost 3 miles.

American Legion members and auxiliary patrolmen from Coshocton, West Lafayette, Newcomerstown, and many other neighboring posts assisted the State highway patrol and Army officers in directing the heavy stream of traffic.

Red Cross, Salvation Army, and others provided their usual fine emergency service.

Tracks for the first train to pass through were cleared about 7:30 Monday night.

Interim Report of the Watchdog Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the country applauded when the Senate Armed Services Committee appointed within its membership an emergency "watchdog committee" to keep close watch on our defense preparations and operations. Recently this "watchdog committee" filed an interim report showing that it was doing the job. The Washington Evening Star, a few days ago, had a very good editorial discussing this interim report and the work of this committee. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO TIME FOR A SIESTA

Although in existence only since the Korean outbreak, the Senate's emergency "watchdog committee" has found enough weak spots in the Government's defense program to justify a lot of additional exploration. The first interim report of Senator LYNDON JOHNSON's bipartisan group contains ample evidence of the need for awakening some agencies and officials from what Mr. JOHNSON calls "a siesta psychology." The committee has done a public service in prodding victims of such psychology from their reveries.

As a result of its prodding, sale of a synthetic rubber plant as surplus in the face of a threatened rubber shortage has been halted, the production of synthetic rubber has been materially stepped up, and a review of the whole surplus property disposal program in the light of Korean developments has been instituted. And the committee has only begun its checking-up operations.

The committee was created at a propitious time. The Red invasion of southern Korea came before the surplus disposal program of World War II had been completed. Thus, as the committee points out in its report, a new mobilization effort suddenly was begun in direct conflict with the tail end of the demobilization program of the postwar period. It was inevitable that indecision and confusion would result in governmental circles during the early days of the crisis. It is disturbing, however, to learn from the committee's report that the clash of programs and policies in some important areas continued until committee investigators stepped into the picture. It is apparent from the letters which the committee exchanged with some officials that the synthetic rubber program had not been geared to the realities of the new emergency until the committee demanded action. Only then were plans canceled for sale of a vital synthetic rubber plant at Akron, Ohio, that had, before the Korean war, been declared surplus, and only then was a "freeze" put on all further sales of war-surplus properties, pending reconsideration of their potential defense value.

Particularly disturbing is the committee's disclosure of a noncooperative attitude on the part of a few officials. Chairman JOHNSON mentioned the "polite brush-off" which the committee received from the Air Force when inquiries were made regarding the advertised sale of airplane motors and parts at an Air Force base. The committee is warranted in deciding to make a further investigation of these sales. Generally, however, the committee found high administration officials willing to assist in probing for defects in policies and procedures and in acting to correct them. Continued scrutiny of the war effort by the committee and continued cooperation by the executive branch in eliminating complacency or confusion wherever it may exist is bound to improve the whole defense undertaking.

Problems of Small Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF SENATOR WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, during the war years I served on the small business committee of the Committee for Economic Development with Mr. S. Abbot Smith, with whom I now serve as a fellow trustee of CED. He has been an outstanding student of the special problems of small business for many years. He has served as president of the Smaller Business Association of New England, is still a director, and, I believe, treasurer. I think Congress will be interested in his views on some problems faced by small business as we move into a Korean war economy. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting letter from Mr. Smith.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SMALLER BUSINESS ASSOCIATION OF NEW ENGLAND, INC.,
Boston, Mass., August 8, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM BENTON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR BILL: I am sorry it will not be possible for me to attend either of the clinics you are holding in Connecticut. There is no question but what they will prove valuable both to those who attend for the information they gain and also for you because of the insight they will give you into the troubles of small business in these critical times.

In addition to the normal difficulties experienced by small business with regard to general management problems, financing, production, merchandising, etc., there are others, perhaps even more acute, which arise because of the war conditions and controls under which business will soon be operating. Judging from our experience during the last war, it seems to me there are certain key problems which must be kept in mind and alleviated to whatever extent is possible although we all recognize clearly the fact that in wartime all businesses suffer and all must make sacrifices. If necessary, the nonessentials may have to go out of business entirely. However, to keep our economy healthy and sound, in order to obtain the greatest possible production of war and essential civilian items, it is also necessary to utilize the services and facilities of the small plants to the greatest extent possible. This saves moving manpower and relieves pressure to some extent on housing, public utilities, etc.

The No. 1 problem, it seems to me, is the deferment of key personnel in small businesses so long as possible. The taking of a key man may wreck an entire business and should not be done until absolutely necessary even though the business in question may not be one on the essential list.

As much assistance as possible must be given to small businesses in the obtaining of prime and subcontracts, the furnishing of technical assistance in the performance of those contracts, and financial assistance to carry them out. Priorities for scarce materials and equipment should not be given large companies until they prove the work in question cannot be done in already existing facilities.

It seems to me it would be advisable to have special officers in each agency assigned to advising small businesses in their contacts with the price-adjustment boards, renegotiation, controls of all kinds, etc. Speaking of renegotiation, any contract on which there were three or more bona fide bidders should be exempt from renegotiation.

In their dealings with the War Labor Board also, small business needs special advice.

In fact, it seems to me that all the various Government boards and agencies should have special men assigned to deal with and help small businesses in their dealings with these boards and agencies to explain the regulations and help them in their administration. Furthermore, one of the duties of the man in charge of the small-business division in each agency should be to act as an appeal board to whom any small-business man could go if he felt he were not being treated fairly. If the appeal board thought the complaint had merit it would be his job to take it up with the head of the agency to see that justice was done.

An excess-profits tax encourages waste and extravagance just when economy, efficiency, and maximum production are most needed. If, however, it is felt that an excess-profits tax must be passed, a substantial, specific exemption from the tax would be of great value to small businesses in helping pay for their conversion to war work and also providing reserves for reconversion to peacetime operations when that time comes. Also, as you know, a heavy excess-profits tax kills the incentive to produce after that point is reached. Most small businesses do not have the base of either invested capital or income over past years which most larger businesses have and, consequently, they are hit especially hard by such excess-profits taxes. This is particularly true of new businesses such as those started by GI's since 1945.

We all recognize that heavy taxation is essential both to raise money to conduct the war and also to siphon off purchasing power. At the same time, however, those taxes must be so levied that they do not kill or maim the businesses which pay them. Small business must be recognized and preserved so far as that is possible and compatible with national necessity or we may very well lose the very things for which we are fighting.

Sincerely yours,

SMALLER BUSINESS ASSOCIATION OF NEW ENGLAND, INC.,
S. ABBOT SMITH,
Director and Past President.

Morale and Citizenship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am including under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, a notable contribution to public thinking by a group associated with the Connecticut State Department of Education.

This letter, expressing the views of this group, supports strongly my contention that our citizens are perhaps more cognizant of our Nation's needs than its lawmakers and administration.

STATE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION,
Hartford, Conn., September 6, 1950.

Representative JAMES T. PATTERSON,
House of Representatives Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PATTERSON: The people whose names are attached to this letter were named by Commissioner of Education Finis E. Engleman as a committee on morale and citizenship to "identify problems of the present crisis in terms of morale and to proceed as expeditiously as possible to prepare materials and suggestions for action."

The committee felt that some of the problems discussed could best be attacked by you and your colleagues in the Federal Government, both in Congress and in the executive branch. We were pleased by the "fireside chat" of President Truman on September 1, but feel that much more needs to be done. We recommend:

1. That even greater publicity be given as to why we are in Korea, perhaps through a greater circulation of the white paper on Korea, perhaps through additional fireside chats by the President or others in authority, and perhaps through well documented statements from sources in authority. Perhaps Mr. Austin, as a United Nation's delegate should be encouraged to make a radio address. Our people need to know that our troops are in Korea in support of the United Nations, which is an agency that prizes democratic procedures and international law as methods of settling international differences. Our people need to know that this is not an imperialistic adventure. They and the world need to know that we are among the few nations of the world that has given freedom to its possessions.

2. That consideration be given to a policy of interpreting the peoples and cultures of Asia to the people of the United States. We sense that there is a real tendency on the part of people in our Armed Forces to look down upon the cultural life of the Chinese, Koreans, Japanese, Indians, and other oriental cultures. We suggest that constructive steps be taken by the Armed Forces to reorient these concepts in their services. We are making a recommendation along this line to our public schools and various State organizations.

3. That legislation be expedited for dealing with rising prices, black markets, and other shortages.

Thank you for whatever help you may be able to give in this matter. This letter has been approved by the committee as a whole, but is sent to you under the signature of the chairman.

Sincerely yours,

VICTOR E. PITKIN, Chairman.
ELEANOR LITTLE.
GEORGE R. CHAMPLIN.
HENRY LITTLEFIELD.
LEO M. MCCRANN.
CHARLES PERRY.
MRS. HENRY GODFREY.
MRS. HELEN MACFARLAND.

We Who Are About To Die

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the American people are confused and bewildered by the muddled foreign policy of the administration. Our State Department supported in every move by the President has consistently blundered in every major decision since the end of World War II.

At the initial meetings creating the United Nations, our representative in the person of Secretary of State Stettinius failed to recognized the threat of Soviet communism and agreed to the veto-power proposal. With the granting of this power to the Soviet representative, the United Nations lost all opportunity to become a strong league of nations which could halt Communist aggression by combined action whenever any nation became a threat to world peace and security.

The United Nations action in Korea was only possible because at the time it was proposed, Russia had no representative present in the Security Council to block it with the veto. With the return of Russia to the UN, further attempts to strengthen the position of the UN in its fight against aggression have been effectively stopped by the Soviet Union.

Outside of the United Nations, the State Department has continually followed a program of appeasement in Asia prior to its Korean turnabout. China was deserted to the Communists. No positive stand was taken by the United States to establish our position in the Far East. No effort was made to assure the Communists in China and in North Korea that we would meet any attempt at Communist expansion with force.

And today there is strong suspicion in the minds of the American people that even while American boys are dying in Korea, our State Department with the full approval of President Truman is at least considering if not already committed to the seating of Communist China in the United Nations.

Where is this nightmare foreign policy going to end? We fully realize the grave danger to our freedom and security from Communist aggression. We are willing to sacrifice to build military strength to whatever extent may be necessary to halt Soviet aggression or to meet it if the rulers in the Kremlin are determined to bring about the third world war.

But to what avail are our efforts if they are sabotaged through the blundering of the State Department and its continued policy of appeasement?

The following article in the form of a letter to the President clearly States the doubts and questions that are in the minds of many of our young men today as they enter the armed services. They are entitled to an answer for their lives are at stake. They have a right to know if their sacrifice will again be in vain.

WE WHO ARE ABOUT TO DIE

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Early Christians lined up in the Roman Colosseum, waiting for death through a thousand tortures, faced their pagan emperor and hailed him thus: "We who are about to die salute you." In the year 1950 we young men poised on American shores, and ready to leave and possibly give our lives to preserve our ideals and our way of life salute you, our duly elected President. You are our Commander in Chief and, as such, we owe you full-fledged allegiance. We are not slaves but free men fighting for the rights of free men. We who are about to die would like to ask a few questions. We have always been brave men, meeting and defeating the enemy in every war. In past wars the home front has always given us a hundred percent backing. In this Korea fracas we are not so sure. The same men, who deliberately helped our enemies gain control of China, followed the advice of Lattimore who on July 17, 1949, said "The thing to do is let Korea fall but not let it look as though we pushed it," are still in power. If, in the past, they played into the hands of Stalin, gave in to his every demand and ruined our chances for world peace after World War II, how can we trust them now when our lives are at stake?

The record shows the homeland is infested with Reds and pinks, ready to sabotage every effort we might make at the cost of blood and life. We want to fight with our faces toward the enemy, not wondering what the State Department may be figuring out to bump us off in the rear. It is a hard accusation, but repeated actions prove these home-grown enemies either enjoy the intoxication of lunacy or are clever tools, placed in a strategic position to further the work of the Red menace they profess to abhor. Mr. President, you may think it a virtue to condone and defend your political appointees. When the safety of country and the world are at stake, forget back-slapping and politics and remember perhaps thousands and millions of lives are in the balance. Get rid of these soft-headed betrayers, and when we grab a little roadside sleep in the mud of a strange and hostile country, we will breathe a little easier. When a comrade clutches his stomach and keels forward, his face writhing pain, we will know he will not have died in vain. We are willing to forget the past; we trust you will recognize it for what it is worth and assure us success in future effort. The fight against communism will not end in a victory in one land or a series of victories in any one continent. It will be long and drawn out, testing American metal to the utmost. We know the evil in communism and how it threatens our very existence. We are willing to sacrifice all, but in the struggle, we don't think we should be asked to line up with doubtful characters we have reason to suspect.

Mr. President, we may be young and foolhardy, but we still can read the records and know the score! If we are to die for our country, we want a clean-up in the State Department before we give to the fullest. As far back as 1945, when Acheson was Under Secretary of State, we remember Gen. Patrick Hurley's explosive resignation as Ambassador to China. His accusation—Acheson and his clique were dealing behind his back with the Chinese Communists. We remember June 19, 1946, when Acheson and Patterson (the Secretary of War) appeared before the House Foreign Affairs Committee and gave their blessing to Marshall's proposal, that the United States should actually train and arm Communist fighters in China. In the meanwhile, as expected, Stalin takes over, leaving only the southern portion of Korea (a narrow dagger pointing into the heart of Japan) that is not Communist dominated. With Stalin, it is all or nothing. In spite of repeated warnings from men like MacArthur, the State Department does nothing to protect our last hold on the mainland. Congress appropriates $10,000,000 to supply the Koreans with guns and ammunition. Actually they got only $200 of this and that for telephone wire, not enough to pay for a good TV set in an average American home. When war comes our boys are outnumbered 20 to 1 and and take a terrific beating. They are left without sufficient tanks, guns, and ammunition and forced to retreat, with only a promise of help to come. As we write (July 18) things look pretty bad for the United States and if the Communists rejoice in our reverses, they can be grateful to our muddle-headed geniuses in the State and Defense Departments, responsible for our present plight!

The State Department forms our foreign policy. True to Communist tactics to confuse issues in foreign lands, the State Department up to recent days, seems to play the partyline and has been the essence of confusion and uncertainty. It helps China, it drops China. It abandons Formosa; it protects Formosa. It dismantles German industries; it furnishes money to rebuild them. It denounces Tito as the murderer of American airmen; it gives him money to build a steel mill. Supposedly, it denounces communism all over the world; it refuses to take Spain, a bulwark of strength against communism (the only country to defeat Stalin) into the western European military alliance. Mr. President, "We who are about to die" may be just kids; if we are to do the dirty work, on the fighting front, we have a right to know what is going on in the home front. If in so-called peace, the motive question hangs on the State Department, we want to make sure free Americans and not enemy pinks and Reds or Communist sympathizers control the land for which we are willing to give our lives.

The Clinton Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY O. TALLE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, millions of Americans reared in the traditions of fair play, integrity, and common decency have been outraged in recent weeks by the despicable and infamous mouthings of the Russian delegate to the United Nations.

But it remained for the Clinton Herald, an outstanding newspaper published at Clinton, Iowa, in my district, to suggest practical means by which these loyal citizens can register their protests officially, namely, by communicating directly with our able delegate to the United Nations, the Honorable Warren Austin, who formerly served in the Congress with great distinction.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it would have a most salutary effect upon the deliberations of the United Nations if the post office at Lake Success were to be deluged with basket upon basket of mail from every corner of the land commending Delegate Austin for his fearless opposition to the aggressor-tyrants.

Mr. Speaker, I heartily endorse the Clinton plan, which I include herewith under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

[From the Clinton Herald, Clinton, Iowa, September 9, 1950]

IF YOU THINK WE SHOULD CONTINUE TO DROP BOMBS—NOT POWDER PUFFS—ON NORTH KOREA, THEN READ THIS

Attention Herald readers:

Jacob Malik, Russian delegate to the United Nations, says he is unhappy about the dropping of bombs on North Koreans.

What's more, he also whines that he has in his possession over 20,000 letters from people who agree with his attitude.

There must be millions of Americans who feel that if Red aggression is to be stopped, it must be done the hard way—with steel and blood. They don't agree with Jake that we should be dropping powder puffs instead of bombs on North Koreans (those quaint folk who now are so busy trying to slaughter Americans).

Don't you think it would be sensible to let Warren Austin, United States delegate to the United Nations, know that we are convinced that the spread of the Red cancer must be stopped now; and that his actions in the UN have our wholehearted support?

The Herald thinks so. We believe it is our duty to furnish him with ammunition to fire back at the Reds when they start bleating.

So today, in two columns below, this newspaper is publishing a form letter which it is suggested you clip, sign, and mail without delay to: Hon. Warren Austin, United States delegate to the United Nations, Lake Success, N. Y.

It would be even better, of course, if those interested in supporting Austin would send him personal letters. The phrasing need not be fancy. Just speak out. Any type of communication will be helpful; the form letter makes it easy for everyone to help.

Our delegate is entitled to assurance that Americans across the land are standing shoulder to shoulder in his viewpoints.

We hope that this letter-writing movement will spread throughout the United States. Clinton folk can help get the ball rolling by calling it to the attention of friends in other cities.

Imagine the effect Austin could create by dumping a few million letters in a pile on the floor of the UN conference room and then inviting Malik to put his (alleged) 20,000 alongside them.

Austin could take pride in pointing out that the letters he received were written voluntarily, and not by individuals who had machine guns trained on them.

Could Malik do likewise without blushing? We doubt it.

Every American has a stake in the United Nations. Our future will be molded by the success or failure of its deliberations.

Are you willing to invest a 3-cent stamp in this future?

If so, then sign this letter, clip it, and mail it without delay.

(Extra copies of the letter can be obtained at the Clinton and DeWitt offices of the Herald. It is suggested that all adult members of families sign and mail them.)

A FREE AMERICAN SPEAKS

CLINTON, IOWA.

HON. WARREN AUSTIN,
United States of America Delegate,
United Nations, Lake Success, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Americans abhor war and all the suffering which accompanies it. No nation in the world has a deeper hunger for world peace than do we.

But there can be no peace as long as some nations seek to force freedom-loving people into slavery; to deny them the right to live a clean and decent life, paying respect to God, in their own fashion.

Russia is intent on bringing the world under the yoke of communism. This cancerous growth is spreading and even now we are attempting to burn it out of Korea by the force of arms.

We have no choice but to fight. When Russia protests against bombings in North Korea she is closing her eyes to the millions of lives snuffed out by her inhumanity, torture, and treachery.

You, our delegate to the United Nations, have my support in your present course of action.

I read recently in the Clinton (Iowa) Herald that Jacob Malik, Russian delegate, says he has 20,000 letters protesting our bombing attacks. I think you should have some letters of rebuttal and hence this communication.

I sign this communication voluntarily. No one is threatening me with prison or death if I don't. This is America; not Russia.

God bless you and your efforts on behalf of world peace.

Signed:

Expanded Social Security—Is It Socialism, Welfare Statism, or Is It Good Government?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

SOCIAL SECURITY IS DEMOCRATIC

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, it is unbelievable that we still hear charges that the social security system is socialistic and is leading toward a welfare state. However, when we look at the source of these charges, we can readily see that they are coming from the same persons who are and have been against any legislation which raises the living standards and improves the welfare of individuals. These same charges were made by these same people when the original social security legislation was under consideration and during consideration of the slum clearance act, workmen's compensation and employer liability legislation, minimum wage legislation, child labor laws, the Fair Labor Standards Act, and all similar legislation. It only takes a moment's thought to see how unfounded these charges really are. Far from being a paternalistic hand-out, the social security insurance system is a self-supporting, contributory system in which the worker shares directly in meeting the cost of protection afforded him in his old age or his survivors in the event of his death. The contributions and benefits are directly related to his own productive efforts, thus preserving self reliance, initiative, ambition, and rewarding effort. Benefits under this system are not a charity dole but are paid as a matter of right and preserve the worker's dignity and independence. Since the system provides only a basic protection it encourages workers to accumulate savings to supplement the benefits. No flat benefits are provided. There are no Government contributions and benefits are payable only to the covered members of the labor force or their survivors. Far from being socialistic, this system is one of the most democratic and humane systems ever established by our Government.

INCREASED COVERAGE AND BENEFITS

The revision in the social-security laws, which was signed by the President on August 28, 1950, is second only to the original Social Security Act and is one of the most important pieces of legislation within the past decade. Coverage was extended to around 10,000,000 additional people, bringing the total now covered under the social-security insurance system to 45,000,000. These approximately 10,000,000 additional people consist of 4,700,000 nonfarm self-employed persons; 1,500,000 State and local employees; 1,000,000 domestic workers; 850,000 agricultural laborers; 600,000 nonprofit employees; 400,000 life-insurance and traveling salesmen, agent and commission drivers, and industrial workers; 200,000 Federal employees; and 550,000 employees outside the United States and in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. The new social-security law protects 3 out of 4 of the Nation's paid workers and covers 9 out of 10 full-time self-employed persons.

Benefits for those now on the social-security insurance rolls will be raised from $62,000,000 in August to $112,000,000 in September. Benefits for those retiring after mid-1952 will be doubled. Average payments for a retired worker and his wife were raised from $41 a month to $75 and after a few years' work under the new law, this average will be $95.

BENEFITS AND COVERAGE IN THE STATE OF MICHIGAN

On August 31, 1950, 131,321 persons were receiving insurance benefits in Michigan, amounting to $2,855,039 per month. The 1950 amendments immediately raise these payments to $5,165,618 for September or nearly $62,000,000 per annum. At present 1,778,000 people are covered by the social-security insurance system in Michigan. As of January 1, 1951, the following additional persons will be covered in our State: 181,000 nonfarm self-employed; 19,250 agricultural workers; 30,500 domestic workers; and 73,500 employees of State and local governments who may be covered by voluntary agreement. In addition to these persons there will also be certain full-time life-insurance salesmen, certain agent and commission drivers, certain full-time traveling or city salesmen, and certain industrial home workers covered by the revised definition of an employee. No breakdown for the State of Michigan is available for these latter groups.

Korean War Tests Role of Aged; Will They Be Casualties, Too?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

KOREAN WAR TESTS ROLE OF AGED; WILL THEY BE CASUALTIES, TOO?—FULL-FLEDGED EFFORT MEANS ALL MUST HAVE BUYING POWER TO HELP

CLEVELAND.—During World War II we learned that not all of the casualties took place in the foxholes and on the beachheads. A lot of people died a living death right here at home. The aged were the forgotten folks of that war. They were battle casualties along with the soldiers and sailors in the front lines.

When war comes, strange things happen to the American dollar. Everybody needs more of them. Prices of food and clothing double or triple And so everybody makes more money. Wages go way up. So do profits.

Everybody makes more money except the old people. They stay where they were before war broke out. The 3,000,000 on old-age assistance received just about the same checks in 1945, when prices reached their peak, as they did in the years before the war.

Their $45 old-age assistance checks bought goods they could have purchased for about $20 in peacetime. The Government refused to grant them more. So they slowly starved. Their poverty grew more critical. They were the casualties of the home front.

CALL IT POLICE ACTION BUT IT'S STILL A WAR

Now we are in another war. Don't let anybody tell you that the fighting in Korea is merely police action. You know we are at war. On paper, the agressor is North Korea. In reality, the aggressor is the Soviet Union. The North Koreans, knowing full well that the United Nations would never stand for a war of invasion, would never have dared to fire the first shot without the backing of Russia. The North Koreans are supplied with Russian materials.

So the United States—and the United Nations—are warring with Russia even though no formal declaration has been made. That adds up to a long war. And the experts tell us that to win this one the Nation must be placed on an all-out wartime footing.

That means total mobilization of all our resources, human and material. It means that every last person in this country must contribute to the winning of the peace. We can't do that if we have millions of casualties at home.

Today there are at least 11,500,000 people in America 65 years of age or older. That's a lot of people. They are needed in a war economy.

But millions of these are already casualties. More than 3,500,000 of them have absolutely no income at all. More than 2,000,000 have incomes of less than $500 a year. More than 2,000,000 have less than $1,000 a year.

So, of the 11,500,000 past 65, some 7,500,000 have less than $1,000, or nothing at all. They live in poverty or on the fringe of poverty. These 7,500,000 are casualties. They cannot help the economy because they have no purchasing power to contribute to the war effort.

MAKE HOME SOLDIERS OF THE MILLIONS OF AGED

Now, if America is to convert to an all-out war effort, it is going to have to make home soldiers of these people. Some of them, of course, will find jobs, especially when the employment market tightens. But millions of them will not be acceptable to industry because they are too old, or because they are blind or otherwise physically disabled. Nevertheless, they can be made good soldiers if the Government wants to help them enlist in the war to save democracy.

They can help in a valuable way. They can help by being transformed from paupers into folks able to hold their own in the market place.

Why should our Government make things tougher than they already are? Why try to fight a war overseas and at the same time support an intolerable burden of poverty at home? Why saddle ourselves with people who are useless to the economy, and expensive to the taxpayers, when we have the means to enable them to stand on their own two feet?

Let's grant that these folks can't put on a uniform and march off to the wars. Let's grant that they can't, because, of advanced age or disability, compete with younger people in industry. Let's grant that they have passed the stage of productivity.

WE CAN'T AFFORD A WAR AND A DEPRESSION, TOO

That doesn't mean that they can't be useful. In a war economy (and for that matter, in a peace economy, too) everybody must have purchasing power to keep the Nation healthy. When millions have no money, and there are pools of poverty, we wind up with areas of depression.

This Nation cannot afford to fight a war and depression at the same time.

So the smart thing to do is to win the war against depression at home, and to do it right now, before it is too late.

We aren't winning it with the weapon called H. R. 6000, the Social Security Act as amended. True, it will increase average old-age insurance by about 77 percent. But that only means that the average will be increased to $47 or so a month, and you can't get along today on that kind of money. The 3,000,000 on old-age assistance aren't going to be helped at all; they will still continue to receive their $46 average each month.

So the Social Security Act isn't the answer. It won't prevent casualties on the home front.

Antitrust Penalties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in the September 13 edition of the Christian Science Monitor:

ANTITRUST PENALTIES

There has been some talk lately of increasing the penalties for violation of the antitrust laws in the United States. We are heartily against monopoly and monopolistic practices but we question seriously whether this is the fair or effective way to suppress them.

What seems to be needed first is reliable legal definitions of what constitutes monopolistic business practice or conspiracy in restraint of trade. Recent judicial decisions have so extended the area of presumption allowed to the Federal Trade Commission that it is genuinely difficult for many executives of large firms to know when or whether they are violating the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

In the somewhat simpler sphere of personal criminology it has been found that certainty of punishment is a much more effective deterrent to crime than is severity of a penalty the culprit may hope to escape. Armed robbery will be less frequent in a city whose police force has a good record of detection than in one with stern judges but a low percentage of convictions.

Correspondingly, what seems needed in the business field is a thorough restudy and overhauling of the antitrust laws to state more specifically what is or is not permitted as to methods of competition or degrees of concentration in business. Then when businessmen, attorneys, and courts have more definite criteria to apply, the present penalties may be found sufficient.

This is a situation in which one good yardstick would have better effect than a dozen switches—or clubs.

The San Francisco Formula for Industrial Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of personal pleasure that I ask permission to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a recent bulletin issued by the San Francisco Employers Council. The bulletin is entitled "Formula for Industrial Peace" and relates how a threatened strike of retail-store delivery drivers was averted by persistent negotiations under the formula, which had its inception back in 1938.

At that time I was just completing my first year of service as president of the San Francisco Labor Council. During my initial year in that office it had become increasingly evident to me that many of our labor-management disputes and the strikes which sometimes resulted were due, at least in part, to the fact that there was no general clearing house through which efforts to promote the maintenance of industrial peace could be coordinated. There was no mechanism to permit those in both labor and management with a clear understanding and an honest interest in encouraging good relations, yet not directly connected with settlement of specific issues, to attempt an adjustment.

It is psychologically true that often in the heat of discussion basic problems, capable of solution, become embroiled in personal attitudes and differences, and deadlocks develop as a result. With this thought in mind I initiated a requirement that all unions affiliated with the labor council consult the council and obtain strike sanction from that body before a strike could be called. Under this procedure, when strike sanction is sought the employer is called in to present his views and arguments on the issue at hand. The matter is then referred to the president of the labor council, until recently myself, and he contacts official representatives of the major employer's organizations which may be involved to confer on possible means of settlement. By this means discussions are held on a plane permitting sober consideration of the basic issues and without the discoloration of personal animosities. Out of such meetings, and over the period of years since they were first initiated, San Francisco has emerged with a $99^{11}/_{100}$ percent clean record of working out disputes without strikes. That is the true picture of the labor situation in San Francisco, as contrasted with the statements made from time to time by some uninformed or prejudiced individuals to the effect that San Francisco is a strike-ridden city.

In a summary of labor-relations activities accompanying the bulletin to be printed with these remarks, the employers council points to the fact that June of 1950 was the tenth consecutive month during which no strikes were called against council members operating under the formula. Such evidence is striking proof of the effectiveness of the formula for industrial peace and is a direct refutation of irresponsible publicity depicting the city as the victim of industrial warfare. I take considerable pleasure and pride in this record, Mr. Speaker, and in the successful operation of the formula as exemplified in the case cited in the employers council bulletin, which follows:

FORMULA FOR INDUSTRIAL PEACE

The threatened strike set for Wednesday, August 30, by AFL Retail Delivery Drivers Union, Local 278, which would have crippled the operations of more than 200 San Francisco retail stores and inconvenienced thousands of San Francisco residents perhaps for months has been settled mainly through the persistent efforts of the San Francisco Labor Council and the employers council after 3 months of negotiations.

It is noted here because it is another outstanding example of the working of the San Francisco formula for industrial peace which has averted many costly strikes in San Francisco during the past 10 years.

The contract between the Retail Delivery Owners and Operators Association and the union expired last June. The union voted to strike to enforce its demand for an increase of 13¾ cents an hour after the negotiations became deadlocked. The San Francisco Labor Council, working with the officers and rank and file of the union, then recommended a compromise, which was agreed to by the employers council on behalf of the owners and operators and accepted by the union membership last Tuesday. It provided a wage increase of 6 cents per hour by the Owners and Operators Association, who in turn were given important cost-item concessions by the union.

W. G. STORIE,
Executive Vice President,
San Francisco Employers Council.

National Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I should like to include, at this time, the address I delivered on September 4, 1950, in Worcester, Mass., at the first joint Labor Day commemoration ceremony held by the combined membership of the Worcester Central Labor Union and the Worcester Industrial Union Council. The address follows:

I feel especially proud and privileged to take part in this first joint Labor Day celebration of the Worcester Central Labor Union and the Worcester Industrial Union Council.

Both as a public official and a private citizen, I am exceedingly glad that the keynote of your meeting here today is unity.

No one can say, with absolute certainty, whether or not the Korean war is the first fighting step of communistic challenge to the whole power and existence of the United States. However, I would not hesitate to say, with certainty, that no matter what develops, we are facing disaster, unless every element in our American society does not unite in patriotic purpose for our national welfare. The character strength of America as a Nation, and America's ability as a world leader, is being directly tested by Russian leaders this very minute, and we need make no mistake about that.

Unless we answer that test by demonstrating true national unity, we will be in grave danger of being destroyed.

That national unity will have to be a lot more concrete than words or proclamations, or mere political compromise; we will have to achieve something far beyond any polite bipartisanship. It is absolutely necessary for us to strive for, and demand as an ideal and an actual practice, complete national unity, something that each and every one of us must engage in with our hearts and our souls.

Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, we have in war and in peace fought together in common causes against common dangers, shared common sorrows and sufferings, triumphed in common successes, and the independence of liberty which we now possess are the works of combined councils and united efforts, resulting in benefits to all. This unity is the source of our strength, the core of our liberty, the foundation of our peaceful living. It is, therefore, a great and grave mistake to assume that any one class of Americans is naturally and inevitably hostile to any other class, that the wealthy and the workingman, employer and employee are destined to live in mutual conflict.

Down through the years America has lived to give the lie to all who would deny that in unity and justice for all, reside the strength, wealth, and peace of our United States and all its varied peoples, who, living and working as one, have made and kept our country one. Upon our continued productive activity and efficiency depend the maintenance and the improvement of our standards of living as well as our very survival as a democracy able to meet and repulse Communist tyranny.

In no business, nor profession, nor craft, nor institution in America is there room today for any man with a divided allegiance.

We Americans cannot afford to blind ourselves to the terrible conflict which faces us today. The issue is obvious and we must solve it or disintegrate; the hope of all mankind rests with us in this hour.

The United States cannot and will not successfully sustain the position of leadership as one of the two mighty, opposing, and world-wide forces contending for the fate of humanity—with "one hand tied behind her back." In this dangerous time, if we fail, we disappear as a great nation. Whatever Russia's further intentions are, it is high time we begin adjusting our mind and our conduct to meet any additional threats.

Nowadays, the field of battle is the whole world. Wars are fought not only for territory or economic gains, but for a fundamental way of life. The whole plan of living must change when our democratic way of life is opposed. Business as usual, pleasure as usual, standards of living as usual, political prejudices and partisanships as usual, are shameful objectives for any individual or class to pursue now.

If we try to gain the victory at the least cost, it is very likely we shall lose all. The struggle we are presently engaged in is everybody's struggle and the meeting of it is everybody's duty. That is the kind of unity we need to convince our fighting men in Korea, and those who are being called, that the American people are squarely behind them.

To establish our basic national unity, we must, first of all, respect and uphold the laws and regulations promulgated by our legislative authorities. We cannot all be Presidents, or generals, or Cabinet Members. The rules we permit to be made, under our democratic form of government, in regulation of our economy, in restriction of our personal privileges and to concentrate on our national resources to one single purpose, must be observed and accepted.

We must also persistently encourage the creation of a public opinion that will recognize the public duty of a private citizen. American public conscience is the unified demand of the people that each individual promotes the general welfare in personal conduct by obeying the regulations to which all of us are subjected. Evading, either by cunning or official favor, the observance of laws, which have been properly approved, is little short of treason when this Nation is fighting for its very survival against the most poisonous enemy in the history of the world.

This is the moment for national and individual sacrifice. Sacrifices raise our self-respect to the point where it becomes a mighty national asset. Those who take advantage of the Nation's perils and sacrifices to enrich themselves by exploitation or for the gain of personal, class or political power are saboteurs of unity. Neither sophisticated criticism, nor blind obedience is unity. True unity comprises impeccable honor, unselfish devotion and invincible purpose.

I wish to congratulate you for the demonstration of unity emphasized through this gathering this morning. I know, and everyone knows, that the heroic contributions and patriotic services of labor, during all our wars, are among the proudest pages of our national history. The labor movement in this country is as thoroughly American as the Washington Monument or the Lincoln Memorial. There are approximately 15,000,000 trade unionists in the United States; with the members of their families and close relatives, they undoubtedly represent almost a fourth of our entire population. The Communists have made desperate efforts to secure a firm foothold in the American labor movement, but they have failed utterly, because the hand of American labor is raised against them and will continue to be raised against them.

God forbid any devilish decision of the Communist leaders in the Kremlin to plunge this Nation and the world into the hell of a third world war, but we must remain prepared for any such eventuality. If it comes, I am supremely confident that the American working people, their sons and daughters, will not be surpassed by any other group in promoting the national unity essential for the preservation of ourselves and all Christian civilization.

Are the Loaned Ships Stopping Communism?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, of the ships loaned to Russia some of the naval craft have been returned and only a few of the merchant ships. What are these ships doing today to help the United States to stop the march of communism?

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including the following timely editorial from the Cleveland News, of Cleveland, Ohio:

WHY ARE UNITED STATES-OWNED SHIPS WORKING FOR THE RUSSIANS?

Here is a piece of fine auxiliary news about the war in Korea:

Russia has in Korean waters, or nearby, a fleet of about 800 large and small merchant vessels.

In 1946, the United States "loaned" Russia 581 naval craft. They were classified as follows: 15 river tugs; 34 mine sweepers; 30 landing craft, infantry; 28 frigates; 78 submarine chasers; 8 motor torpedo boats; 17 landing craft, tank; 194 motor torpedo boats; 43 motor mine sweepers; 4 floating workshops; 26 submarine chasers; 54 land craft, mechanized; 36 submarine chasers; 1 motor launch; 1 plane personnel boat; 2 landing craft, support; 2 landing craft, vehicle; 3 ice breakers; 4 250-ton pontoon barges; 1 light cruiser.

Russia has returned some of the craft, no one will say how many.

Question is, how many of these United States "loans" are working for Russia and/or North Korea this minute? For a great deal of the imported North Korean material is arriving by ship from the nearby Russo-Siberian ports.

Representative ALVIN WEICHEL, of Sandusky, has been trying for months to get an answer to the question. In 1946, he was chairman of a House committee which tried to get details of the Russian-United States deal over the ships, succeeded finally in getting Secretary of State George Marshall's attention. General Marshall said the then Under Secretary Dean Acheson knew more about it, and produced the Under Secretary.

Mr. Acheson promptly told the committee the loan of the ships to our then "brave war ally" was none of Congress' business. But Congressman WEICHEL has kept at the matter, got the details, and recently learned from Navy and State Department sources that Russia returned "some" of the craft, still using some, though no one will say where.

Three weeks ago, Congressman WEICHEL told the House he had learned from an ex-GI who had been at an Okinawa supply base that, after the Jap surrender, we sold tanks there to Russia at $12 a ton. Gives us a creepy feeling to wonder how much of our own manufacture is coming at us over the mountains north of Pusan.

Exposé of Medical Lobby

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the American Medical Association will launch one of the most vicious assaults ever directed against the President of the United States, the administration, and the Democratic Party beginning the week of October 8. In a concentrated and concerted 2-week period this organization, which we well know as one of the most insidious lobbies in Washington, will spend $1,110,000—let me repeat, $1,110,000—in a so-called Message of Freedom that will reach 150,000,000 Americans through their daily newspapers, magazines, and radios.

The real purpose of this campaign is to mislead the people and to corrupt the public mind against its own best interest. It is far more than an attack on the President's health program. It is a concerted all-out method of beating Democrats and those who support the President's health program, at the polls this November. Bear this in mind, the AMA campaign is not directed against socialized medicine, it is aimed against health insurance.

If you examine how the American Medical Association is going to spend its money, you will see that this is no ordinary advertising campaign. Usually an organization with a $1,000,000 advertising fund spreads the money over a 12-month period. Contrary to the usual procedure of American business, the AMA is concentrating its spending in 2 weeks—two extremely important weeks during the month of October just preceding the close of the fall political campaign. It is quite obvious that by using the pretext of calling this an educational campaign, the AMA is invading the sanctity of American homes and the men and women in those homes have no way of fighting back.

I have recently learned how the doctors' lobby is going to spend its $1,000,000 fund. The AMA is budgeting $560,000 for ads in 11,000 newspapers—every major newspaper in the United States. The AMA is budgeting about $300,000 for announcements on more than 1,000 radio stations—stations broadcasting in every important city in the Nation. The AMA is budgeting $250,000 for full-page ads in the 30 national magazines having the largest circulation.

And that is not all. The medical lobby has fellow conspirators who are conniving and conspiring with them to help kill liberal legislation by defeating those who support the President's Fair Deal program. The American Medical Association hopes for tie-in advertisements on the radio and in newspapers that may reach the staggering total of $19,000,000.

They want to spend $20,000,000 to tell the people that "the moon is made of green cheese" and that health insurance is socialized medicine, when it is nothing of the sort. I ask myself, and I ask you, what we can do to combat this unholy, un-American propaganda campaign. For myself, I intend to ask my constituents to expose this campaign for what it is—an attack on President Truman, on the administration, on the Democratic Party, on Democratic candidates, and above all, primarily an attack upon the people themselves. I am going to tell my constituents that their candidates and they themselves will be the victims unless they take the initiative from the reactionaries by telling everyone—everywhere—what is going to happen before it happens.

I am suggesting that the people put on a telephone campaign or exposé in their communities long before October 8. If each person calls 10 people and each of these people calls 10 others, and the chain continues, everyone will be on the alert to this new, insidious, political tactic designed to cripple the Democratic Party and the Fair Deal program.

The magazine, Editor and Publisher, which is published for newspaper and public relations people, carried an article in the issue of August 26, 1950, in which it outlines the American Medical Association's propaganda program against the people. I would like to read the full text. It follows:

AMA'S $1,110,000 AD PROGRAM SET FOR OCTOBER

(By George A. Brandenburg)

CHICAGO.—Advertising's heavy artillery at the national and local level will boom out messages to reaffirm and solidify public faith in American enterprise through endorsement of voluntary health insurance and opposition to State socialism, according to plans announced this week by the American Medical Association.

During 2 weeks in October, the AMA "Message of Freedom," together with thousands of tie-in ads, will reach 150,000,000 Americans through the greatest number of newspaper, magazine, and radio ads ever devoted to a single theme.

NEWSPAPERS HEAD LIST

Newspapers will carry the heavy load of AMA and tie-in advertising, with copy scheduled to run during the week of October 8. It was announced by Clem Whitaker and Leone Baxter, delegated to coordinate AMA's national education campaign.

The advertising budget approved by the AMA board of trustees totals $1,110,000, of which $560,000 has been allocated to newspapers, $300,000 to radio, and $250,000 to national magazines. Approximately 144,500 individual doctors, in every community in America, will share the cost of this advertising program through their dues payments to AMA.

"This, without doubt, is the broadest-coverage newspaper advertisement of the year, judged from the standpoint of the number of newspapers included in the schedule," declared Whitaker and Baxter, the husband-and-wife public-relations counselors who have prepared the advertising ammunition for this mass appeal.

ELEVEN THOUSAND NEWSPAPERS SCHEDULED

The AMA's schedule will run in approximately 11,000 newspapers, including every bona fide daily and weekly paper in the 48 States, District of Columbia, and the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska.

Every newspaper on the schedule will receive an insertion order early in September from Lockwood-Shackelford Co., Chicago advertising agency selected to handle this business, for a 70-inch (5 columns by 14 inches), black-and-white display ad. Full-page ads are also scheduled in Sunday newspaper supplements and national magazines. Sunday magazines are in addition to all dailies and weeklies.

AMA copy will likewise appear in business, professional trade publications 30 days ahead of general schedule to develop tie-in advertising support from allied organizations, business, and industry.

During the second and third weeks of October, more than 1,000 radio stations will broadcast spot announcements, covering every State, Hawaii and Alaska. In addition, 30 national magazines will carry full-page messages concurrently.

The AMA advertising schedule is as follows:

Weekly newspapers: the week of October 8.

Daily newspapers: October 11.

Sunday newspaper supplements: October 15.

National magazines: the week of October 8 for weeklies; the November issues of monthlies, distributed in October.

Radio: second and third weeks of October.

Sunday newspaper supplements will include American Weekly, This Week, Parade, and 28 independent Sunday magazine sections, representing an estimated total circulation of over 38,000,000.

SEEK TERRIFIC IMPACT

Commenting on AMA's blanket-coverage policy, Mr. Whitaker told E. and P.: "We want the terrific impact of all media hitting at once. This is a 'grass roots' advertising campaign, directed to all the people of America, whether they live in great cities, small towns, or villages, or on farms.

"Wherever there is a newspaper, there are doctors—and doctors' patients. The AMA advertising program is designed to blanket every area of medical practice. Consequently, the schedule calls for the use of advertising space in all the newspapers of America. There will be some duplication of circulation but the added impact of that duplication is desired, so that medicine's story can be hammered home by repetition."

Newspapers will have ample tie-in possibilities, he pointed out. The Whitaker-Baxter team has prepared an advertising kit which will reach newspapers about September 1, outlining in detail 20 or more profitable tie-in promotions at the local level. These include drug stores, all types of merchants and businessmen, manufacturers, insurance companies and agencies, local health plans and hospitals.

BLUE CROSS TO COOPERATE

Local Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans will be provided with material which they can use as a part of their own institutional promotion campaigns to coincide with AMA's advertising program, Lawrence C. Wells, public relations director of Blue Cross and Blue Shield Commissions, told E. and P.

These groups will advertise in newspapers, he said, to exploit Blue Cross and Blue Shield prepaid insurance programs from a brand-name standpoint.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans will receive suggested newspaper ads in various sizes, including mats for larger ads up to half-page size.

In addition to specific suggested tie-ins from local business firms of all types, the AMA kit also includes a full-page Freedom Roll-Call layout that will permit individuals, or their organizations, to be identified with the program.

In order that national advertisers may avail themselves of the opportunity to tie in with the campaign, letters, signed by Dr. Elmer L. Henderson, AMA president, and Dr. Louis H. Bauer, chairman of the AMA board of trustees, are going out this month to the presidents of 25,000 big firms, telling of the campaign's objectives, and why their respective firms should participate.

HAVE NRDGA SUPPORT

Another letter is going to the 7,000 members of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, urging retailers to join in the program at the local level. Whitaker and Baxter also indicated they expect cooperation from unrelated groups, such as the railroads and power companies.

To develop tie-in advertising support from allied organizations and business generally, special AMA copy will be used early in September in business, medical, drug, advertising and publishing publications. The latter will include Editor and Publisher, Publisher's Auxiliary, American Press, National Publisher, Publishers' Tab, and all State press association publications in the United States.

Excess-Profits Tax Should Be Enacted

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of an excess-profits tax. The conference committee of the Senate and House has returned to us a bill that greatly increases the taxes to be paid, but it does not provide any excess-profits tax on the corporations. It is inconceivable that the administration should ignore the right and justice of requiring corporations, with the highest profits ever recorded, to escape payment of taxes based upon what is easily discernible as excess profits.

We had an excess-profits tax during World War II. We need it badly at this time as a source of revenue to help meet the cost of the present war, and to provide an adequate defense for the future. War is a time of sacrifice. Our boys are being wounded and killed in Korea. Many of them have already made the supreme sacrifice These boys and their families know what sacrifice really means. There are other boys and their families who will know what it means before the present war is ended. With sacrifices such as this being made it would be a gross injustice not to tax the dollars that represent excess profits of corporations. If we draft men, then we should draft dollars.

The administration spokesmen claim that it is a difficult task to draw the necessary legislation to provide such a tax. For this reason they claim that the whole matter should go over until the next session of Congress, and that hearings can be held at that time. There is in my opinion no justice in this claim. There was no delay for hearings and committee consideration before our boys were sent into Korea. There was no delay in their response. There was no putting off their sacrifices until next session. They are there now fighting and dying. We must do everything possible to assist them.

The revenue that the excess-profits tax would produce is needed now. It is our duty to see that legislation is drawn to accomplish the purpose before this Congress adjourns.

Whose Leadership Are We Following?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address, entitled "Whose Leadership Are We Following?" delivered by George E. Stringfellow, chairman, board of trustees, Ithaca College, before the Kiwanis Club of Salt Lake City, on Thursday, August 31, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHOSE LEADERSHIP ARE WE FOLLOWING?

(Address given by George E. Stringfellow, vice president of Thomas A. Edison, Inc., before the Kiwanis Club of Salt Lake City on Thursday, August 31, 1950)

Thank you very much for your gracious and generous invitation. I consider it a signal honor to be asked to address such a fine group of American citizens as comprise the Kiwanis Club of Salt Lake City. Few service clubs in America enjoy the standing in their communities and throughout the United States, Canada, and Alaska as does your club.

I wish to speak to you today on politics—not partisan politics or patronage politics, but rather as defined by Webster, "the science of government". If we knew more about the science of government, our demands for more economical government would be more productive. We American taxpayers are today perhaps getting less for our tax dollar than any other group of citizens in the world, certainly less than any other group of free or relatively free citizens.

For example, 20 years ago the annual cost of Federal Government was a little less than $5,000,000,000. Excluding the Korean War, which the President says is a "police action," the cost of Federal Government this year will be about $45,000,000,000, or nine times more than it was 20 years ago. Our taxes 20 years ago were a little less than $5,000,000,000 a year. This year our taxes will probably reach $45,000,000,000 and, conceivably, sixty billions next year. Twenty years ago, our national debt was a little less than $20,000,000,000. Our national debt now is well in excess of $260,000,000,000, not taking into consideration a number of bad loans, political loans, made by RFC. The cost of government 20 years ago was equal to 75 percent of the total income of all the citizens in California. Today the cost of Federal Government is equal to all the income of all the people west of the Mississippi, save Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, Iowa, and 10 percent of Minnesota.

When he was seeking the Presidency of this Republic in 1932, Franklin D. Roosevelt complained bitterly about the high cost of Government. He was especially critical of unbalanced budgets or deficit spending. Roosevelt said that a government, like a family, can spend a little more than it takes in for a year or so, but when that government, like a family, becomes a spendthrift and throws caution to the winds, you know and I know, said Candidate Roosevelt, we are headed for the poorhouse. I submit that when a government goes to the poorhouse it takes all of its people with it. If we are to avoid going to the poorhouse collectively, we must balance our budget. We must get back to living within our income.

When a corporation gets into financial difficulties the courts appoint a receiver, who liquidates the corporation's obligations and, if there is anything left, reorganizes the corporation and staffs it with officers who know how to live within their income or the income of the business. The receiver is, of course, responsible to the court by which he is appointed.

When a Government gets into financial difficulties there is no court to appoint a receiver. A dictator arises and takes over. This dictator is not responsible to a court of law; he is responsible only to his whims. The dictator determines the way of life for the people. The people become his subjects. They lose their savings; they lose their way of life; and they lose their liberty.

Inflation always produces dictators. It was inflation that produced Mussolini; it was inflation that produced Hitler; it was inflation that produced Stalin; and inflation will produce a dictator in America just as sure as night follows day. And do not delude yourselves into believing that if we in America have a dictator he will be a benevolent dictator. There is no such thing as a benevolent dictator. All dictators are ruthless, overbearing, and cruel.

One of the things that disturbs me about our Government in Washington is that it no longer is concerned about balancing our budget. Before the war in Korea the President nonchalantly budgeted a deficit of more than $5,000,000,000, at the peak of prosperity. I submit that if a government cannot balance its budget at the peak of prosperity it never will balance it. And if we are to continue with an unbalanced budget, Roosevelt's prediction that we are headed for the poorhouse will become a grim reality and, in which event, we will be destroyed by inflation.

The administration in Washington appears to be more interested in the balancing of the budgets of foreign countries than they are in balancing our own. For example, the early part of this year Secretary of State Acheson, who seems to have many loyalties, all of them unfortunately not to our way of life, wrote a letter to the President of Korea in which he said that he wanted that Government to balance its budget and that it must balance its budget if it was to avoid financial chaos. He wrote a similar letter to the Government of Greece, but never a word about chaos in America from unbalanced budgets. The British budget for 1949 and 1950 shows a surplus of £1,667,000,000, or $3,278,000,000. During that time we gave considerable aid—financial aid—to Britain, which helped to balance her budget and unbalance ours. Our neighbors to the north, the Canadians, for the 2 years ending June 30, 1950, not only balanced their budget but reduced their national debt by $686,000,000—while we show a deficit of $4,900,000,000.

Senator HARRY FLOOD BYRD, of Virginia, one of the ablest men in the United States Senate, outlined for the President how he could reduce expenditures $10,000,000,000 without affecting the war effort. The President ignored the Senator's suggestions. The President is not interested in savings; he's interested in spending and in higher taxes.

Eighteen years ago there were 30 major Federal spending agencies. Today there are 62, an increase of 110 percent. Eighteen years ago there were 564,000 Federal employees. Today there are more than 2,000,000, an increase of 250 percent.

The President of the United States should, in my opinion, be a symbol of economy. That being the case, let's take a look at the White House payrolls. The White House payroll during the last year of the Hoover administration was $127,200. During the last year of the Roosevelt administration the White House payroll was $256,431. During last year of the Truman administration, the White House payroll was $998,254. Most of you recall that the President early in the year made a "nonpolitical" trip to the Northwest to dedicate some dams which had already been dedicated. This trip cost the sorely pressed American taxpayer more than a quarter-million dollars. That, I contend, is a wanton waste of our funds.

The Department of Agriculture recently conducted a pajama probe which cost the American taxpayer $100,000 and developed this startling information:

1. More than half the men in the United States use pajamas for sleeping purposes.
2. Rich men have more pajamas than poor men.
3. The more educated the man, the more likely he is to sleep in pajamas.
4. Pajamas are worn more in cold climates than in warm climates.
5. About half the pajama wearers select the garments themselves, while one-third leave it to their wives—the report does not track down the remainder. (This can, of course, be a project for another probe.)
6. More men between 30 and 54 wear pajamas than those younger or older.

The 192-page pamphlet, which can be had by writing the Government Printing Office and sending along perhaps a dime, said nothings about nightshirts. Perhaps Mr. Brannan would consider this of sufficient importance to conduct another probe at the cost of $100,000.

I realize that it is hard to conceive that we have administrators of Government who are so stupidly throwing away our funds when they are so urgently needed to prosecute the war and other vital things, but if there is any doubt in your minds about the pajama probe, write the Government Printing Office for the 192-page pamphlet.

The President has been very critical of the Eightieth Congress. However, the Eightieth Congress gave us the Taft-Hartley Act, which is a great measure. A measure which the President did not have the intestinal fortitude to sign, although he has found it necessary to use that law on a number of occasions. Yet he wants to repeal it only because the labor bosses want it repealed. The President has often referred to the Eightieth Congress as "the second worst Congress in the history of America." The Eightieth Congress was the only Congress to balance our budget in the last 20 years. Not only did it balance the budget, but it reduced the national debt by $9,200,000,000.

Now, let's take a look at the Eighty-first Congress, often referred to as the "Eighty-worst," which it probably is. The Eighty-first Congress established a deficit of $4,900,000,000. The President seems to think that the Eighty-first Congress is a pretty good Congress. The President has, in the words of Franklin D. Roosevelt, thrown caution to the winds and has become a spendthrift. He is the most extravagant President in the history of our Republic and you will recall that it was extravagance that ruined Rome, extravagance is ruining Britain, and we in this Republic are on the "Roman road to ruin," for our politicians have led our people to believe that Government is something to live on instead of under. It was Grover Cleveland, that great American, that true Democrat, who said, "People should support the Government instead of Government the people."

On leaving Convention Hall in Philadelphia following the signing of the Constitution of the United States, Benjamin Franklin was asked, "What do we have?" The wise old man responded, "We have a republic, if we can keep it."

Sixty-one years ago, James Russell Lowell, that great statesman and diplomat, was asked, "How long will the American Republic endure?" To which he replied, "As long as the ideals of the men who made it continue dominant."

Obviously, we cannot keep our Republic if we continue to spend more than we take in. Obviously, the ideals of the men who made America are not as dominant now as they were a few years ago, for the Communists have infiltrated our Government. We still have, in my opinion, Communists in all departments of Government. Moscow is still directing our affairs in Washington.

Thirty-five years ago, Lenin, the patron saint of communism, said, "We Communists hope to force America to spend her way to destruction." One hundred years ago, Karl Marx said, "The only way to destroy the capitalistic form of government is by tax and tax and tax." In his farewell address, George Washington warned us to "Cherish public credit and avoid the accumulation of public debt." In the last 20 years we have been doing much to make Lenin's wish a grim reality by spending more than we take in. During that same time, we have been following Marx's philosophy of tax and tax and tax. The combination of Lenin's and Marx's philosophy will destroy our way of life. We are following it. We are not following the leadership of Washington, for Washington told us to "Cherish public credit and avoid the accumulation of public debt."

Senator HARRY FLOOD BYRD recently said that if the Congress enacts into law the three proposals advocated by President Truman, this country cannot avoid state socialism. Those three measures are: socialized medicine, socialized agriculture, socialized housing. Few of us believe that President Truman is setting out to give us state socialism or communism. However, there are many who do not believe that President Truman knows the difference between capitalism and socialism. Capitalism produces things for people to divide. Socialism divides them and when there is nothing left to divide, chaos reigns and communism takes over. Chaos is as important to the growth of communism as moisture is to sustaining life. Socialism is the intermediate step between capitalism and communism. It is often the bridge over which capitalism passes. Almost every move Truman makes is in the direction of socialism. There was never a time in the history of this Republic when the people were more ready for determined leadership and it is our responsibility to do what is necessary to provide that leadership if we would save our way of life.

Only you and others like you can save America. I know there are those in my audience who agree with what I am saying but feel that I am saying it to the wrong audience. I beg of you to believe that my talk is keyed to the only audience that can save America. If you and others like you will become Paul Reveres and warn the people of the approaching danger, America will be saved.

Fellow citizens, the greatest deficit in the world today is not money, materials, or men; the greatest deficit in the world today is intellectual integrity. We need to elect to public office men who possess that priceless ingredient—intellectual integrity. Will you do your part to elect such men and, thus, save our way of life?

Radio Could Have Prevented Railroad Wreck Which Took Lives of 33 Pennsylvania National Guard Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, the Pennsylvania train crash at Isleta, Ohio, is a tragic lesson on the need for two-way radio communication on all our railroads.

I made exactly the same statement on January 2, 1948, the day after the New Year's Day wreck on the Missouri Pacific at Otterville, Mo., in which 14 persons lost their lives.

Definitely, these are two major railroad tragedies which could have been prevented by radio.

The recent Pennsylvania wreck occurred on a stretch of track fully protected. But was it? The record speaks for itself. Almost every modern safety device was aboard the crack Spirit of St. Louis. But train radio was missing.

I have introduced legislation in the Congress for the past 4 years which if enacted into law would require railroads to install and maintain radio-communication systems. Adequate hearings have been held on these proposals and in my opinion this legislation should be considered by Congress before adjournment.

I am convinced the lives of the 33 Pennsylvania National Guard men could have been saved had the stalled train, on which they were trapped, the means to communicate immediately with the crew of the oncoming Spirit of St. Louis. The two-way radio system would have required an acknowledgment that a warning had been received.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith three timely editorials from the Tuesday, September 12, editions of the Belleville News-Democrat, the St. Louis Star-Times, and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch:

[From the Belleville News-Democrat]

END THIS CARNAGE

It happened again. Another terrible train wreck in fogbound Ohio early yesterday morning took a toll of at least 34 lives and injured scores—many of them permanently maimed. Needless to say, the disaster left the entire Nation stunned.

Had the ramming of the crack Pennsylvania Spirit of St. Louis into a stalled troop train been completely unavoidable, its shocking impact might have been lessened somewhat. But this accident, along with all the rest in a deplorable series, could have been prevented.

Congressman MELVIN PRICE pointed the way several years ago, and had his urging been heeded then, and the rail carriers been forced to equip with modern electronic safety devices, train collisions would not be happening every few weeks.

Notwithstanding all our vaunted flair for technological advancement, most of America's railroads are hidebound by obsolescence. They cling tenaciously to outmoded and antiquated operating procedures that ignore the well-being of the traveling public.

It seems strange that a much higher price is placed on human life and limb by the National Military Establishment than by domestic railroads. But it is a fact that airmen in combat are protected by safety devices that are denied to civilian railway passengers simply because the railroads refuse to adopt them.

The railroad's foot-dragging in this matter of public safety is ascribable to only one thing—the cost of installing up-to-the-minute equipment which would safeguard not only the customers, but the operators, too.

This attitude is based on false economy. Accidents like the one in Ohio yesterday morning do not come cheaply, and getting out from under that one may tax the resources of the Pennsylvania line. The dollar cost of this catastrophe would have bought an awful lot of radio sets to keep trains from smacking into one another.

America can ill afford to sacrifice its life blood in pointless carnage. If the railroads will not keep abreast of the times—and they have given every indication they will not—certainly Uncle Sam is justified in stepping in to insist that the public shall be protected.

[From the St. Louis Star-Times]

ONE DEVICE MISSING

Almost every modern safety device known to railroad engineering was aboard the Pennsylvania's crack Spirit of St. Louis. But one was missing. That one was train radio. And because it was missing, 33 soldiers are dead today, another 60 are injured.

What happened to kill these Pennsylvania National Guard men before ever they got near the Korean front, according to witnesses, was this: The troop train on which they were riding broke an airbrake hose just west of a signal at Isleta, Ohio. Crewmen jumped from the stalled train and set out flares—but they were not fast enough. The Spirit of St. Louis, roaring through heavy fog, rammed the troop train, driving a Diesel that was pushing it into an old-fashioned coach ahead.

This tragic accident occurred on a stretch of track that was what too many railroad men like to think of as "fully protected." That is to say, it was in "automatic block-signal territory," where the mere passage of trains automatically sets the signals. Beyond that, the Spirit of St. Louis was equipped with cab signals; even if fog obscured the overhead signals, then, the engineer could still read an exact duplicate of them in his cab.

But the evidence that there was not full protection lies scattered in the wreckage of the crash.

It might so easily have been otherwise: If the trains had been equipped with radio, there would have been no reliance on mere visible signals, no reliance on flares. Instead, the engineer of the stalled train would simply have radioed the engineer of the Spirit and warned him to stop. Then there would have been no chance for oversight or for blinding by fog.

The Pennsylvania happens to be in the vanguard of the roads that are using the safety of radio. But this wreck proves that even the Pennsylvania has not moved far enough fast enough. It should be even stronger proof for the other roads that have not managed even the progress the Pennsylvania has made.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

THE FATAL STOP

Railroad trains sometime have to make unexpected stops. When they do, the methods at their disposal to warn off the next train behind them are too primitive. That seems to have been the reason for the wreck of the Spirit of St. Louis and a troop train at Isleta, Ohio, early Monday morning. It has been the reason for several other major wrecks in recent years.

At the speed at which a modern crack train travels it requires a distance of a mile to a mile and a half to stop. Yet the warning flares and a single lantern set up at Isleta were reported to have been only 100 yards behind the stalled train—not far enough back to be of any practical use. But the flagman did not have time to set them far enough back to do any good—only some 5 minutes elapsed between the stopping and the crash. There was the same want of time in other recent rear-end collisions.

Repeated wrecks on the railroads resulting from the unexpected stops with no adequate way of warning off the train that is coming along behind should plead eloquently for the use of train radio. A means is needed to enable the crew of the stalled train to communicate immediately with the crew of the oncoming train and to obtain acknowledgment that its warning is received and understood. No such means exists on most trains. Radio would provide it.

Uncle Sam—the Goose That Lays the Golden Eggs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident from the facts which I am presenting in the RECORD, under unanimous consent previously obtained, that the people of this country are going to pay very dearly for attempting to support the entire world.

There are those in the New Deal who believe that we can feed the world and engage in wars everywhere. I am not one of those who believe that this can be done without destroying the security of those who look to their investments, their pensions, their annuities, and their retirements to take care of them in the days to come:

UNCLE SAM—THE GOOSE THAT LAYS THE GOLDEN EGGS

On June 30, 1950, the daily statement of the United States Treasury reported gold assets of the United States Government at $24,230,567,200.91.

The daily statement for September 11, 1950, reports the gold assets at $23,576,155,300.45, a net loss in gold assets of $654,411,900.46.

The Wall Street Journal of September 13, 1950, commenting upon the transfer of our gold to the accounts of other nations, related that Mr. Camille Gutt, former Belgian Minister of Finances, and presently chairman of the executive board and managing director of the International Monetary Fund is quoted from Paris for the statement that the United States is losing gold at the rate of $2,000,000,000 a year.

The situation appears to be that foreign governments now have a surplus of United States gift dollars and prefer gold as the medium of settlements in foreign trade.

A study of this complicated monetary situation reveals some highly interesting facts.

In 1940 the total stock of money in the United States (as of June 30, 1941) was $28,457,960,000 of which amount gold represented $19,963,091,000 or approximately 70.15 percent.

Between 1940 and June 30, 1949, our gold stocks increased to $24,406,324,000 and the total stock of money to $53,103,980,000. The percentage of gold to the total money supply then was 46.07.

On August 23, 1950, the money in circulation amounted to $26,963,000,000 and the gold assets of the Treasury were $23,803,000,000, making the total money supply as of that date (including silver bullion and silver dollars carried at $2,347,000,000) $53,113,000,000.

The percentage of gold to the total money supply thus has been reduced from 47.07 percent to 44.39 percent in a little over a year. Since American citizens must depend upon an irredeemable currency, an examination of the Government's fiscal situation appears in order.

THE ACT OF JANUARY 30, 1934

"No gold shall, after January 30, 1934, be coined, and no gold shall, after January 30, 1934, be paid out or delivered by the United States: Provided, however, That coinage may continue to be executed by the mints of the United States for foreign countries in accordance with section 367 of this title. All gold coin of the United States shall be withdrawn from circulation, and together with other gold owned by the United States, shall be formed into bars of such weights and degrees of fineness as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct." (Title 31, section 315 b, U. S. C.)

Besides discontinuing the coinage of gold, the Congress by section 733 of the act of January 30, 1934, further provided:

"The Secretary of the Treasury may anticipate the payment of interest on the public debt, by a period not exceeding 1 year, from time to time, either with or without a rebate of interest upon the coupons, as to him may seem expedient; and he may sell gold in any amounts, at home or abroad, in such manner and at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest, and the proceeds of any gold so sold shall be covered into the general fund of the Treasury: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may sell the gold which is required to be maintained as a reserve or as security for currency issued by the United States, only to the extent necessary to maintain such currency at a parity with the gold dollar."

By section 734 of title 31, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase gold in any amounts at home or abroad with any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest, but the gold so purchased "shall be included as an asset of the general fund of the Treasury."

Section 463 of title 31 declares:

"(a) Every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, is declared to be against public policy; and no such provision shall be contained in or made with respect to any obligation hereafter incurred."

A comparison of the daily Treasury statements for June 30, 1950, and September 11, 1950, reveals that of the $654,411,900 loss in gold assets, the distribution was as follows:

Reduction in gold certificates outstanding	- $311,480
Reduction in gold certificate fund, Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System	641,000,000
Reduction in gold reserve	4,514,562
Reduction in gold in the general fund	8,575,858
Total reduction, gold assets (73 days)	654,411,900

As our gold assets diminish and with dollars divorced from redeemability, and Federal spending mounting day by day, Mr. Orval Adams, executive vice president, Utah First National Bank, Salt Lake City, Utah, in an address entitled "The Printing Press and the Treasury," said in part:

"With Federal spending, therefore, out of control and the Government committed to arm the western democracies and provide assistance or rehabilitation on a world-wide scale, the dollar question surges to the front as the most vital issue.

"With dollars divorced from redeemability in gold and a printing press anchored in the United States Treasury—and those in charge of the printing press devotees of the welfare state (or farewell state), the United States of America is a victim, in the words of Virgil Jordan, who is the chancellor of the National Industrial Conference Board, of 'government by subsidy, bribery, and robbery; the government willing to steal, and convert to fake money the savings of its citizens to satisfy its lust for ever-increasing power.' He also said: 'The welfare and protection promised for the future in return for votes can only be called the cruelest and most colossal fraud that has ever been practiced on a credulous people.'"

With Government spending at Federal, State, and local levels during the calendar year 1951 probable to be approximately $81,000,000,000, the Congress ought to find out just where our gold assets are being sent, and the amounts, if any, that have been covered into the Treasury as part of the general fund as provided by section 733 of title 31.

Since May 1, the Dow-Jones spot commodity index has risen from 160.0 to 199.18 as of September 11. This rise in commodity prices means the purchasing value of the dollar has been lowered by 20 percent from the level of May 1, when it stood at 58.2 percent of the 1935–39 average.

KILLING THE GOOSE

In a message to Congress, March 10, 1933, President Roosevelt warned:

"Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger."

Our present fiscal policy seems to be not only loose but dangerous. By trying to extend our finances and resources over many lands and many people, we may kill the goose that lays the golden eggs from out the United States Treasury.

It is time for the Congress to assume the full responsibilities delegated in the Constitution, "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures."

PAUL O PETERS.

Lest We Perish

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Brig. Gen. Bonner Fellers, United States Army, retired, in this week's issue of Collers in the article, it suggests food for will find time to read—and then read the second time. While I do not concur in all the statements made by General Fellers in the article it suggests food for thought and in these critical times should be considered required reading:

HOW WE CAN LICK STALIN

There is not a moment to lose. The deadline was long ago. The cold war has been lost.

The Korean war caught us dangerously unprepared. General MacArthur's sure touch, coupled with the failure of the Red Korean tanks to exploit early gains, probably will enable our resourceful forces to stabilize the situation. Then, as more reinforcements arrive, we shall be able to turn the tide.

Nevertheless, it is disconcerting to contemplate what could happen if hundreds of thousands of the oriental Red army, covered by a Red air force, were to move down into Korea.

Neither the bravery of our GI's nor General MacArthur's genius could overcome the disaster they would face. Even if our boys were to kill 10 or 20 to 1, we would be wiped out by an endless stream of Communists pouring upon us with complete abandon of life.

For many months before the Korean war started General MacArthur had pleaded in vain for stronger forces in his Far East Command. The Joint Chiefs of Staff personally had agreed with his views but, as they explained to him, the civil branch of the Government had final authority.

In South Korea our responsibilities had been assumed, March 1949 by the Department of State. In June of that year our troops were relieved. While it was known that North Koreans were being heavily armed, it was decided our aid from that time would be almost entirely economic. Of a $10,000,000 aid authorization by the Congress, only $108 worth of radio wire had been delivered prior to the Communist invasion. Administration leaders had made it clear that Korea was not essential to our strategic position in Asia.

Referring to President Truman's sudden reversal of this policy, General MacArthur said "the Far East Command, until the President's great pronouncement to support the epochal action of the United Nations, had no slightest responsibility for the defense of the free Republic of Korea. With the President's decision it assumed a completely new and added mission."

It was a State Department decision to leave the thirty-eighth parallel undefended on the south side. It was a White House decision which suddenly junked this policy in favor of armed intervention—at a time when sufficient military force was not readily available.

One or the other of these decisions was wrong.

In Europe, although there is no fighting there at the moment, our position is potentially far more critical than in Asia. There the State Department, without appreciation of the complexities of modern war and the terrific combat effectiveness of the Red army, has committed the United States to assist in holding western Europe's frontier. It is my belief that few professional military men of reputation really believe such a program can succeed. Yet the military, subordinated to the civil branch of our Government, has offered no public protest. Our Nation is in imminent peril unless our military leaders, even at the risk of their professional careers, insist that our plans be militarily sound and that the objectives given us by the civil branch of the Government be attainable.

WHY WE MUST AVOID GROUND COMBAT

We cannot win against Russia on the ground. We cannot win in ground combat against Red oriental forces on the Asiatic mainland. These Red forces are too vast numerically, too well equipped, too willing to sacrifice their men, for us to accept full-scale ground combat with them in Europe or Asia. Moreover, the distances and winter factors in Russia give her enormous advantages. Where Napoleon and Hitler failed from nearby bases, we had better not make the plunge from across the ocean.

It would be folly to strike Russia's greatest strength, her ground forces, with what in that war would be the weakest element of our three arms—our Ground Forces. Russia's hope for a military victory would lie in her ability to throw the full weight of the Red army against the United Nations forces, which of course would be mainly American. Under no circumstances should we allow Stalin to maneuver us into the position of opposing his strength with our weakness. Rather, we should avoid Russia's incalculable strength and attack her where she is most vulnerable. Russia is weakest at her heart. She is strongest on her periphery. Inside Russia, communism is a miserable failure.

The Russian people never have entirely accepted communism. I am reliably advised that during the 20-year period preceding World War II there were 30 sizable revolts, rebellions, and plots against the Kremlin dictatorship. They were staged by peasants, workers, and even by members of the Red army itself.

When Hitler's forces struck Russia, an important segment of the population greeted the Nazis as liberators. Four million Russian officers and soldiers are reported to have surrendered. Eight hundred thousand troops joined the Nazi forces. Russian General Vlassov set up three Russian divisions to fight Stalin. But Hitler, with his race supremacy complex, looked upon the Russians as inferior. He wanted only the rich Ukraine land, not the people. Confident of victory, he slaughtered the population and the forces which had surrendered to him.

Stalin, sensing his precarious position, somewhat relaxed his despotic control, appealed to the patriotism of the people, and promised postwar relief. The Russian people, faced by an invader whose atrocities exceeded those of Stalin, rallied to the defense of their motherland and fought history's greatest defensive battle.

After the war, hundreds of thousands of Russian nationals refused to return to Russia. They resisted by all possible means, including suicide. Compelled by a wartime agreement to assist in forced repatriation, we played a part in this affair which is a dark chapter in the American record. Purges in the Red army subdued the military. Desertions were by the thousand.

Today conditions inside Russia are almost unbearable even for a population accustomed to harsh treatment. There are 15,000,000 Russian prisoners behind barbed wire. I have seen some of these prison camps on my two trans-Siberian trips. About 9,000,000 of these are male political prisoners between the ages of 18 and 58. They comprise 16 percent of the male population between these age limits. There is scarcely a family in Russia which has not lost a member to the barbed-wire prisons. It is evident that the Communist system carries within itself the seeds of self-destruction. The iron curtain is plain evidence the Kremlin does not trust the Russian people. It is afraid for them to have contact with the outside world, to know how other peoples live.

Stalin's problem of control is terrific. Of necessity, if he is to continue in power, he must subject his people to their own military occupation. He must transmute the hatred his people hold for the Kremlin into hatred for their alleged external enemy—the United States.

We should launch immediately a full-scale psychological campaign to drive a wedge between the Kremlin and the Russian people. Psychologically, the enslaved Russians are ripe for revolt. But they have neither the military equipment, nor the leadership and organization to implement their desires. Nevertheless, secret groups exist in Russia dedicated to the overthrow of the Kremlin and the establishment of a liberal government. At least one of these anti-Communist organizations penetrates the iron curtain regularly. It needs help—money, printing presses, paper, radio sending and receiving sets, small planes, small free balloons and various other aids to intensify and expand the underground activities. The cost in relation to military expenditures would be almost negligible.

The Red army, some reliable observers believe, is saturated with revolutionary ferment, and cannot be relied upon unless Russia is attacked. Yet, in spite of this situation, which might be strengthened immeasurably by a psychological campaign by the United States, our steps to exploit this positive vulnerability are ineffective. The Voice of America, even if increased as contemplated, is a mere whisper. The State Department must always be diplomatic. This precludes success in Russia; for to be effective the psychological campaign must be aimed at the eventual overthrow of the Kremlin. This cannot be achieved merely by radio broadcasts into Russia. It will require the individual initiative of those behind the iron curtain and the integration of their individual efforts into mass action.

ENEMIES WITHIN MENACE THE KREMLIN

No border so vast as that of Russia, and touched in so many places by unhappy vassal states, can be guarded against all penetration. Peasants and others who pass for peasants can move in and out at night. There is bound to be talk between those on one side and those on the other. Our messages can be transmitted by ardent anti-Communist Russians who know just the right word to attract somebody, just the right touch to give verisimilitude to leaflets that might be dropped from balloons, or small Russian-piloted planes. We in our American towns, would know at once whether a message that came to us showed intimate knowledge of our town and our surroundings. Russian fugitives from the brutality of the Kremlin have friends back where they fled from, who will pass the truth around, convincingly.

We have the best story in the world to tell. The Kremlin feeds its listeners with distortions of American life, with exceptions to the normal. Our task is to give them the truth. The Reds have done alarmingly well with their lies. Certainly we should be able to do more with our truth. We have a better chance to weaken Russia than we have to strengthen western Europe militarily, at far less cost. By choosing the more practical way we could tip the balance of power heavily to our side.

In Japan our psychological campaign drove a wedge between the Emperor and his people on the one hand, and the militarists on the other. This campaign contributed in a marked degree to Japan's surrender. It was one of the reasons why the Japanese surrendered on the mainland without a fight. What worked against Japan can be made to work against the Kremlin. In this field I speak from experience, for it was my privilege to serve as Chief of Psychological Warfare on General MacArthur's staff while the war was on.

A full-scale campaign to project the truth through the iron curtain to the Russian people should be initiated immediately. We can and must create a situation of unrest in Russia which would make Stalin hesitate to go to war lest his home front turn actively against him. Our military leaders should demand the campaign.

It is obvious that we cannot hold the Red Army out of western Europe. As the prospect of combat with Russia closes down upon us, our early lesson in Korea makes crystal-clear what it means for us to engage vast land armies.

Russia could start some 150 to 200 divisions across Europe in a matter of weeks. Within 90 days she could probably have 500 divisions available. She could have a thousand divisions eventually if she needed them. In the latest war Russia put 11,000,000 troops into action before lend-lease aid was available. She now has some 20,000,000 trained ground troops.

Even if the mutual defense assistance program were completed—which it will not be for several years—the western world would be able to oppose the Russians with only 50 divisions. Such United States divisions as might possibly be available could scarcely reach Europe before the Red Army reached the Atlantic.

A comparison of Allied with Russian strength near the close of World War II is significant. On the western frontier the United States had 3 airborne, 15 armored, and 45 infantry divisions. Great Britain had 12, France 11, and Canada 5—a total of 91. This force, with complete domination of the air, was pushing the Nazis toward Berlin. On the other frontier, Stalin has 502 Red army divisions pushing the German Army westward across central Europe.

The 91 divisions represented the Allied peak strength in Europe for World War II. The 502 Red army divisions did not represent Russia's peak strength. She had already lost some 10,000,000 soldiers.

If the United States permits its forces to engage the Red army in Europe, our losses will be so appalling that the American people will recoil in horror and belatedly examine our leadership. This tragedy must not happen.

Our economic position is such that we can no longer afford any program which is not vital to our existence. Our debt is nearing the $300,000,000,000 mark. Our total taxes will climb to $50,000,000,000 annually. Since the end of the war we have spent $91,000,000,000 for national defense, and yet we have doubtful security. Our foreign aid has amounted to $33,000,000,000.

Since the Korean War began we have embarked upon a new and vast multi-billion-dollar spending program. If it encompasses everything now planned, including the increased military assistance program for Europe, the total spent will mount to some $50,000,000,000.

The European countries have already reached prewar economic levels. Therefore, we should terminate the Marshall plan without delay. The point 4 program, at this time, should not be started. And our domestic economy should be pared to the bone.

The military assistance program, for which we have already earmarked billions of dollars plus vast quantities of surplus equipment, also should be terminated immediately.

We should advise our allies that the equipment we have provided will enable them to preserve internal security and prevent civil war. We should advise them that we are not abandoning them, nor are we welshing on the North Atlantic mutual defense treaty. If war comes, we should propose to lend military assistance by striking Russia from the air, continuing this assault until Russia surrenders or is destroyed.

It is far from an acceptable solution to permit the Red army to occupy Europe. But there is no acceptable solution for our European allies if war comes—merely two sinister alternatives. The lesser of these is occupation. If the Europeans resist the Red army, they will be slaughtered.

To be sure, the manpower which our allies can provide for military service is impressive. In addition we could also recruit a formidable ground force of anti-Communist Russian and satellite DP's. We might decide to persuade the people of west Germany to form an army. But would Russia remain still and allow the creation of a force sufficiently formidable to hold the Red army out of Europe? And were we to move toward establishing sufficient United States air units in Europe to cover the force, Russia would be almost certain to strike before her enemy became really formidable.

The 1950 defense budget being spent by our European allies—less the negligible budgets of Luxemburg, Portugal, and Iceland—amounts to only $4,000,000,000 annually. There is the equivalent of two American divisions in Germany. France has three occupational divisions, but her best troops, 150,000 of them, are in Indochina, and her second-line troops are in North Africa. There are possibly 200,000 more assorted allied troops in Europe, but these cannot be said to be on a war footing.

A negligible allied air force is available to cover these meager ground forces.

After considerable pondering, I have reached the unhappy conclusion that we cannot depend on our allies in Europe for military assistance should war come. This is no way a reflection on the character of these people, nor on their valor or loyalty to us. It is merely recognizing a reality.

Russia probably has the atom bomb and 16,000 combat planes. Stalin will be in position, should war become imminent, to advise our allies to remain neutral and be spared attack. If they elect to give the United States bases in Europe or to cooperate with us in the war, he might try to take their population centers out by atomic assault the first 24 hours of the war. And he might very well succeed, because the Allies would not have sufficient air power in Europe at the outset to neutralize the Red air force. Thus, through no cowardice, the Allies may be driven into neutrality.

It would be interesting to know what Secretary of State Acheson would advise our allies to do under these circumstances. Presumably his policy would take us into war to save western Europe. But their destruction would defeat our war objective in Europe before the war was well under way.

Russia can be defeated—militarily—by the United States only through air assault. We can build an Air Force superior to the Red air force; we can gain mastery of the air over Russia; then we can force Russia into submission or destroy her. Air power can destroy Russia's war potential. From secret intelligence sources and by air reconnaissance we can learn the sites of her key industries. Our planes can fly the thousands of miles necessary to reach them, and return. We can take out Russia's steel industry, her oil supplies—the sinews and lifeblood of modern war. Air power can take out the bridges over her great rivers and paralyze her communications. With her railways out—there are practically no roads—Russia could not distribute food for the population.

These objectives—destruction of steel, oil, and communications facilities—are attainable. It is within our industrial capacity to build an Air Force to achieve them. We have the genius to build the best Air Force in the world. We have learned from the mistakes of the last war. If we eliminate all wasteful political expenditure, we can build such an Air Force within the limits of sound economy.

A decision to knock out Russia's war potential by air assault in no way should imply that only air power is necessary. We must continue to maintain a fleet which can control the seas. It is essential to our survival. So long as the fleet is in existence, Red forces—except relatively small airborne units—cannot invade the Western Hemisphere. But the fleet cannot deliver a knockout blow against Russia, for Russia cannot be blockaded.

The Army and Navy are important as formerly, but against Rusisa the weight of their roles has changed. They have become supporting arms for the Air Force. Against Russia and Army and Navy would seize, hold, and supply essential overseas bases from which air strikes may be unleashed against the heart of Russia.

REST SITES FOR OUR AIR BASES

We cannot hold bases in western Europe proper, except perhaps in Spain, but there are potential base sites which we can hold and from which any target in Russia could be destroyed, eventually, by our Air Force. Bases which can be held must have the incidental protection of mountains or deserts or bodies of water or combinations of these natural barriers.

The great Pyrenees Mountains barrier would make Spain a difficult operation for the Red Army. So, it would be well to tie Spain into our war strategy.

We may be compelled to consider Africa as a huge north-and-south approach to potential bases in Libya. These bases can be held. To take bases away from us in Libya would require an airborne invasion by the Red Army.

Such an operation is vulnerable to ground defense. In the defense of Crete, the British—though eventually overwhelmed—destroyed 80 percent of the German paratroopers.

In the Pacific we must hold the Aleutians, Japan, Okinawa, Formosa, the Philippines and possibly some lesser islands in the chain. If the Reds ever occupy this chain, or any great part of it, we will be denied the ocean approaches to Asia, and also bases from which to bomb important Red Asiatic centers. Possesison of these islands from Alaska to the Philippines is vital to our security.

From bases in Africa and in the Orient our long-range bombers can strike any target in Eurasia. The effectiveness of the Red air force interceptors is an unknown factor. Our newest bombers, refueled in flight, may be fast enough to evade interception, especially at night or in bad weather. But the chances are, if war comes we shall have to win the battle of the air over Russia first. This will require a long and costly advance of air bases in areas where natural barriers preclude a major engagement with the Red Army.

Our Air Force faces another assignment of magnitude. For the first time since 1812 our population centers will be endangered by a foreign power, if war with Russia comes. Fighter protection must be provided not only for our cities but for entire industrial areas; and the Air Force must help defend Alaska. It is all a vast and costly undertaking.

PROBLEMS OF WORLD POLICING

But war with Rusia is not the only threat to us. Our war in Korea could be merely the beginning of a series of critical disturbances. We are committed to lend assistance to certain peoples who oppose the spread of totalitarianism. Have we the means to do this?

Korea already has provided the answer. We simply have not the combat units, the manpower, nor the proper transport to police the world. Nor have we the wealth.

The forces we must create to deter Russia from waging war are not suitable for police action, nor can they be committed deeply, lest the real war be kindled.

To handle probable emergencies a United Nations task force should be tailor-made to meet any problem which might arise in Formosa, Japan, and the Philippines and possibly other areas in the Far East vital to the success of our cause. The force should be strong in manpower, equipped with small arms, and supported by medium bombers and fighters both land and sea-based. It should have tanks, cannon, and antitank weapons, all balanced to meet known conditions in given areas. Only a small fraction of the manpower can be recruited from the United States. Friendly Chinese, the Japanese, Filipinos and others in the Orient to whose protection we commit ourselves have ample volunteer manpower.

In the Middle East there should be created a second and larger United Nations task force, tailored to handle Communist uprisings in those troubled areas which we consider essential to the success of our cause. This Middle East task force could be trained in Libya. The manpower could be recruited from volunteers among displaced Russian nationals, and from German and Allied volunteers. The United States should furnish only a small unit. More than one-half million anti-Communist Russian displaced persons are political refugees in Europe, who will be destroyed if Stalin invades. They dare not return to Russia lest they be purged. Naturally they would be eager to join in what to them might be a crusade to liberate the enslaved Russian population.

These two task forces, with certain elements airborne, would be trouble shooters to quench insurrection and civil war in the Orient and Middle East—in areas which we consider vital to our security. In selecting these vital areas care must be taken not to place ourselves in the role of underwriting European colonial imperialism. Already Communist propaganda is effectively appealing to all Asia by branding us as imperialists.

These selected areas which are capable of being defended must be determined at once. The military should then be instructed to proceed with plans to defend them. If they can't be defended, as is clearly the case in Europe, the military must speak frankly and openly—and fearlessly.

The military preparation for the defense of these areas must be separate and distinct from the military force which we must have to deter Russia from war, and to strike her if war is forced upon us.

Were we to build without delay the best air force in the world and create United Nations task forces for the Far East and the Middle East, danger of war with Russia would be far less than now. On the other hand, if we continue to dissipate our means and follow present piecemeal, fuzzy policies, war is inevitable

OUR TWO MOST POTENT WEAPONS

Total mobilization, universal military training, invocation of a full-scale draft and other related measures will not bluff Stalin. He fears neither our mobilization nor our manpower. He fears and respects only our air power and our power to project the truth through the iron curtain. Yet, we have continued not to build air supremacy, and we are neglecting an effective psychological campaign.

Because of our early reverses in Korea, the cry has already gone up: The airplane is merely an auxiliary weapon; jet planes are too fast for certain types of combat; we can win only with doughboys and more tanks than Stalin can build. The tendency among those charged with planning is to pull the Air Force down to the role of a supporting arm for land and sea forces. Congress seems in a mood to rubber-stamp the authorization for the President to spend vast sums at home and abroad, to move into total mobilization, to invoke a full-scale draft, to shape a vast army to handle local disturbances everywhere and to challenge the Red hordes of Asia as well as the Red army.

This would be precisely what Mr. Stalin wants. His own planners could not improve on the program. If we endeavor to handle local civil wars wherever they break out—as the President has indicated—we shall piecemeal our means and collapse our economy. If we accept combat with vast Red ground forces in Europe and Asia, our losses will mount into the millions and we shall fail.

Planning to keep the peace by force on a global scale is no amateur assignment. There was a time when rifles were our most effective weapon and military matters could be safely entrusted to the guidance of those without professional background. Today, however, with war the most complex phenomenon of our civilization, we continue to adhere to the political tradition of entrusting our national security to those with little or no military background. The President and State Department are making political commitments whose military implications are not only unsound but dangerous.

Of course, we have the Joint Chiefs of Staff to direct the complexities of war preparation, but their professional views have been subordinated to decisions of the White House and State Department. In spite of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the civilian leaders have taken us into one unsound military situation after another. And they are still doing it.

We should no longer allow this arrangement for global planning. To accept Stalin's challenge anywhere and everywhere that a Communist-inspired insurrection breaks out is playing into his hands. It makes us the victim of his cunning.

Stalin realizes far better than we that, if we build air supremacy, our air power can destroy his war potential. Consequently he has invented methods to get around this possibility. By creating ground combat wars about his vast periphery he proposes to bleed us white, while neutral Russia, free from air strikes, continues to produce munitions for her fighting satellites.

While our strength is thus being sapped, a creeping total mobilization program at home could spell disaster. The secret of American progress is free enterprise. Under it we have created abundance. Our liberty and individual freedom, our moral and spiritual aspirations all spring from this solid economic basis. Gradual total mobilization and war will destroy the abundance we have created, and with its destruction we shall lose our freedom.

OPPOSITION PARTY IS NEEDED

War hysteria is already revealing itself in the widespread demand that opposition to all Presidential measures be silenced as a patriotic duty. Nothing, not even defeat in battle, could harm us more. Unless a strong and challenging opposition party exists, the power of the executive branch becomes absolute. Then the administration thinks it has become infallible. When no one dares to oppose them, we are on the road to ruin.

The United States has only 6 percent of the world's population It is time we took stock of where we are drifting. Unless we do this and create a plan to lift ourselves out of the certain danger which we face in the immediate future, it will be too late to save ourselves.

In shaping our Constitution our forefathers rightly subordinated military authority to civil. They had had enough of military conscription and domination in England and on the Continent.

Today, however, we find the civil branch of our Government abusing its power. The military has been subordinated to the extent that our national security is imperiled Military leaders must be unshackled and permitted to express views freely on the military implications of our commitments.

If the Chief of Naval Operations was fired for expressing his views at a B–36 hearing before a congressional committee at which he had been promised immunity—what would happen to a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff who opposed Mr. Acheson in cooperating on defense proposals to Europe? Nevertheless, if we are to remain free, our military leaders, at the risk of their careers, must oppose measures which imperil our existence. In the final analysis it is the American people to whom they owe their loyalty.

We must have a dynamic strategic concept of how to survive. No longer can we afford to drift without sound, long-range planning and attainable objectives. No longer have we the resources to dole out to this ally or that former enemy. Our position is so precarious that every dollar and every soldier must be made to count. American economic and military aid to any friendly power must implement this over-all strategy. No longer do we dare squander our means for purposes which do not further this strategy.

We need a new dynamic strategy now. Its principal provisions should be:

1. Attainable political objectives backed by commensurate military might, including air supremacy and two United Nations task forces.

2. Improved intelligence agencies—the eyes of our defenses.

3. Assistance programs that further attainable objectives.

4. A sound domestic economy.

All this—and that other element that could be the most effective: Weakening the Kremlin dictatorship from within. This is our best chance to avoid war. It will hasten victory if war comes.

Army Dental Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER E. BREHM

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a new Army dental bill, the enactment of which, in my opinion, is of vital concern to the morale and efficiency of the Dental Corps. Naturally this increased efficiency will be reflected in service to the recipients of Army dental treatment.

I realize that it is rather late in the session to expect any committee action; however, I sincerely trust that the Members will read the following explanation of the bill, and that quick, speedy, and favorable action may be taken shortly after the next Congress convenes.

EXPLANATION OF NEW ARMY DENTAL BILL

Section (1) amends the Army Organization Act of 1950 so as to designate the chief dental officer of the Army as "Chief of the Dental Corps." It makes him responsible to the Surgeon General and to the Secretary of the Army for making recommendations on all matters concerning the dental health of the Army.

There is presently no such title as Chief of the Dental Corps; however, the chief of corps title is held by the Army Nurse Corps—10 U. S. C. 165; the Medical Service Corps—10 U. S. C. 156 (b); and the Women's Medical Specialist Corps. The heads of the Veterinary and Medical Corps are not so designated.

This amendment is intended to fix the responsibility of the senior dental officer of the Army. It will not conflict with the theory of Army administration as announced by former Secretary Gray in the hearings on the Army Organization Act (Committee Print 187, House Armed Services Committee, 81st Cong., p. 6023), where he says: "We would like to see that the Congress does not prescribe for officers who are subject to the responsibility of the Secretary, duties and functions which he cannot change."

Throughout this bill an attempt is made to place the direct responsibility for any action upon the Secretary of the Army, but to express the sense of the Congress, which is a lawful superior of the Secretary of the Army, that the Secretary shall take steps to insure certain effects within the Army Dental Service. In this respect it is similar to the Navy dental bill of 1945.

Section (2) of the bill amends section 307 of the Army Organization Act. The first subsection of section 307 is changed only to the extent that the present name Army Medical Service is changed to Army Health Service. The term "medical" is not sufficiently comprehensive to define the true meaning of the various health activities concentrated under the general jurisdiction of the Surgeon General of the Army. It is believed that the proposed name provides a more accurate denomination for this group of activities. The remainder of this subsection is new.

Subsection 307 (b) (I) requires the Secretary to fix the authorized strength of the Dental Corps at a number which will provide approximately two dental officers for each thousand personnel on active duty with the Army. The Officer Personnel Act of 1947—10 U. S. C. 506 (d)—provides that the Secretary of the Army shall determine the authorized active list of commissioned officers strength of each of the several corps of the Medical Department of the Regular Army. Section 307 (b) (I), as proposed in this bill, is consistent with the present law but is broader in its scope in that it fixes the ratio of dental officers in relation to active duty strength personnel instead of within the limits of authorized commissioned personnel. This ratio is consistent with the present policies of the Army.

Section 307 (b) (2) is entirely new. It attempts to solve the problem of providing an adequate number of trained dental assistants, hygienists and laboratory personnel for service with the Dental Corps. Since the Dental Corps consists exclusively of commissioned officers who are dentists, it would not be feasible to designate the additional personnel as members of that corps; however, it is believed that under the provisions of the bill sufficient numbers of necessary personnel, commissioned or enlisted, can be assigned for duty with dentists and that while so assigned they would be under the control of the Dental Corps. This section does not conflict with the Army policy of assigning personnel to duty by military occupational specialty number. This subsection is consistent with existing section 307 which provides that each corps of the medical service shall consist of regular Army officers appointed and commissioned therein and such other members of the Army as may be assigned thereto by the Secretary of the Army.

Section 307 (c) is derived from section 3 of the Navy dental law—5 U. S. C. 456 (c). It differs from the wording proposed in H. R. 3479, S. 1205, and S. 2380, but it is believed that the same effect will be accomplished and that it is desirable to have parallel wording for the various functions of the Dental Corps of the several services. The authority of the Secretary of the Army is not interfered with, but responsibility would be placed in the Chief of the Dental Corps to perform those functions which should inherently flow from his office and title.

Section 307 (d) is derived from Army Regulations 40-15 as promulgated on September 14, 1948, and which follows closely the sense of section (6) (c) of those regulations.

Section (3) is intended to insure that this act will extend to and cover the activities of Reserve officers of the Dental Corps when on active duty.

It is believed that this bill can be administered effectively by the Army without the necessity for substantial changes in its present organization; it will, however, give statutory backing to the organization of the dental services within the standard military framework, and will place proper emphasis upon the professional status of the dentists so that they will function within the Army with the same efficiency toward the health of the patient as does the civilian profession.

Honey Should Be Given Higher Support Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, believing that you will agree that the people should be kept informed on legislative measures passed in their benefit, I ask permission at this time to make a report to the beekeepers of my district.

When many people think of beekeepers, the first thing that comes to mind is honey. But I would like to remind my colleagues that honey is only a small part of the valuable contribution that honeybees make to the agricultural economy of the United States.

Far more important than the value of the honey is the part the bees play in pollinating many crops. Some crops are self-pollinating, but many others are incapable of pollinating themselves and require the activities of bees and other insects for the pollination that is necessary before fruit or seed can be produced.

It is estimated that about 50 important agricultural crops require insect pollination, and that bees are responsible for approximately 80 percent of the pollination activity. Among the crops that are dependent upon pollinating insects for full production of fruit or seed are apples, apricots, blackberries, cherries, cucumbers, grapes, muskmelons, peaches, strawberries, watermelons, alfalfa beans, cauliflower, and nearly all of our clovers.

In the past few years, the wild bees have disappeared to a great extent because of the destruction of their nesting places and the much more widespread general use of powerful insecticides. As a result, the average yield of alfalfa seed in the United States has decreased during the past 23 years from 3.59 bushels to 1.61 bushels per acre.

In many parts of the country, therefore, the hives of honeybees kept by farmers in the business of producing honey are almost the only solution to the problem of the necessary cross-pollination of our perennial legumes and other seed crops.

In order to have a bee population in the United States capable of doing the pollinating job, beekeepers must either receive direct payment for the pollination done by their bees or they must receive full and fair prices for the honey they have for sale, to make the operation of the hives profitable.

I have long favored adequate return for the beekeepers. When H. R. 29—providing price support—came to a vote in the House, I not only supported the bill myself but urged many of my colleagues to do the same.

Soon after the price-support measure passed the House, I received a message from C. S. McReynolds, president of the Minnesota Beekeepers' Association, from which the following quote is taken:

I wish to express my thanks and appreciation for the part you had in the passage of H. R. 29 to place honey in the price-support program. I will acquaint the beekeepers of the Ninth District with it.

I strongly favored this price support because it means recognition for the honey industry like that given to other agricultural commodities. Price support also brings to the honey industry for the first time a stabilization of the honey market.

I am in hearty agreement with the four resolutions recently passed by the Executive Committee of the American Beekeeping Federation. These resolutions are:

First. That the American Beekeeping Federation has as its major objective for 1950 the development of methods and means whereby the pollination services of the honey bees pay a greater part of the cost of beekeeping.

Second. That the Federation urgently request the United States Department of Agriculture to make available to the honey industry sufficient funds to move through both the industry diversion and export subsidy programs approximately 20,000,000 pounds of honey.

Third. That the Federation request State and Federal agencies to place new and increased emphasis on research and on the dissemination of information relative to the problems of the package bee and queen industry of the United States.

Fourth. That the Federation work in full and complete cooperation with the Production and Marketing Adminstration, Department of Agriculture, to assist in the establishment and functioning of a support program for honey that will be of benefit to both the Government and to the entire bee and honey industry.

A portion of a letter which I recently received from Glenn O. Jones, secretary-treasurer of the American Beekeeping Federation, with offices at Atlantic, Iowa, will be of special interest to beekeepers. It follows:

You may be sure the beekeepers appreciated the action of Congress in giving to honey the same recognition that is given to other important commodities. They were, however, a bit disappointed to have the USDA set a parity figure that was at least 1½ cents below any previously given and then to grant support at the very minimum of 60 percent of this new, and low, parity.

With world conditions as they are, we do not expect to ask further changes in the honey support program this year. It is, of course, entirely possible that the near future will see controls and ceilings that will affect us as an industry and that we will want to have a part in determining. In that case I know we can depend upon you for further good advice and assistance.

I am convinced that the decision of this Congress to help the honey industry will have a far-reaching effect upon the programs of soil conservation, soil fertility, and the retirement of cash-crop lands to grasses and legumes.

As the Congressman from the Ninth District of Minnesota, I want to assure the many beekeepers and honey producers of my fullest interest and cooperation in getting congressional attention to their situation, and in getting consideration of their problems. I am at their service at any time.

Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ZALES N. ECTON
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from a leading Montana newspaper, the Bozeman Daily Chronicle, making certain comments regarding communism, and containing some quotations from that great American whom we all remember with so much pride, the late Will Rogers.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Bozeman (Mont.) Daily Chronicle of September 10, 1950]

A LIFE WORK BASED ON COMPLAINT

Whenever he can get his mind off trout fishing, my friend Harry, who has the stool next to mine at the coffee counter, can usually nudge you on to a line of thought that opens up some interesting vistas.

The other day we got to talking about the delightful new autobiography of Will Rogers—the part where Will, writing from Moscow in 1926, is telling about how a Russian "is never as happy in his life as when he is miserable," and says:

"Communism to me is one-third practice and two-thirds explanation. * * * This guy Marx * * * could explain to you how you could save a million dollars, and he couldn't save enough for himself to eat on. * * * He never did a tap of work—only write propaganda * * * for the dissatisfied. The dissatisfied is the fellow who don't want to do any manual labor. He always wants to figure out where he and his friends can get something for nothing. * * * A Communist's whole life work is based on complaint. * * * When they are running everything themselves, why, that takes away their chief industry. They have nobody to blame it on. Even if he is satisfied with it, why, he is miserable because he has nothing to complain about. * * * You make one satisfied, and he is no longer a Communist."

Kicking that around for a while brought us to some tentative conclusions as to why the revolutionists who set up utopias never seem to get the hang of running them properly. The main reason for that, it seemed to us, is that if a man is smart enough to adapt himself successfully to any given set of conditions he never has much reason to become a revolutionist.

The man who has the intelligence and ability to make an economic system work tends to be conservative. He has what it takes to get along under any set of ground rules you lay down for him. No matter how much you push him around, he will come out sooner or later smelling like a rose. Since he is likely to be doing all right for himself under the existing rules, he seldom will see any compelling reason for changing them.

It is the man who isn't satisfied with the way he personally is doing in the current game who puts up the howl to redistribute the marbles and start over. And he might just as well sit tight and save his breath, for he doesn't have what it takes to hang onto his marbles under any other system, either.

This may be an odd way to look at things for a couple of fellows who, the same as everybody else, like to think of themselves as intelligent and progressive in their outlook. But that's the way it seemed to Harry and yours truly when we left it.

Of course, we were pretty well tanked up on coffee at the time and had no supporting data readily at hand. So the theory is not yet ready for distribution through the retail outlets.

But some day we're going to check it against the records and see how it stands up.

Need for Improved Radio Service for the Farm

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Improved Radio Service Needed," published in the May 1950 issue of Farm and Ranch.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPROVED RADIO SERVICE NEEDED

Our farm population has given only casual notice to Senate bill 491. But, if resolved into law, this bill would deprive them of much of the radio broadcasting service they now receive and would prevent badly needed improvement, by doing away with clear-channel stations, as such.

In the South there are vast regions where radio reception never has been consistently good. Wayne Coy, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, recently said, "This is a big country, and a lot of people live in it. Some twenty millions of those people never had adequate radio service." Chairman Coy's statement points up the most important unsolved problem of Federal regulation of broadcasting, namely, how to provide those millions in rural areas with service somewhere approaching that provided city listeners. Until this problem is solved, radio-set owners in most of the rural South must be content with continued unstable reception and limited program choice.

It is only proper, therefore, that we fight for the continuance of clear-channel stations which reach into many rural regions. The spokesman for these stations says: "There is only one effective way to remedy this defect. It is by retaining what are known as clear-channel stations and permitting them to increase their power so as to provide improved service."

Fur Farmers Deserve More Stable Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, in my congressional district in northwestern Minnesota there are many fur farmers. During the years that I have been in the Congress, I have had many contacts with these men, for they have naturally taken a great interest in legislation that would have direct bearing on the fur-farming industry. Therefore, as the Eighty first Congress nears adjournment, I desire permission to make a report to them as a group—a report similar to the report to the people made by the President on his western tour recently.

These fur farmers in my district make a business of growing fur-bearing animals in captivity. The furs produced on a commercial scale are mostly fox and mink. The fox and mink farms range in size from a few animals providing employment for only one person up to large organizations employing a dozen or more persons.

However, the great majority of these farms are small family-size enterprises on which the owner, with his family, does all the work. Many of these Minnesota people have pioneered the fur-farming industry.

Two conditions under the present Democratic administration have been of great detriment to the fur farmers. They are the 20 percent Federal excise tax and the unusual amount of foreign furs that have come into the United States since the end of the war.

As a result of these two factors, the Nation's efficient and industrious fur-farmers are producing only about 66,000 silver fox skins a year. This is only about one-fifth of the annual silver fox production prior to 1945. Valuable equipment used in silver fox farming is standing idle. Many men who have been engaged in this work have been required to turn to other employment.

Mink farmers are in just a little better position, due to the popularity of mink in recent years. But I must caution that even a very moderate decline in general prosperity, combined with the 20 percent tax, will force many of the mink farmers out of business.

It takes no great logic to figure out that this 20 percent tax is an unfair burden. Only a few industries have been singled out to pay this heavy sales tax while other industries no more essential than fur farming slide by tax-free.

For example, high-priced tailor-made clothing for both men and women, expensive hats, special box candies, and many other articles of a luxury nature escape excise taxes entirely.

The Democratic administration has been overlooking the fundamental principle of taxation in a democracy—that taxes should be levied with equality.

And while I am speaking in behalf of the fur farmers, let us not overlook the important subject of fur imports. While our industrious fur farmers are struggling to make an honest living in the true American way, the Democratic administration is tightening a stranglehold on them by permitting huge imports of furs from Soviet Russia. Much of these foreign furs come in free under trade agreements—there is no tariff on them at all. Such discrimination must end.

Statistics that I obtained just a few days ago from the United States Tariff Commission show that the total fur imports increased more than 94 percent between 1940 and 1945. This was an increase from $73,661,564 in 1940 to $143,474,260 in 1945. In the first 6 months of this year the total fur imports—with no tariff—were $46,400,000. Of this amount $11,118,000 came from the Soviet Union. Who is getting the better break here—the fur farmer in Minnesota or the one in Russia?

Of interest to fur farmers especially, in connection with my efforts to cooperate with the various organizations, are the following extracts from a letter I received under date of September 1 from David W. Henderson, member, executive committee, National Board of Fur Farm Organizations:

> Your letter of August 8 last was just opened since I have been out of town for some time. I am no longer active in the Mink Breeders Association of the United States, but am taking the liberty of forwarding your letter to Mr. Henry H. Tufford, of Minneapolis, who is very conversant with Minnesota affairs through his guidance of the Fur Farmers Cooperative Association.
> It is gratifying to know that you and other Members of the House and Senate have given some consideration to the plight of fur farmers, who, by and large represent a solid and considerable factor in the readjustment of agricultural by-products and surplus land and labor in our national economy.

In conclusion, I wish to remind the Minnesota fur farmers that if I am returned to Congress in January, I shall continue to fight for the repeal of these unfair taxes and I will work to prevent imports that are threatening the rumation of our fur industry.

I also want to advise the fur farmers of my district that they may secure from my Crookston office copies of booklets on Diseases of Fur Animals and Home Tanning of Leather and Small Fur Skins. Also available is a leaflet on Hygiene in Fox Farming. There is no charge for these publications.

On the Philippine Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the New York Times, on September 11, carried a very interesting and informative editorial on the economic and political conditions—and the dangers—existing in the Philippines. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON THE PHILIPPINE FRONT

It seems generally agreed that President Truman was right when he stated that a part of our Asiatic policy would be to strengthen the defenses of the Philippines. The immediate need, however, is not merely military. At the present time the Bell mission is concluding its survey of the economic needs of the Philippine Republic and will make corresponding recommendations. But the Philippine front is so critical that it may be wise for Congress to take some action even before the Bell report is formulated.

The big problem in the Philippines is short-range economic instability. The United States has put quite a bit of money into the archipelago since the Japanese surrender, but much of it has gone into consumer goods. Full-scale rehabilitation has not yet been brought about and the Government is operating in the red. One result has been the necessity for drastic import controls. Meanwhile, there has been so great a drain on monetary reserves that the stability of the currency is threatened.

There are at least two things that the United States can do, immediately, that will be of great assistance. First, we can create a currency stabilization fund for the Philippines that will remove all doubt about the position of the peso. There is ample precedent for such an action in the case of Mexico, and the Philippine need is greater. Second, Congress can adopt legislation now pending that will provide for the payment of approved war damage claims up to about 75 percent. The additional income for the Philippines, about a hundred million dollars, can be channeled directly into rehabilitation, and its fiscal as well as psychological effect should be salutary.

There is need for prompt action. The Philippine Government is in a shaky position, not because of any failure of the democratic process but because of an economic imbalance resulting from war, occupation, and the uncoordinated way in which American help has been given thus far. That trouble can be remedied if we will move quickly. The longer-range problems can certainly be solved through Philippine resources, Filipino skills and the sympathetic cooperation of the United States. But our democratic front in Asia is imperiled and we must move immediately to strengthen it.

Work of Subcommittee on Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSSELL B. LONG

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article dealing with the work of the Preparedness Subcommittee. I have been very much impressed by the work of this subcommittee, which I believe is doing much to see to it that our Nation is properly prepared for any eventualities we may have to face.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIVE TASK FORCES DELVING INTO DEFENSE COSTS—SENATE INVESTIGATORS TO SCAN DEALINGS WITH FOREIGN CARTELS

(By John G. Norris)

Five Senate task forces start this week on broad investigations into the American defense effort which will have ramifications in every part of the Nation and far parts of the globe.

One, it was disclosed yesterday, will probe into the effect foreign cartels have on the quantity we can get and price we must pay for scarce material required for the rearmament program, and what can be done about it where the monopolies are controlled by our allies.

They are being undertaken by the Senate preparedness subcommittee—a new congressional "watchdog" of our military program patterned closely after the old Truman War Investigating Committee.

As set up with a no politics, no headline-hunting procedure, the investigations promise to become a major element in the Nation's rearming plan.

DISCLOSED BY SENATOR JOHNSON

Here is the ambitious interrogation program of the preparedness subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee as disclosed yesterday by its chairman, Senator LYNDON D. JOHNSON (Democrat, Texas):

1. A probe into how the recent tripling of the price of natural rubber and other price advances of foreign-produced strategic and critical materials may affect our efforts to rearm ourselves and our allies. "Can ECA be made a two-way street to help remedy the situation?" they ask.

2. A careful survey as to whether we have enough steel capacity in the United States for probable future armament programs, plus domestic use, and if not, what must we do to meet it?

3. An on-the-spot probe of our Alaska defenses—recently described by General Eisenhower and others as perhaps our weakest military link. Senator LESTER HUNT (Democrat, Wyoming) yesterday was named chairman of the group's Alaskan problems. Other members are Senators LEVERETT SALTONSTALL (Republican, Massachusetts) and Senator WAYNE MORSE (Republican, Oregon). Col. Justice M. (Joe) Chambers of the Senate Armed Services Committee's professional staff, with an investigator, will go to Alaska late this month. The Senators will join them later.

CHECK ON ORDNANCE

4. An investigation into questions, particularly into how willing Ordnance has been to accept outside ideas plus its relations with the field and equipment boards of the using arms, as well as the Research and Development Board. Other sources indicated the probers would want to now why the new 3.5-inch bazooka and other new weapons were not in the hands of troops when the Korean War started.

JOHNSON will head this "task force" of the preparedness subcommittee, assisted by Senators ESTES KEFAUVER (Democrat, Tennessee) and STYLES BRIDGES (Republican, New Hampshire). Col. Mark Galusha, of the committee staff, will head the investigation.

5. A broad manpower study, with particular attention paid to "when, how, and what changes must be made in the Draft Act." The group also is charged with drafting a new universal military training bill by next January.

Senator JOHNSON has not yet named subcommittees or "task forces" to go into the manpower, critical-material, and steel studies, but work is getting under way on these probes.

Committee members, who already have made a study of the rubber situation, are concerned about world price changes in this and other scarce materials. They point out that rubber, nickel, tin, mercury, industrial diamonds, and other materials not produced in the United States but vital to our security come almost entirely from countries with which we are linked by defense p..cts and to most of which we are giving economic or military aid.

RIGIDLY CONTROLLED

In many cases, they state, the quantity produced and price is rigidly controlled by monopoly corporations of our allies. This affects not only our stock-piling program but also our armaments production for both ourselves and these same allies. Recent price changes could add many hundreds of millions of dollars to American spending.

Some Senators feel a government-to-government approach, tied in with ECA, might help in this field. While ECA has worked on this and brought in stockpile materials under the counterpart program, there is feeling that much more could be done.

For the present, the Johnson committee's small staff plans basic studies in the field of steel and critical materials, using information on file with Government agencies as far as possible. One element in the steel study which interests some of the Senators is whether the industry is too greatly concentrated from a security viewpoint, in case of heavy bombing raids.

There are no immediate plans to call in leaders of the steel industry for hearings on the adequacy of our present plants, though this is likely before the probe is complete.

Hearings on the Army ordnance investigation are expected to start next month. Preliminary work already is under way. The Alaskan study will include such questions as possible subversive elements in the labor movement there. Strikes have delayed some military construction. Housing and the progress on the radar net also are scheduled for close scrutiny.

The seven-man Senate subcommittee already has done yeoman work in its watchdog capacity. Named late in July by the Senate to maintain a "continuous watchfulness" over all defense matters, the group last week submitted its first report. It concerned rubber stockpiling and the disposal of surplus property.

While the report did not make page one—too often the sole objective of congressional investigating bodies—the Preparedness Subcommittee had the satisfaction of knowing that its efforts had:

(1) Helped in doubling the projected rate of synthetic rubber production in the United States, (2) stopped the sale of at least one, and perhaps four, synthetic rubber plants for conversion to other use which had been declared surplus before the Korean crisis and apparently forgotten by military planners; (3) ended the disposal of aircraft parts at one Air Force base where there was evidence that the United States Air Force was buying similar products elsewhere for many times the money; (4) put a bug in the ear in many a defense official, particularly in the Munitions Board, by their criticism of "business as usual" attitude and "siesta psychology" at the Pentagon.

Veterans on Capitol Hill who had watched the Truman committee and other investigating bodies liked the approach of the new Preparedness Committee. They noted that its chief counsel was a man with unusual experience in Government. He is a high-placed official from downtown on loan part-time to the group without pay—Donald C. Cook, Vice Chairman of the SEC.

Cook, a George Washington law graduate, who lives at 2800 Woodley Road, served in a similar capacity to the old House Naval Affairs Investigating Subcommittee during the war. The then Representative LYNDON JOHNSON was chairman of the group.

JOHNSON, a lanky, tireless Texan, one of the youngest of Senators, laid down these rules for his preparedness committee: (1) We will not hunt headlines; (2) politics must be left at the committee door; (3) we'll be blunt but not unfair; (4) we won't try to be Monday morning quarterbacks on battle-front strategy, but stick to defense problems at home.

Much of the success of the subcommittee's watchfulness program, Senators feel, will depend upon how the executive agencies receive their prodding and criticism. A defensive argumentativeness on large and small points can only lead to unnecessary committee crackdowns. A willingness to admit mistakes and correct them quickly, on the other hand, would speed its job.

Benefits for Old Folks and Pioneers Should Be Increased

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, following out a policy which has been established for many years past and which more recently was carried out by our President, I desire to make a report of my activities during the present term in Congress to the elderly people of my district.

I refer to the hardy pioneers, our "old folks" who, through years of faithful labor, have developed the fertile farmlands and the industries of northwest Minnesota. The scores of letters that come into my office come from these elderly people, clearly indicate that they are not spending their "twilight of life" just resting in the rocking chair—their letters show that most of them still have a keen interest in the current social, economic, and political problems of today. They are very disappointed in the failure to increase the Federal portion of old-age assistance.

In opening this report, I quote two brief paragraphs from letters that will be of special interest to the elderly people of my district. I think that these quotes clearly show that the problems of the aged are of a most definite interest to me:

> Accept my personal gratitude to you for your splendid cooperation in furthering the interests of our Townsend-plan bill * * * you are among those who have distinguished themselves as fair-minded and democratic citizens.
> DR. FRANCIS E. TOWNSEND,
> Founder and President, the Townsend Plan.

> Be sure that we appreciate the support you have given the Townsend program in the past and as usual we want to offer our wholehearted cooperation to the end that we may be able to develop for America a program of national mutual insurance which will take care of the needs of all the people.
> HERBERT F. HAREN,
> Director of Promotion, the Townsend Plan.

My interest in the problems that face the aged in our modern society dates back many years. One of my most specific statements on the subject was made in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD back in February 1946. I quote here my remarks that were printed then under the heading of "Aged entitled to pension—not a dole":

> Mr. Speaker, during these flush days when the present administration is willing and anxious to loan billions of dollars to most any nation in the world, we are continuing to ignore the older people of our own country who are existing on as little as $14 and $20 a month pension.
> Many people who are entitled to old-age assistance will not even apply for it for two major reasons: First, our State and Federal Government so grudgingly hand out a mere pittance in many instances that often it is obvious that pensions are in fact a dole and nothing more; and, secondly, in some States, including Minnesota, the State has laws called homestead liens which require persons applying for old-age assistance to execute a lien upon their property and give it to the State and Federal Government, with the view to wholly or partially diverting that property into the hands of the State and Federal Governments at a time of their death in payment for the pension.

A further reason is the hostile attitude of some of the employees of the program toward old people.

Five years ago, when our old folks were finding their assistance checks insufficient to meet the tide of rising prices, I introduced a bill for their benefit. This bill provided a 20-percent increase for the duration of the war in the amount of Federal contributions to the States for old-age assistance and in the amount of Federal old-age and survivors insurance benefits under the Social Security Act. The provisions of this bill have since been revised and included to a limited extent in later legislation.

During the present Congress, I have always given wholehearted support to all legislation that would improve conditions for our aged citizens. On two occasions I have signed petitions to take the Townsend legislation from the Ways and Means Committee and bring the measure to the floor of the House of Representatives. I have not only signed these petitions myself, but I have urged my colleagues in the Congress to do the same.

Although I realized that the social-security patch-up bill is inadequate to meet the needs of our people today, I supported the measure, for it is a step in the right direction. This bill will hike benefits to some on an average of 77½ percent. For example, the bill would raise old-age-insurance benefits from the present average of $26 to $45 a month. The maximum family benefit would be $150 rather than the present $85. Benefit payments will increase from the present $800,000,000 annually to $2,100,000,000—these go to workers now retired and to survivors of those who die.

However, more than 100,000,000 people will still be left unprotected by the improved social-security set-up. Even the increased benefits are inadequate at today's prices, and taxes to support the program will continue to hit hardest those who can least afford to pay. The bill fails to increase old-age-assistance benefits at all.

In addition to my activities in Washington in behalf of our aged people, I have on many occasions contacted my friends in the State legislature at St. Paul, urging passage of State legislation that would aid our old folks. This I did as an interested citizen of the State of Minnesota.

I hope that I have made it clear in this report that I fully realize that the Nation has the duty to lighten the burden of old age; that it is the human as well as the patriotic thing to do. I have not forgotten the debt owed these men and women whom we once cherished as healthy, productive, enterprising, valuable citizens. We must provide a just and fair expression of concern in a tangible way for our old folks. The right way is increased money payments to those receiving old-age assistance.

It is a shame that this Congress, controlled as it is by a large majority of Democrats, has not provided the necessary Federal program and appropriations so the needy and deserving old folks can receive a larger monthly payment. Prices and costs have risen and they need more now to pay for groceries, fuel, and other necessary things. The blame for the failure of favorable legislation for our pioneers, of course, rests squarely on the Democrats and their supporters and followers.

As for myself, I pledge to these good citizens my continued fight and full efforts in this and succeeding Congresses, if I am reelected, to secure larger old-age-assistance payments which they deserve.

Our Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. IRVING M. IVES

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a poem entitled "Our Flag," written by Albert Ralph Korn.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR FLAG

Raise to the waiting breeze our flag,
Unfurl it far and wide;
Let all who view that noble sight
Lift up their heads with pride.

We who abide beneath its fold
And worship our own God
Fear not the tyrant's burning lash,
Free on our sacred sod.

We are the favored of the earth,
The masters of our fate.
Take pause from life's unceasing round
Our flag to venerate.

Attempt by John Libed To Reenlist in the Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the United Press carried on September 12 a very interesting article by Mr. James Cunningham dealing with the problems of a young man, son of a United States Navy veteran, and himself a veteran of World War II, who is trying to reenlist in the United States Army to fight in Korea, but who is having his troubles in reaching a recruiting station. I ask unanimous consent to have this article printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, September 12.—You think you've got trouble with your draft board?

What about John Libed, with internationality involved? The United States Army reached all the way to Turkey to draft him in World War II. He served 2 years and got an honorable discharge.

Now, he is free, 25, and has been 3 years trying to join up again.

But after voyaging half way around the world—from Istanbul to Manila—to try, he still can't seem to get within a thousand miles of a United States recruiting station.

His problem is citizenship. Should he salute the Stars and Stripes, the Philippine or the Turkish flag? Until someone decides or lets him visit his father in this country, John can't answer reveille.

The father, a retired United States Navy veteran, lives in Puerto Rico. So the government of that United States Territory has taken a hand. Resident Commissioner ANTONIO FERNÓS-ISERN, Puerto Rico's representative, says, "It's the darndest snarl of internationality I ever saw. But I'm going to see if the State Department can't straighten it out."

According to affidavits from the boy and his father, John was born in Istanbul. His mother was Greek. His father, Eduardo, was a Filipino on duty with the United States Navy.

They were married in Turkey but Eduardo left with the fleet after John's birth. He became a United States citizen, retired from the Navy in 1945 and settled in San Juan.

That was the year the draft caught up with his son John's troubles started. One day in April 1945, the United States consul in Istanbul ordered him to a United States induction center in Heliopolis, Egypt.

He joined up there on April 17. After service in the United States Army's Middle East Command, he was transferred to Germany. At Bremerhaven he tried to straighten out his citizenship.

The Army was puzzled. And section 701 of the United States Nationality Act, they said, bars naturalization of foreign-born soldiers who were inducted on foreign soil.

So they sent John back to Turkey and discharged him on April 18, 1947. He tried to reenlist. No luck. The Army wasn't recruiting in Europe.

Finally, on January 20, 1949, according to John, the State Department advised him by memorandum to go to Manila. He couldn't come to the States. He had GI benefits coming. Rules prohibit entry of persons who may become public charges.

But in the Philippines, the Department advised, he could enlist in the Philippine Scouts—a United States Army component, dating from preindependence days. From there he might transfer to the stateside United States Army.

John invested his savings in a ticket. By March he was in Manila. But by then the United States had disbanded the Scouts.

The frustrated would-be GI was perplexed and broke. Red Cross Far East Field Directors Harold A. Kirk and Jerry Gutman arranged United States veterans' benefits to keep him in food and clothes.

But they told Puerto Rican government authorities in an open letter that the United States consulate in Manila cannot seem to get him to the States. Meanwhile, his VA entitlement was running out, and his dream of a United States uniform was turning into a globe-girdling nightmare, they said.

Resident Commissioner FERNÓS-ISERN has obtained an affidavit from the youth's father, Eduardo promises not to let John become an expense to the United States Government.

With this he hopes to persuade the State Department to tell its Manila consul to grant Libed a visa. The Red Cross representatives believed that, once here, he might be declared a United States citizen after all.

Community Builds Own Clinic and Gets Young Doctor by Cooperative Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, an example of community cooperation on the part of the business people, citizens, and farmers nearby, is well shown by the efforts and success of the community of Oklee, Minn., in building and providing for a community clinic and getting a new doctor for their community.

The story is well told in the special article written for the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune and published on April 2, 1950.

It follows:

FIVE YEARS WITHOUT DOCTOR, OKLEE BUILDS OWN CLINIC

OKLEE, MINN.—Residents of this community of 500-plus population no longer have to drive 25 miles to get their pills prescribed—or have their appendixes removed or tonsils X-rayed.

For the first time in more than 5 years they can get complete medical care from the town's own doctor rather than drive to Thief River Falls, Crookston, or Fosston.

This town had been without adequate medical services since Dr. W. B. Torgerson, the community's only doctor, became an invalid about 5 years ago, according to O. M. Sundrud, publisher of the Oklee Herald.

CAMPAIGN STARTED

About 2 years ago a campaign was started to persuade a doctor to come to the town. But to interest doctors it was found that modern facilities had to be provided.

No longer were doctors willing to operate on kitchen tables as a regular thing or diagnose cases without X-ray equipment.

A nonprofit group, called the Oklee Community Hospital Association, was formed and plans were drawn for a modern, well-equipped medical clinic. Actual construction of the $34,000 building was started last August.

In December, Dr. F. L. Behling moved here from Moorhead, Minn. He'll rent space in the clinic. Associated with him is Minnie Stoneouse, registered nurse who took training at Minneapolis General Hospital.

Space has been provided for a dentist's office and the association is now seeking a resident dentist for the town. Also, there is a heated ambulance garage and it is hoped that an ambulance to go in it can be acquired soon.

ORGANIZATIONS HELP

Some of the equipment in the building, besides the X-ray machine, are an electrocardiograph unit for graphical heart readings, basal metabolor for measuring oxygen consumption and a diathermy machine.

The local camp, Woodmen of the World, paid for furnishing the waiting room; the American Legion Auxiliary contributed; the Oklee Study Club furnished drapes. Other organizations contributed money and services.

Sundrud is president of the hospital association. Other officers are W. B. Seeger, vice president; Joe Dufault, secretary; A. D. Collette, treasurer, and Ole Sovde and K. R. Rolandson, directors.

Cargo for Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, with reference to shipments to Russia that aided Russian communism in its march on Manchuria, China, Korea, and the rest of the world, the stockpiling for such operations of communism was merrily going on in December 1947, when the President called a special session of Congress to stop communism, and I am including my remarks of December 10, 1947:

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, while the Congress is in special session, called by the President for the avowed purpose of keeping down communism in Europe and keeping down prices, the Secretary of Commerce is continuing to permit commodities of every kind and description to go through to Russia, making our own supply scarcer and the prices higher. On November 18, 1947, while the House was in special session at the call of the President demanding hundreds of millions of dollars to stop communism, the Russian-named ship U. S. S. R. steamship Mikhail Kutuzov, owned by the Government of the United States, being the former United States flag ship named Graham Taylor, left the Atlantic coast for Russia with electrical machinery and apparatus, car wheels, construction machinery, metallic working machinery, and other items, as follows:

Russian steamship "Mikhail Kutuzov"

(Cleared from New York Nov. 18, 1947, for Odessa)

Principal items of cargo and value:
Sisal rope	$43,439
Other nonmetallic minerals	19,952
Railway car wheels	59,000
Electrical machinery and apparatus	634,030
Engines, turbines, and parts	56,604
Construction and conveying machinery	82,534
Mining, well, and pumping machinery	267,162
Metalworking machinery	594,361
Other industrial machinery	656,971
Agricultural machinery and implements	307,555
Automobiles, parts, other vehicles and parts	230,550
Chemical specialties	6,942
Scientific and professional instruments, apparatus, and supplies	249,280
Commodities exported for relief or charity	1,954
Miscellaneous commodities	12,123
Lend-lease: Mining, well, and pumping machinery	11,475
UNRRA: Miscellaneous commodities	26,520
Total	3,269,452

And further on December 4, 1947, the Russian-named ship U. S. S. R. steamship Novorossisk owned by the Government of the United States and formerly the United States flag ship Edward Eggleston left Longview, Wash., on the Pacific coast for Russia, with cargo as follows:

Cargo laden on the U. S. S. R. steamship "Novorossisk" (former "Edward Eggleston") at Longview, Wash.

	Weight	Value
	Pounds
17 cases of spare parts for can-making machine	38,581	$154,096

1,000 pieces of sheet steel piling	3,669,559	153,201
1,082 pieces of tie rods, turnbuckles, and nuts	1,615,070	113,719
36 pieces of head cone crusher and spares for crushers fork	279,761	81,818
12 crates of jaw crushers and spares	56,570	16,105
5 boxes of crane steam locomotive, in bond from Canada	240,200	40,000
2 boxes of clamshell buckets, in bond from Canada	8,400	3,000
411 cases of complete dump trucks	2,002,385	228,178
16 cases of electrical testing equipment	3,690	8,740
18 pieces of flotation machine and electric motors and spares	55,740	15,990
2 boxes of filter presses and spares	1,364	615
11 boxes of spectrograph equipment	2,965	5,735
10 boxes of steel dredge pumps	71,650	19,299
20 spare parts for Marion model 840 machine	59,871	39,882
15 pieces of complete stone crusher	148,325	53,111
1 box of impellers for turbine pump	250	1,402
62 pieces of electric shovels and spares	110,694	33,111
20 boxes of steel vertical pumps and spares	124,340	32,239
2 boxes of deep-well turbine pump and spares	1,650	1,068
33 pieces of Symons standard cone crushers	184,195	81,280
10 packages of model 180 power shovel and parts	37,360	18,994
17 boxes of Slurry pumps and spares	39,572	13,564
95 pieces of ore-crusher parts	97,784	41,539

96 boxes of drill rods	100,586	30,676
16 cases of electrical equipment	3,478	10,129
2 cases of motor generator set and parts	2,180	2,329
8 cases of pumps, motor and parts	30,000	43,532

Cargo laden on the U. S. S. R. steamship "Novorossisk" (former "Edward Eggleston") at Longview, Wash.—Continued

	Weight	Value
	Pounds
2 boxes of spare parts for shovel	490	$171
18 pieces of crawler chain shovels	197,135	57,983
276 boxes of continuous drill rods	256,222	80,152
8 boxes of electric motors and switches	3,240	1,681
136 pieces of manganese steel feed and shell liners	116,403	17,356
8 cases of motor and drive assembly for Wemco Lohead conditioner spare parts and (2) deep welded steel tanks	14,690	2,786
89 packages of core drill rods	82,030	24,435
101 packages of marcy ball mill and spare parts	298,903	69,655
cases of pumps	10,000	14,000

Mr. Speaker, this is all in the face of nearly $300,000,000 worth of exports to U. S. S. R. during the period from June 1946 through September 1947, and further in addition to $563,000,000 exports in 1945, of which only $26,000,000 were commercial, the rest being gifts, of nearly $400,000,000 in 1946 of which $64,000,000 were commercial and the rest being gifts; and of nearly $114,000,000 from January 1947 through September 1947, of which $66,000,000 were commercial and the rest being gifts, Mr. Speaker, flaunting to the public such exports to Russia making our supply short and the prices high, and the President demanding special aid to stop communism, it is inconsistent with the call of the special session by the President to have his appointees go merrily on sending goods to Russia even in the ships owned and paid for by the taxpayers of the United States and ships Russia does not return.

Beer for Combat Troops

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following letter and article that I have received from Mrs. A. Politano, 2 Shawmit Place, Chelsea, Mass.:

CONGRESSMAN THOMAS J. LANE.

DEAR SIR: I'm writing in regard to the clipping you find in this envelope. I want you to think, after you read the piece, as a mother of a GI now serving in Korea. My son wrote me when he was leaving Japan that all the boys had a can of beer in their hand, why? I know why, because they were leaving for Korea and the band was playing Over There. The men all cried, yet that can of beer kept them up. No mother wants her son to be a drunk, but I'm sure one small can of beer means a lot to a tired fighting, weary GI. As a mother, not only for my son, but all sons, please don't stop that little can of beer. The Catholic chaplain had the right idea. It takes men like him to really know how the boys feel, as he is the man that really never leaves his duty to God of standing by every GI, and believe me, as a mother it isn't the easiest thing in this troubled world to take as my son, my only son and my livelihood is in Korea, and God only knows one little can of beer won't hurt him but will keep up his morale. Why should others with pockets that jingle get it.

How about the poor boy who doesn't have pockets that jingle? This is America the beautiful. America the free, let's help our boys. I'm sure a few cases of beer can be placed somewhere on some ships. Remember the fishermen who went fishing and their nets were with so few. The good Lord saw to it that the fish nets were blessed with many a fish for all the poor. Let a little space carry a small can of beer to my son, all sons of mothers, whose hearts ache with the troubled world, knowing somewhere in Korea a son is fighting for all our freedom, for our beautiful America.

MRS. POLITANO.

GI'S BLAST HALTING OF FREE BEER—SAY PUBLIC AT HOME FAILS TO REALIZE ITS PURPOSE

(By Stan Swinton)

SOMEWHERE IN KOREA, September 12.—A howl of protest from the American front lines today greeted the Army's ban of free beer for combat troops.

MAJOR FAVORS BAN

Combat men have been receiving a ration of one small tin of beer daily. The Army said it acted because of adverse public opinion in the United States.

Henceforth beer will be available only to soldiers with change jingling in their pockets or with comrades free to make shopping trips behind the lines.

An unofficial survey uncovered only one person in favor of the decision. Maj. J. R. Woodbridge of Lynchburg, Va., defended the order this way:

"I love beer as much as anyone. But that space in ships can be used for ammunition and essential war matériel."

Said Catholic Chaplain W. A. Ziegar of Harrisburg, Penn.:

"Everyone looked forward to that one can of beer. It was the great relaxation of the day up front. People at home must have misunderstood the situation if they asked that the ration be halted."

Congress Again Shows Greatest Foresight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GLENN R. DAVIS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House by a vote of 324 to 9, sent H. R. 9490, the Subversives Control Act of 1950, to conference. Obviously some of the 20 who voted against this measure 2 weeks ago, including one Member from my State, Wisconsin, have seen the error of their ways. I submit herewith a pertinent editorial by G. H. Koenig which appeared in the September 12 issue of the Waukesha Freeman:

CONGRESS AGAIN SHOWS GREATEST FORESIGHT

The administration's milk-toast bill to control subversives in this country was recently defeated by an overwhelming vote in the House of Representatives and in its place the House adopted the Wood bill which is an improved version of the former Mundt-Nixon measure. Only 20 House votes were registered against it. The single Wisconsin Congressman who opposed the harsher Communist-control measure was Representative BIEMILLER, of Milwaukee. On the heels of that action is the Senate's almost certain approval of one of the toughest control bills ever to see the light of day. Supporters of the McCarran antisubversive measure claim there will be no more than a dozen votes against it. Sentiment in both Houses of Congress is so in favor of clamping down on Communist activity in this country that strength is being mustered to pass the final draft over the President's veto, if that becomes necessary. President Truman has already served notice he will not sign the bill.

As in so many other instances having to do with the security of the Nation, Congress is ahead of the administration in security legislation. There is no reason for dealing softly with Communist forces in the United States while we battle them abroad with arms and ammunition and billions of our national wealth. That is the feeling of Congress which presently is so concerned with setting up the proper safeguards against subversive home-front activities. Congress on previous occasions has been months ahead of the President and his advisers on questions of national defense. We need only to go back to the consideration of the 70 Army air groups recommended by Congress to find that the White House allowed only 48. Congress had recommended Armed Forces personnel of 2,500,882, while the administration alowed only 1,507,000. Organized reserves would have been 1,977,000, had Congress been given its way, but the White House allowed only 522,000. Congress had recommended a super aircraft carrier, but the administration scrapped it entirely. Congress wished to enlarge stockpiling, but this was cut from 60 percent to 38 percent by the administration. Only 1 dollar in 7 since the war has been spent on arms of any kind. Only 1 dollar in 16 has gone for equipment other than aircraft.

These and other statistics become a part of the war in Korea, and the poor showing we are presently making in that theater, because of shortages in military supplies that are all too apparent. Since the outbreak of hostilities against Communist invaders the administration has failed to honestly face its lack of foresight in national defense and foreign policy. It has attempted in various ways to fix the blame upon the American people by inferring that the people dictated the extent to which the Nation could go in preparing to resist Communist aggression. But the record in this respect is very clear. It is found day after day in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where recommendations of a far-sighted Congress contrast vividly with objections from the Nation's Department of Defense. Criticism for the administration's short-sighted policy is being heaped upon the shoulders of Secretary of Defense Johnson, and various responsible groups and individuals have asked for his resignation. Events of the past few months have shown that Johnson had no adequate conception of the policy needed to match the foreign policy of this country. His Department failed to provide the kind of military strength Korea shows we need. Johnson's repeated assertions that his economies and budget cuttings resulted in a stronger defense are revealed as tragically false. But all the blame for our shortcomings cannot be put on Louis Johnson's doorstep. The blame here extends beyond him to his Commander in Chief and to the Secretary of State.

By its vote in both the lower and the upper Houses, Congress is again revealed as the agency of our National Government that wants to be sure about our security. It wants laws with teeth in them to deal with the Communist element in this country which is committed to the overthrow of representative government, while Communists in other parts of the world do other diabolical tasks assigned to them. But rather than receiving help and assistance in this job, Congress is again getting nothing but obstruction from the White House and from those Congressmen, like Mr. BIEMILLER, who makes up the liberal element in the United States.

What We Fight for

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the attached editorial which appeared in the New York Times, under date of August 20, entitled "What We Fight for."

WHAT WE FIGHT FOR

These are desperate days in Korea, days that try men's souls as well as rack their bodies. Americans at home should stop to think what they are asking their young sons and brothers to do, and why they are asking it. The more important question is the "Why," because men will fight and die gladly in a great cause if only they understand what they are fighting for. The reports from the front of the bitterness and bewilderment of our troops are too insistent and too obviously correct to be ignored. The young infantryman who said to a New York Times correspondent the other day: "Damned if I see why I'm fighting to save this hell hole," was giving expression to a tragic ignorance, but one for which his superiors and not he should be blamed.

Anyone who went through the World Wars knows the pitful inadequacy of the political indoctrination given to American troops. In the last war, for instance, it was shocking to find GI's slogging their way up the mountains of Italy month after month without any idea of what fascism or nazism really meant and what ideals they were defending. It is too easy to put these youngsters on the front lines where the age-old alternative of "kill or be killed," plus their native guts and pride, will lead them to fight hard and even heroically. It stands to reason that a soldier who thinks he is fighting for a "hell hole," or does not know what he is fighting for, is at a disadvantage, and is, incidentally, being criminally neglected.

The basic facts that every American soldier—and for that matter every civilian—must understand are relatively simple. The soldier in the Korean hills and the folks back home who pay higher taxes and accept controls are, to begin with, fighting for survival. Korea is only a single battle in a long war whose sphere of action is the greater part of the world. This is an acute phase of a struggle in which our liberty and our whole way of life are at stake. One filthy, bleary-eyed boy firing a bazooka at a Russian-built North Korean tank is defending the freedom of his country and everything that Americans hold dear as surely as if he were defending the shores of California or Virginia against Communist hordes. His enemy is only incidentally the fanatical misguided Korean who comes at him to kill. It is communism, totalitarianism, slavery, the police state, that is the true enemy.

He must, then, know what communism means and how it works in practice. He must be made to realize that there is no ground for compromise between Soviet communism and western democracy; they can both live at peace in the world only if the Communists stay on their side of the iron curtain. But communism is an aggressive, expanding force carrying a pseudo-religious message. It believes that the so-called bourgeois-capitalist-imperialist world seeks the destruction by war of communism but that in the inevitable final conflict, the Communists must win. It uses methods that have no regard for normal principles or scruples; the end justifies the means, and it is a wicked end. It is powerful in its appeal, especially to the backward Asian masses, but it is also powerful in its military strength.

This is the enemy that the young infantryman is fighting in his Korean "hellhole," and it is tragic that no one has made him realize the truth. It would be more tragic if we go on allowing our troops to be inducted and trained and sent to battle fronts in continuing ignorance of the real issues at stake. There is a powerful instinct in military leaders to think of war in purely military terms, and to forget that war is an instrument of politics. If that was true in the Napoleonic days of Clausewitz, how much more true is it today when the world could almost be expressed in ideological terms.

The simple fact today is that there is a price to be paid—a very great price. The soldier pays it in blood, others in other ways, but there is no escaping it. If everybody concerned knows what he is fighting for, the price will be paid gladly and bravely.

Malik's Departure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following interesting article from the Salem Evening News, Salem, Mass., Monday, August 28, 1950:

GOOD-BY, MR. MALIK

(By Col. Roland W. Estey)

Now that August is coming to a close, along with it comes the exit of Malik as president of the Security Council of the United Nations. Many people probably will give a sigh of relief for Mr. Malik will no longer be able to hold the floor and denounce the United States and the other progressive nations of our earth.

Malik's exit should bring with it an end of the verbal bombastic barrage based upon lies created in the minds of this man and his communistic associates of the Kremlin. To what extent he has been able to damage the peace programs and desires of many nations, and the world as a whole, will be known when history is written years hence.

The people of the United States have experienced many torrid political campaigns during which accusations have been tossed by candidate after candidate. Some campaign speeches have left voters in bewilderment but never in this Nation's history have our people been forced to listen to words packed solid with lies and statements so obviously filled with incorrect information.

Malik has presented to us the real Soviet communistic manner of working and thinking. He has opened the doors of the Kremlin and given us the first opportunity to learn of the real workings of this group. Stalin has forbidden us to look behind the iron curtain until recently. We now have had the curtain pulled aside and we can readily ascertain to what extent communism will proceed to gain and further its objectives.

I believe that, with Malik's departure from the presidency, he will travel an even greater distance—he will return to Moscow. Such a trip back would be a definite indication that his propaganda endeavors have not attained the success originally anticipated. This would designate that the Soviet Union has taken another defeat in their operation of the cold war. If he remains and no replacement from Moscow is delegated then we may assume that the Soviet's plans were successful. This would be a move of great importance and would designate the trend of future Soviet actions.

I am of the belief as previously stated, that Mr. Malik will return to the confines of the Soviet Union. How soon this will occur is problematic but it will occur. I doubt that we shall hear much of Malik hereafter. He will join Molotov, Vishinsky, Gromyko, and the others who have tried their particular specialty and have been found wanting in a successful operation.

Who shall replace the most qualified person for the world's organization of the Liars Club is a matter of conjecture. Whoever may arrive to pick up the threads of defeat will possess a new set of instructions fresh off the tables and desks of the Kremlin. He will be selected for his particular abilities along certain lines. It will be well to study the replacement and learn of his characteristics and training—this will designate the new moves of the Soviet Union as directed by Josef Stalin.

Malik has denounced the presence of the United States Seventh Fleet off Formosa. Naturally, this new attack emanates from Moscow. In these statements, as regards our Navy in the Pacific, may possibly be the key to future plans of the Kremlin. It indicates one of two things; these are: first, a frank admission that Malik's use of propaganda has failed to achieve the desired effectiveness; or secondly, it may point to the next aggressive move in the Soviet's plans for world domination.

Any invasion of Formosa seems rather remote at this time for the success of such an operation would have been at its highest peak during the early days of the Korean conflict. Sufficient time has elapsed for us to have strengthened our position in the Pacific with armament and manpower. This makes sense unless, of course, the United States has changed its policy as regards the protection of Formosa and the forces of Chiang Kai-shek. If we have changed (and I have no information on the subject) word of it may have leaked out. Information of this nature has a habit of slipping through fingers unintentionally.

At this writing, I am more apt to give consideration to the possibilities of Hong Kong or Burma in the Asiatic area and the possibilities of Iran, Berlin, or Greece in the European area. Any move on Iran would utilize the Soviet Red Army and this, in my belief, is the one type of aggression the Kremlin desires to avoid as it would incur the first definite activity of the Red Army. This has been deliberately avoided for an obvious reason—Stalin wants no war in which the Russian people are involved.

So good-by, Mr. Malik, and happy hunting in the coolish areas of the northern U. S. S. R. You have opened our eyes to a new type of man as well as to the basic plans of your bosses. You didn't realize it but you pushed aside the iron curtain.

Stockpiling Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Russian communism since the end of fighting in Europe on May 8, 1945, in its march to force communism on Manchuria, China, and Korea, as well as upon the rest of the world, has been helped by the State Department not getting back the nearly 100 merchant ships loaned to Russia, kept and still in possession for its use to force communism on Manchuria, China, and Korea. These ships since May 8, 1945, hauled hundreds of millions of dollars worth of potential war goods for the use of Russian communism to force its will on the rest of the world.

In addition for its stockpiling there has been delivered untold millions of dollars of gallons of gasoline to Russia in the Far East for its forcing of communism on Manchuria, China, and Korea.

The stockpiling of gasoline and fuel oil shows deliveries in 1945 of 5,000,000 barrels and in the first 6 months of 1946 730,000 thousand barrels most of which went in May and June while the gasoline shortage was on in the United States. And the Russian Communists used our Government-owned tankers and flying the Red flag to build up its supplies for the use of communizing Manchuria, China, and Korea.

And especially in the Far East between May 15, 1945, through September 6, 1945, with Russia only having a nominal declaration of war against Japan on August 8, 1945, there was delivered for the use of Russian communism in the Far East 41,380 long tons of railroad transportation equipment; 238,117 long tons of trucks and other vehicles; 249,202 long tons of metals; 57,788 long tons of chemicals and explosives; 406,166 long tons of petroleum products; 68,538 long tons of machinery and equipment; 258,201 long tons of food; and 117,207 long tons of other United States supplies.

During that period the United States delivered to Russian communism in Asia 1,436,599 long tons of the instruments and potential instruments of war while the British delivered 105,100 long tons to Russian communism.

And further which included during this period from May 15, 1945, to September 1945, the departure for the use of Russian communism in the Far East: 744 United States aircraft; 454 marine engines; 92 tanks; 89 field repair trucks; 2,426 jeeps; 42,599 trucks; 1,115 motorcycles; 1,119 tractors; 2,459 short tons of smokeless powder; 5,459 short tons of TNT; 316 steam locomotives; and 2 flat cars.

Mr. Speaker, this was all delivered to Russian communism in the Far East when the shooting was over in Europe and has been in possession and use of Russian Communists to force communism on Manchuria, all of China, and Korea.

Further, is it any little wonder with this great mass of material delivered to Russian communism after the end of hostilities in Europe let alone what was left over from other activities, that any help to Korea was less than lip service? Especially after we had built up Russian communism not only with its own goods but with that we delivered to Russian Communists after the war. In addition there was millions of dollars of UNRRA food, the representatives of this country seeing to it that the Communists got one-half the food and the Nationalists of China got the other half. By the delivery of trucks, tractors, food by the millions of dollars to Russian Communists in Asia, the executive side of the United States did more to force communism on Manchuria, China, and Korea than any other nation of the world exclusive of Russia.

Mr. Speaker, here is the stockpiling of Russian communism by dollars from May 15, 1945, down through June 1950 that was brought about by the executive branch of our country.

Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder after this stockpiling that Russian communism took over Manchuria, China, Korea, and marched on into South Korea so that now we are forced to defend ourselves against the very monster of communism so well built up by appeasement and stockpiling from the United States?

Register and Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, compelling reasons for every citizen to register and vote are given in the following editorial from this week's issue of Labor, the national weekly newspaper of the railroad labor organizations.

The action on the part of all labor organizations to obtain full registration is well illustrated by a news story from the American Federation of Labor weekly news service.

Mr. Speaker, I include two articles in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

COLD FIGURES SHOW WHY YOU SHOULD REGISTER AND VOTE—CLOSE VOTES ON FOUR VITAL MEASURES REVEAL HAIRLINE BALANCE OF POWER IN CONGRESS

In last week's leading editorial Labor urged workers to register and vote in next November's elections—and thus change the hairline balance between progress and reaction in this Congress. The editorial pointed out that a handful of votes in Senate and House now swings the decision for or against the people on vitally important legislative measures.

Now let's look at the record and show, by recent and specific examples, what a narrow majority of reactionaries in Congress are getting away with because more workers did not register and vote in 1948.

The Knowland amendment: Sponsored by a rich man's son, Republican Senator KNOWLAND, of California, and backed by antiunion employers' organizations, this Social Security Act amendment squeezed through Congress a few days ago. It makes the unemployment insurance system a strikebreaking weapon, and may deny jobless benefits to thousands of workers in their hour of need.

The crucial vote on the Knowland amendment came on August 16, on a motion to send the social-security bill back to a committee to have the amendment stricken out. This motion lost by 188 to 185. A switch of only 2 votes would have killed the vicious Knowland amendment.

Food speculators: President Truman asked Congress to put into the war controls bill a provision restricting gamblers who boost the prices of foods and other commodities. This provision apparently passed the House.

Then Congressman MARTIN, of Massachusetts, GOP floor leader and former Speaker, got three Republican Congressmen to change their votes from "yes" to "no." So the anti-food gambling provision lost by a vote of 198 to 194. The switch of only three votes was enough to make the food gamblers richer and every worker's family poorer.

Edward A. Rumely: He heads the Committee for Constitutional Government, the biggest lobby and propaganda organization, which is out to cut taxes on the rich, destroy labor unions, and smear progressive men and measures. Rumely refused to tell the House Lobby Investigating Committee where he gets his big money. So the committee asked the House to recommend that he be found guilty of contempt of Congress.

This time the House took the people's side, but Rumely lost by a vote of only 183 to 178. If just five Congressmen had voted "no" instead of "yes," Rumely and his reactionary lobby-propaganda outfit would have won the day.

Excess-profits tax: Senator O'MAHONEY, progressive Wyoming Democrat, said Uncle Sam should draft dollars as well as men for the war in Korea. He proposed a tax on the fabulous excess profits of big corporations.

This proposal was shelved by a Senate vote of 42 to 36. A switch of only four votes would have put through the tax on the war gains of corporations, and lightened the tax burden workers and other plain people will now have to carry.

There you have it in cold turkey facts and figures. Four vital measures lost or won by margins so close that two to five votes, one way or the other, meant victory or defeat for the workers and the masses of the people.

You can change that situation. There's no doubt about it. If you and other workers—and particularly the members of your family—register and vote in November, there will no longer be a hairline balance in Congress.

LABOR SPURS DRIVE TO REGISTER VOTERS

WASHINGTON.—AFL unions in every State pushed a steady doorbell-ringing drive to register every possible voter for the November elections as final registration deadlines neared.

Rank and filers throughout the Nation were spurred on in their efforts by ringing pleas from AFL and Government leaders at huge Labor Day rallies, the biggest of which was held in Soldiers' Field, Chicago, by the Chicago Federation of Labor.

Every AFL union has been urged to wage an intensive registration campaign to October 1. The drive will get another boost from the sixty-ninth AFL convention opening in Houston, Tex., on September 18.

The drive to elect a new liberal Congress which will repeal the Taft-Hartley law was endorsed by almost every Labor Day speaker across the land.

The speakers pledged also full voluntary support for national defense, called for a halt in profiteering on the home front, and paid tribute to Samuel Gompers, founder and first president of the AFL, whose one hundredth birthday is being celebrated this year by the AFL.

Analysis of First-Quarter Reports, 1950—Lobbying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, an analysis of the quarterly reports filed under the Federal Lobbying Act for the first quarter of 1950 is now available. Two hundred and fifty-seven organizations reported spending close to $3,000,000 in the 3-month period to influence the passage or defeat of legislation, directly or indirectly. In addition, 953 agents filed reports for that quarter, listing more than $1,750,000 in salaries and expenses. The analysis follows:

FIGURES REFLECTING COMPLIANCE WITH THE FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING ACT FOR THE FIRST QUARTER, 1950

Registrations: 150 were filed during the quarter.

ORGANIZATION FILINGS

Number filed, 275; original fillings, 20; contributions, $6,625,393.74; expenditures, $2,568,495.77.

Number filed (by 257 organizations)[1]; contributions, [2] $4,527,018.62; expenditures [3] $280,588.65.

Total contributions, $11,152,412 36; total expenditures, $2,849,084 42.

NOTE.—A number of the reports state that the money received and expended was for all purposes.

FILINGS BY AGENTS

Number filed, 953; salary, $1,330,540 55; receipts, $411,620 49, expenditures, $157,612.54.

NOTE —A number of the reports state that the money received and expended was used for all purposes.

FILINGS ON OLD FORM C—FOURTH QUARTER 1949[4]

Number filed, [5] 59; salary, $103,427 95; receipts, $11,600.10; expenditures, $41,781.28.

The Russian Delegate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Chelsea Record, Chelsea, Mass., September 7, 1950:

MALIK, AMERICAN ASSET

Jacob Malik, the Russian Delegate to the Security Council, has one great merit. He has become the best showpiece that the United States has on the Council. By his arbitrary decisions as president for August and his savage attacks on all who did not accept as gospel every Russian falsehood, he has alienated everyone except the representatives of the satellite states. They have to say "Yes, sir" to Malik, or lose their careers, perhaps their lives. A number of states were not convinced, before the August sessions opened, that the Russians were as difficult as they have been painted. A month of listening to Malik has proved to them all that the United States was right about that point, at least.

It would be a mistake to blame Malik personally for his torrents of abuse. He is merely a phonograph, playing whatever record is given him. Any other Russian representative would do the same, or face recall. That fate is not out of the question for Malik, if his bosses should decide that, in his conduct of the Council presidency, he has been more clumsy than successful.

[1] Because of the change in the new reporting form, which was adopted this quarter, some organizations filed two forms—one on the old and one on the new form. If identical, the figures were shown for one form only; some organizations also filed for previous quarters.

[2] Reported for previous quarters. Of this amount, $4,480,155.87 was reported by the National Association of Manufacturers for the year 1949.

[3] Includes amounts for previous quarters, but not heretofore reported.

[4] Fourth-quarter filings not received until the first quarter 1950.

[5] Of this number, five were reported for previous quarter.

Our Last, Best Hope for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very fine article entitled "Our Last, Best Hope for Peace," by Hon. Bernard M. Baruch, which should be read by every American.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR LAST, BEST HOPE FOR PEACE—AMERICA'S 1945 MISTAKE HAS BECOME AMERICA'S 1950 PERIL

(When the last war ended, the United States was the mightiest arsenal of military power in all history. Instead of holding that power until the peace was won, we returned to "business as usual" The Soviets, on the other hand, built a war machine. Here's what we can do about it now.)

(By Bernard M. Baruch)

When the grim headlines of Russia's aggression in Korea leaped up at me, my first reaction was: "Is this it? Is a third world war coming? Or can we still prevent it?"

Pondering that question, my mind turned back to mid-October of 1938. I had just returned from Europe, and was reporting to President Roosevelt that England and France had knuckled under at Munich because they had nothing with which to fight. If war came, they would be virtually helpless. One hope was left. The United States had to arm in earnest.

The President stroked the velvet lapel of his smoking jacket "Why don't you say that some Thursday," he urged, "and I'll back it up at my Friday press conference?"

WE MADE THE SAME MISTAKE IN 1938

It was Wednesday then. The next day I was at the White House again. As I walked out, the reporters buzzed, "Any news?" I told them that if America were not to drift into the same tragic plight as England at Munich we had to get ready with a two-ocean Navy, a much bigger air force, and mechanized ground troops, develop closer economic and cultural relations with South America, and levy higher taxes to pay for it all.

At his press conference the next day the President did back up my preparedness plea. Others protested, "We aren't at war." The rearming I urged got sidetracked.

Had the United States armed in 1938, before Hitler broke loose, the Second World War might have been prevented. Certainly the struggle would have been shortened. Today, we face a similar crisis. Again, our last, best hope for preventing war is to mobilize now, all out. To dawdle is to risk losing that chance.

In recent weeks, there has been a tendency to belittle what needs to be done. By the time this article appears, let us hope the Korean fighting will have turned for the better. A let-up in Korea must not produce a let-down at home. Victory there will not lessen the need for all out preparedness.

The crisis is not Korea alone The whole world is gripped by the same cruel choice—"guns or butter," discomfort or defeat. That is the Soviet challenge—can a ruthless dictatorship exact a greater measure of sacrifice in preparation for war than can the free peoples in defense of peace?

So far, we are failing that challenge.

When the last war ended, the United States was the mightiest arsenal of military and productive power in all history. Instead of holding that power together until peace was won, we scuttled and ran We clamored to bring the boys home, cut taxes, lift controls. We dumped huge quantities of ammunition.

Russia emerged from the war with much of her territory laid waste, millions of her people homeless. Yet, the Soviets continued to put military power ahead of improving living standards. As late as 3 days before the Korean outbreak, it was contended in Washington that the United States "could not afford" a 70-group air force. Yet, we were then devoting much less of our national income to defense than was Russia.

THE SOVIETS LEARNED A LESSON

The Soviets learned the lesson of the last war—we did not. Hitler's war taught the terrifying advantage any aggressor gains by mobilizing in advance of war. When Germany invaded Poland, according to the United States Strategic Bombing Survey, she had only 3,000 tanks, 1,000 operative bombers, 1,050 fighter planes Her factories were producing about 700 planes monthly. Still, because France and Britain had neglected to mobilize, Hitler swept over almost all of Europe, enslaving its peoples and resources, requiring an immensely mightier effort to dislodge him.

Today it is the Soviets, imitating Hitler, who have a jump in mobilization over the rest of the world. Recently Winston Churchill warned that the peril to the western democracies was even greater than in 1940, when Hitler came so close.

It is not a "one-alarm fire" in Korea we must grapple with. It is the three-alarm fire of having to catch up with the jump in rearmament Russia now holds.

Will the Soviets feel they cannot let North Korea be defeated or lose face before all their satellites? Sooner or later we must expect an effort to reunite Germany. The Soviets may attempt to overrun not only west Germany, but all Europe. Or, they may contrive to capture Germany in the Korean manner, using their Polish and Czech satellites.

To guard against these dangers, western Europe's defenses must be rebuilt speedily and our own arming stepped up so we can reach our allies before they can be overwhelmed.

Let me emphasize, I am making no predictions. I do know, though, that in weighing the risks and fruits of possible aggression, Soviet war planners must ask themselves one question—on how much time can Russia count before America can mobilize its enormous potential for war? In that time what paralyzing blows can be struck directly at the United States? In that time how much of the world can be overrun, acquiring the bases and the additional resources for assault on this country?

TO PRESERVE PEACE, WE MUST ACT QUICKLY

To influence the calculations of the Soviet general staff in favor of peace, we must narrow the time lag between our mobilized preparedness and that of the Soviets.

I do believe strongly we should make another effort at peaceful negotiation of the cold war. That is something I will return to later. To preserve any chance for peace, though, we and our allies must achieve a full measure of defense—double quick.

The Soviets may seek to involve us on other fronts. They may try to embroil us—also the British, French, and Dutch—in a general Asiatic war which will retard Europe's rearming while leaving the Soviets free to race their rearmament for all-out war in the future. However great the drain on our resources, we must not be distracted from pressing our own preparedness and the strengthening of Europe's defenses.

Nor is it America alone that must mobilize. America can furnish only limited aid to others and only to those nations willing to help themselves. Until the threat of a Soviet blitz is removed, we will have to supplement what Europe does with greater preparedness on our own.

WESTERN EUROPE CAN DEFEND ITSELF

Collectively, the nations of western Europe do have the resources for effective defense—a greater population and a larger production of steel, coal, and chemicals than Russia's. What is needed is to translate those resources into military readiness. I appreciate how harsh a time Europeans have had. But the Soviets, whose people endured even more, have chosen "guns" over "butter." That challenge cannot be ignored.

If we lose, we lose forever.

Ironically, America's sorest obstacles could grow out of the high living standards to which we are accustomed, our traditional fear of too much government.

What is needed for defense can be obtained only by cutting down less essential uses. Every additional dollar spent on defense or on aid abroad releases a dollar of additional spending power, with no increase in the production of things civilians can buy. Taxes are never high enough or soon enough to blot up this excess spending power. The $15,000,000,000 in additional defense appropriations so far requested is being matched by only $5,000,000,000 in additional taxes. As the defense program gains momentum inflationary pressures build up steadily.

PRIORITIES MUST BE FULLY EFFECTIVE

By invoking priorities—telling manufacturers "you must produce more of this and less of that"—the Government may get what it wants. But the more of the available supply withdrawn through priorities the more frantic becomes the bidding for what is left. By paying higher prices for defense materials, manufacturers compete with the Government's priority system.

The present defense program, I am told, will entail shifting an estimated 2,500,000 new workers into defense jobs, beyond those called to the foxholes. With wages uncontrolled, less essential industries can battle to keep their workers by paying higher wages than defense industries. There is much talk of making these less-essential industries release labor by limiting the materials they get. But this requires a fully effective system of priorities. It cannot be effective through partial mobilization.

There is nothing new in this. The experience of both world wars taught that when the Government enters the market with such enormous demands, requiring such quick priority, our economy must be brought under stable control at once. Instead of waiting for inflation to throw everything out of balance, a general ceiling should be put over the entire economy, over all prices, all wages, all rents, all other costs. Machinery is then set up to correct inequities and make orderly adjustments.

WE MUST TIGHTEN OUR BELTS, AND DO IT NOW, IF WE REALLY WANT PEACE

This general ceiling still is imperative. It should be invoked at once. With it should go high enough taxes to eliminate profiteering and to pay the full defense cost; a halt to unnecessary public and private spending, putting off all less essential works; control of all exports and imports; conservation of whatever is scarce, developing substitutes wherever possible; the power to ration scarce civilian essentials, if necessary. Above all, we must accept denials which winning the peace entails.

I believe all the great segments of our economy—labor, agriculture, business—are prepared to accept an over-all ceiling, provided all are treated equitably. How tragic if this opportunity is let slip, as in the last war, when the failure to control inflation added a hundred billions to the cost of the war and needlessly prolonged the conflict, swelling the casualties.

Since the Korean war began, the cost of many defense items has already increased almost 10 percent; some by 50 percent. At least a billion dollars has already been needlessly added to the price of defense and to the taxpayer's burden.

THE MAN WITH FIXED INCOME SUFFERS

The rises which have taken place will be used to justify wage increases this winter, which could force prices still higher. And what will happen to the millions with fixed or low incomes and with no pressure group to represent them? The inflation of the last 10 years has already cruelly slashed the real wages of teachers, firemen, policemen, civil servants, and others; as well as the real worth of all pensions and social-security payments, all insurance and savings. Colleges, hospitals, charitable institutions are being undermined by the shrinking value of endowment funds and rising operating costs.

The very fact that we face a struggle of such uncertain duration requires our damming back the rising inflationary waters now, lest they wash away all the savings of society.

Let us consider what mobilization really means. To many the word stirs fears of dire austerity. Yet at no time during the last war were those at home asked to undergo real privation. Much less will now be required for defense. Actually, mobilization, if properly conducted, minimizes the denials.

The object of mobilization is to organize the Nation so every farm and factory, every worker, every bit of material, every dollar can be put to fullest use. Defense needs can change overnight. We must be ready to meet every shift in demand with the least possible delay and the least necessary dislocation to civilians, with all sharing alike any temporary denials.

My political philosophy inclines me to oppose Government controls. But I do not believe in withholding from our Government the powers needed to achieve victory. The gravest threats to the preservation of the American system are defeat abroad and further inflation at home.

WHY PATTON DIDN'T GO ON TO BERLIN

Voluntary means or stop-gap controls will not suffice. To prevent a third world war, our rearming will have to be vastly increased, in a hurry. Moreover, requirements for defense extend far beyond direct military needs alone.

The last war, for example, taught us the penalties of being caught without an adequate stockpile of rubber. By developing synthetic rubber, a catastrophic breakdown of motor transportation was averted. However, the creation of synthetic rubber plants slowed the construction of escort vessels and aviation gasoline facilities. Invasion dates had to be postponed, prolonging the war. Gen. George Patton told me that had he been given enough gasoline in August 1944, he could have gone right on to Berlin.

Through our entire economy are numerous deficiencies which would drag at our military power if war comes—inadequate stockpiles of copper and zinc, freight cars, electric power, steel, and aluminum, the need to develop new sources for the chrome and manganese which came from Russia, the enormous needs of civilian defense. In New York City alone it has been proposed that $450,000,000 be spent to build bomb shelters. To be prepared for atomic warfare would require stockpiling immense quantities of medical supplies.

To plug these and other needs, materials, manpower, and other resources must be diverted from less essential uses. Unless started upon now, many of these deficiencies will remain perilous weaknesses for years to come.

ARE WE ALREADY AT WAR?

Here, we come to perhaps the grimmest fact of all. No one can really say we are not already at war. As Hitler showed, preparations for modern war extend over many years before actual shooting begins. Were the Soviets to plunge the world into all-out war at any time in the next 5 years, all of us would look back to 1950 and say, "We really were at war then, but didn't know it."

What should be done is to take inventory of our entire economy, asking what all-out war would require against what we now have? Wherever the gap is dangerously wide, prompt steps should be taken to narrow it. Universal military training should be enacted at once or selective service altered to produce the same pools of trained men. Since troops are more quickly mobilized than factories, we should hurry into production vast quantities of weapons, far beyond any present military need. Such stocks of munitions would be priceless should our forces be expanded abruptly, or in arming our allies, or in dealing with possible aggression anywhere. Even if these weapons are never used—as we would hope—the insurance would be worth the cost.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF A RUSSIAN ATTACK

Some will cry, "Won't Russia attack if we mobilize now?" That risk cannot be avoided. Having gained a headstart in rearming, the Soviets may strike before we and our allies can get ready. This risk will not be lessened by our refusing to get ready or through a creeping mobilization. Russia's rearming would race on, making it more difficult to overcome.

Surely, there is less likelihood of an attempted Soviet blitz of Europe in the next year or two, while our own atomic superiority is overwhelming, than a few years from now, when Russia's atomic development will be much further advanced.

Our neglects in the past leave no easy course. Let us do what must be done as quickly as possible. Having once achieved a balanced defense in relation to Russia, we could then relax somewhat, lifting controls where no longer needed, always keeping pace vis-à-vis the Soviets and the risks of war.

With armaments balanced, we can perhaps turn the productive energies of the world back into peaceful purposes. If all the resources which Russia, the United States and other nations would expend in another war were to be invested peacefully, poverty could soon be wiped out.

One final point: To win the race of readiness is not enough. We must also undertake a peace offensive, which will make clear to the whole world, including the Soviets, the specific terms on which we are prepared to come to a settlement. Working with the United Nations, we should spell out our proposals for lifting living standards everywhere, for defining aggression and how to end it, for total disarmament, for strengthening the United Nations. I appreciate the difficulties in drawing up such peace terms, the risk of seeming to appease the aggressor, the lack of faith in all agreements. But I believe it can be done.

LET US DEFINE OUR PEACE TERMS NOW

In dealing with Russia it will not do to freeze into an attitude of no terms but unconditional surrender. Were the Soviets to force war upon us, we would have to define our peace terms to the Russian people, drawing a line between Russia's legitimate aspirations and the aggressive aims of her leaders. Let us do that now, when it may still serve to prevent war.

To accomplish all this, we must abandon our habits of draft as usual. I have long urged revitalizing the National Security Council into a genuine general staff for peace. The whole of our peace waging should be reevaluated and a global strategy formulated. Some agency abroad should coordinate the efforts of the United Nations cooperating in common defense. At home, instead of scattering priority powers among several agencies, there should be one central all-embracing mobilizing agency.

"These are the times that try men's souls," wrote Thomas Paine when America was struggling to be born. "Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered. Heaven knows how to put a price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated."

Today we are being asked to place our own valuation on freedom, in the things we are ready to give up, the taxes we will pay, the self-disciplines we embrace—in how quickly we will do all this. Let us not haggle, clinging to petty profits and petty comforts. Should we price freedom too low, it will be taken from us.

BARUCH'S 7-POINT PLAN TO STOP WAR

1. Mobilize all-out, with one central agency in charge, until we balance Russia's rearming.

2. Stop inflation now, invoke a general ceiling on all prices, wages, rents and other costs. We should try to restore the economic balance which existed before the Korean emergency.

3 Raise taxes high enough to eliminate profiteering, pay all defense costs, and absorb excess spending power.

4 Speed the rebuilding of western Europe's defenses. To meet the threat of a third world war, we must help strengthen the free nations of Europe while staving off diversionary attacks elsewhere.

5. Create a general staff for peace. We must formulate a global strategy for peacewaging, with some agency abroad to coordinate efforts of the United Nations to create a common defense.

6. Enact universal military training, or change selective service to produce comparable pools of trained men. Hurry into production all the weapons we need - plus ample reserve stocks.

7. Define our peace terms to the Russian people, working through the United Nations. If we were forced into war, we and the other United Nations would have to state our peace aims. Let us do it now, while it may still serve to prevent war.

The Port of Boston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following very interesting and enlightening letter that I have received from the Honorable Nicholas Cefalo, Washington representative, Port of Boston Authority:

PORT OF BOSTON AUTHORITY,
Boston, September 11, 1950.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Boston is 1 of only 2 Atlantic coast ports to show an increase in foreign import and export tonnage handled in 1949 over that in 1948, it was disclosed in figures for consolidated tonnage for the 15 principal United States ports, from the United States Department of Commerce.

Boston, with 3,432,000 long tons in 1949, showed a 22 percent increase over its 1948 figure of 2,823,000 long tons. Philadelphia had an increase of 16 percent, Baltimore remained stable, while New York lost 16 percent, Norfolk 21 percent, and Newport News 28 percent. In the Gulf, New Orleans lost 20 percent.

The cooperation of the various agencies interested in the deep-water trade of the port of Boston and the efforts of the authority are beginning to have their effect. Our tabulations for 1950, as compiled thus far, indicate that we will show a further increase this year, despite a Nation-wide decline in export trade.

The authority urges all New England manufacturers and shippers to continue this cooperation with its promotion and solicitation program and again assures them of its readiness to assist them in routing their shipments through the port of Boston.

The Department of Commerce figures show that only five of the principal United States ports surveyed showed tonnage increases. In addition to Boston and Philadelphia these were Houston and Port Arthur on the Gulf and Los Angeles on the west coast.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

NICHOLAS CEFALO,
Port of Boston Authority,
Washington Representative.

Oil and Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, in the tremendous job which our country faces of preparing for whatever the future may hold it is heartening to remember that in some respects we have a decided superiority. One of these is available, developed petroleum, the lifeblood of industrial effort as well as of the war and defense mechanical equipment.

It is appropriate that the petroleum industry is making known the facts of its situation. The times call for whatever encouraging words may be justly spoken. We are daily confronted by much that is discouraging. Some of the articles we read tend to create the impression that we are lacking in almost every essential material.

Two of the industry's special efforts to tell the Nation about itself are scheduled for October. On the 3d the Independent Petroleum Association of America will devote 1 day of its annual meeting in St. Louis to the subject of "Preparedness—for Peace or War." Seven speakers will discuss the chain of industry functions from the drilling of a well to the supplying of the many products to civilian and military users. The authoritative spokesmen on this occasion will be Maj. B. A. Hardey, of Shreveport, past president of the independent association; J. Ed Warren, Midland, Tex., the present president; Frank M. Porter, president of the American Petroleum Institute; Gen. Ernest O. Thompson, member of the Texas Railroad Commission; Gov. Roy J. Turner, of Oklahoma, chairman of the Interstate Oil Compact Commission; Walter S. Hallahan, Pittsburgh, chairman of the National Petroleum Council; and Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney, of Wyoming.

Soon after this, Oil Progress Week, October 15–21, sponsored by the American Petroleum Institute, will be observed throughout the Nation. Here, again, the facts of the high degree of efficiency of the oil industry and the reasons underlying its ability to meet emergencies will be made known through various ways.

I feel a particular and intimate interest in these events. The modern oil industry began in the district which I represent. In 91 years it has met the demands, grown to a place second to none in the rank of essential industries. The reason for its splendid performance should be apparent to all. Individual initiative has been the principal factor. Men, free to exercise their own judgments, have found the oil and developed the processes and the methods of converting it to beneficial uses.

If anyone is looking for a convincing contrast between free enterprise and regimentation under a communistic or socialistic form of government, he can find it in the petroleum industry as it operates here and in some other countries. Demaree Bess, in the Saturday Evening Post of September 9, examines the war potential of Russia. The Russians, he said, are well aware of the necessity of an oil supply and since 1945 have made frantic efforts to increase their production. "But," he says, "that is the point of greatest weakness in the Soviet economy. Although the Soviet press boasts of newly discovered oil reserves in various parts of Russia, not one big new field has been developed since the war."

In the United States scarcely a day passes that a new field is not found. Some are small, some large. Together they make up a supply that is today in excess of our national requirements. It is the oil industry's prime objective to maintain a comfortable excess producing capacity. To do that many wells must be drilled. It is not to be assumed that the present fields and the present wells will be enough. Such an error of assumption was made back in 194' and the industry was put on such short rationing of steel and equipment that the excess-producing capacity was absorbed and gasoline and heating oil rationing was a cause of great disturbance. That can be avoided to large extent, no matter how great the military needs, provided the oil industry is given due recognition of its necessities and is untroubled by controls.

The industry is undertaking to make everyone aware of its present readiness to meet the demands which may come, and to give assurance that it can continue to do its traditionally splendid job if allowed to. It has today the greatest producing capacity in its history and it can increase it. That should be of much comfort to all who are worried about our ability to meet the emergency.

An Excess-Profits Tax Is Just and Needed Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. F. D. ROOSEVELT, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion it is our absolute duty to require an excess-profits tax before we send this bill any further. It is clear to all of us that we are only at the beginning of the sacrifices which our country will have to make in the months and the years ahead. There is every reason for establishing at the very outset that every part of our Nation shall be given a fair chance to make a proper contribution. We need this tax to help to establish that business, especially big business, will do its part. We need this tax for the revenue it will bring. We need this tax to discourage inflation.

For the benefit of those who are urging us to wait, I would like to submit some facts showing why we cannot wait. The reason is simple—excessive profits will not wait. War contracts are going out to companies which, unlike the situation in the 1939–41 period, are already running at top capacity. These corporations are already running at profit levels that are very high. The evidence is in the following table from the monthly letter of the National City Bank. To prevent a profit inflation we must act now and act firmly.

Formosa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Daily Evening Item, Lynn, Mass., September 1, 1950:

WHO OWNS FORMOSA?

All kinds of people have been telling America for months to get up on her haunches and holler back at Russia. We've been doing more of it lately, but far from enough.

Formosa is a good example. Russia and Red China scream that we're invading Chinese territory by having our Seventh Fleet patrol the waters between the island and the mainland.

We say we're not invading, but we allow the most important fact in the whole situation to get buried under a lot of confusing blather. The fact is this:

Under international law, Formosa doesn't belong to China at all—either to the Communist Government or to Chiang Kai-shek. In 1895, after the Sino-Japanese war, the island was ceded by a defeated China to Japan, which held it continuously until the end of World War II.

From the moment of Japan's surrender, Formosa became conquered enemy territory. Since it had been formally yielded by China in the 1895 treaty, it did not automatically revert to the control of China as would land gained during war by force of arms.

The final status of conquered enemy soil is settled only in peace treaties or by general international agreement. Since there is as yet no Japanese peace treaty and no step has been taken to have the United Nations handle the issue, Formosa legally still belongs to Japan. And Japan is a nation occupied by the victorious Allies.

There's one complication. In wartime conferences at Cairo and Yalta, the United States promised Chiang Kai-shek he could have Formosa back when Japan was licked. On the strength of that, he moved in without waiting for a peace treaty. But that doesn't alter the fact that his control has no real status under international law.

If we choose to modify or repudiate our pledge to Chiang, he may complain but he has no basis for appeal. By ordering our fleet to police the seas off Formosa, this is in effect exactly what we've done. As the chief occupying power in Japan, we could go further (though we don't intend to) and move land forces onto Formosa. We'd be infringing nobody's legal rights.

Those are the cold facts, the true answer to Moscow's frenzied shouts that we're violating Chinese "sovereignty" in Formosa. China has no sovereignty there. She hasn't had since 1895.

How Formosa shall be disposed of ultimately is something else. If resistance by Russia and Red China makes a fair peace treaty settlement impossible, the question should fall to the UN. Who knows? Formosa might even be given to the Formosans.

Graduates in County Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the attached article which appeared in the Daily Times published in Mamaroneck, N. Y., under date of July 13, 1950, entitled "In the Public Interest."

IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST

It is pleasing to read that the Westchester League of Women Voters has been invited to send trained representatives to sit in with college "intern" graduates who are being indoctrinated in county government.

These graduates are to study and work in various county departments and bureaus for a year and then to select the work of which they wish to make a career. Naturally, the women from the league who attend the same indoctrination courses will get a valuable insight into county affairs and the manner in which more than 600,000 citizens are governed.

Particularly valuable will be the experience to those representatives of the league who are to study closely the 1951 county budget. And it is noteworthy that on this committee of the league are women already gifted by experience for this civic task. There are, we note, not only former presidents of the league who have studied earlier county budgets, but a league member with cost-accounting experience, one who has herself been in business for 19 years, another who is an attorney, one who is a certified public accountant, and one with academic training in economics.

The help which the county taxpayers may receive from recommendations made by this group of alert, experienced women can well be invaluable.

"We Deeply Feel Honored"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SIDNEY R. YATES
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, the Walter resolution has again passed this House. In eliminating race as a barrier to naturalization, it remedies at long last the great wrong perpetrated by the Oriental Exclusion Act of 1924 against a fine group of our people, the Japanese.

The Reader's Digest for September 1950 contains an article which pays tribute to a Japanese family. It is typical, I believe, of most of the Japanese people.

Rated among the most valiant soldiers of the world, Japanese-Americans made a record for heroism and loyalty unexcelled in World War II Some of them—like Sgt. Ben Kuroki, who flew 58 bombing missions over Europe and Japan—became national heroes. Two Japanese-American units, the Four Hundred and Forty-second Regimental Combat Team and the One Hundredth Infantry Battalion, later merged with it, were among the most decorated in the history of the United States Army. Fighting in Italy and France, the Four Hundred and Forty-second more than lived up to its regimental motto, "Go for broke," Hawaiian idiom meaning "shoot the works." It won 10 unit and more than 5,000 individual awards. Six hundred and fifty of its Purple Hearts had to be delivered to the next of kin. No man in the Four Hundred and Forty-second ever deserted.

Americans of Japanese ancestry not only fought the enemy abroad but had to bear the brunt of prejudice at home. After Pearl Harbor, wild rumors of sabotage made them our most persecuted minority group. Exhaustive investigations by Army, Navy, and FBI showed that not one act of sabotage was committed in Hawaii—although citizens and residents of Japanese ancestry comprise a third of that Territory's population.

"WE DEEPLY FEEL HONORED"

This is a story about Frank Shigemura who had grown up in a set-apart section of Seattle. Frank had been attending the University of Washington. Then came Pearl Harbor. Suddenly—with other Japanese-Americans—he found himself being moved away from the west coast. At Carleton College in Northfield, Minn., he found friendship and got good grades.

That winter Frank was one of 60 boys in the Army's Enlisted Reserve Corps, and in March all 60 were shipped to Winona for officers' training. Three days later Frank was back. He alone had been rejected. "People might misunderstand," said an official in the training program.

Lindsey Blayney, dean of Carleton College, didn't like that at all.

Despite the blow to his hopes of serving his country, Frank said, "This is just something else that happens. Let me go ahead and study here."

Meanwhile, Dean Blayney wrote letter after letter to the Army, to selective-service officials. They weren't temperate letters, for the dean was in a mighty mood of protest. At the end of the semester, in June, he told Frank, "You've just been called up. Your notification is coming."

Pfc Shigemura, of the Four Hundred and Forty-second Regimental Combat Team, fought in Italy with the Thirty-fourth Division, along with other boys from Minnesota. Then, on October 20, 1944, he was killed in action.

Two years later the college decided to publish a booklet honoring Carleton men who had lost their lives in service. Each of the Gold Star parents received a letter: Did they have a photo? Could they tell anything more about their late son's deeds?

From Seattle came a picture, a sentence about Frank's Army service, and these words: "We deeply feel honored in having Frank's picture in a memorial booklet. Enclosed is a small amount in check. Please accept this donation for publishing the booklet."

From the envelope fluttered a hundred-dollar check.

Next year another letter: "I am very happy to learn of your proposed student-union building that will be dedicated to those who served and died. As parents of the late Pfc Frank M. Shigemura we feel greatly honored. Enclosed find check for $500. Please accept this small contribution."

Later Mr. Shigemura sent two more checks. His gifts totaled $1,200

A few months ago President Larry Gould and Alumni Director Warren Breckenridge, of Carleton, were visiting alumni groups. When they came to Seattle they wanted to invite Frank's parents to an alumni banquet.

In Seattle, in a not very modern apartment building, they inquired for Mr. Shigemura. They were told, "You'll find him at the Union Station. Everybody knows him."

There Breckenridge found Frank's father, who for 39 years had carried bags, touched his red cap and said thanks for the tip, sir. Thanks very much.

A Report to My Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, following my usual practice of submitting a report to my constituents of my activities during each Congress, I want to take this opportunity to review briefly some of the high lights of the Eighty-first Congress.

BUSY AND HECTIC SESSIONS

Both sessions of the Eighty-first Congress which convened in January 1949 were busy and hectic ones. From the standpoint of legislation, nearly 16,000 bills and resolutions were introduced in the Senate and House of Representatives. By comparison with previous Congresses, it represents about a 25 percent increase.

COMMITTEE WORK INCREASED 100 PERCENT

In addition to the tremendous volume of legislation, the committee work increased 100 percent which meant that literally for days I found myself behind closed doors receiving first-hand information on matters pertaining to military defenses, atomic energy, and domestic and international affairs.

12,000 PIECES OF MAIL RECEIVED IN 1 MONTH

I have never witnessed such a large volume of mail as I received during the Eighty-first Congress. During the month of March of this year over 12,000 pieces of first-class mail were received in my office from residents of this congressional district.

I can say without fear of contradiction that almost every piece of mail received at my office has been read personally by me. In the majority of cases I have developed the information in answering the writer.

My files are full of commendatory letters in appreciation for services rendered. I assure you that I appreciate these testimonials of my effort at all times to truly represent all the people of the congressional district.

OUR NATIONAL DEFENSE

During the Eighty-first Congress I found it necessary to take bold steps on various occasions by criticizing high officials of our Government and asking for investigations of ugly rumors and disturbing reports.

While at times I found myself standing alone and the victim of severe criticism, conditions today prove that I was absolutely correct.

I think that my position in regard to some of the national issues can best be explained by quoting two of the Nation's leading newspaper columnists—Ray Tucker and David Lawrence.

In a letter I received last month, Ray Tucker said:

Single-handedly your illuminating speech in May 1949 in which you asked for an investigation of the B-36 and related national defense problems, exposed our weaknesses on land, sea, and air.

David Lawrence in his Nation-wide newspaper column of August 15, 1950, said:

VAN ZANDT's courageous demand for an investigation of our national defense last year brought out a record of facts that tells the story of why there has been a failure in Korea.

"YES MAN" PSYCHOLOGY RUINED NATIONAL DEFENSE

My exposure of the "yes man" psychology, or in plain words, the gag on spokesmen for our Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps imposed by Executive order, revealed to the American people that their representatives in Congress were being denied the advice of our military leaders who by reason of their training and years of experience were qualified to tell Congress the type of Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps needed to provide this Nation with adequate security. Recent events support the fact that this "yes man" psychology was destructive of the best interests of our country.

DEFENSE APPROPRIATIONS IMPOUNDED

As a member of the House Committee on the Armed Services, I joined other members of that committee in our continued effort to provide for a 70-group Air Force.

In this connection, Congress appropriated $736,000,000 during the Eighty-first Congress, only to have the money impounded by the Secretary of Defense on orders of President Truman.

In addition, Congress appropriated many more millions of dollars earmarked for the purchase of tanks, bazookas, and other military equipment. This money was not spent, but was also ordered impounded by the President. Thus, in a period of 5 years, or since the end of World War II, we find that close to $1,800,000,000 appropriated by Congress for national defense was not spent. Of that amount, in the last 2 years $1,270,000,000 was not spent.

Time and time again I called to the attention of Congress that refusal to spend appropriations for national defense was nothing less than cutting the heart out of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps. I was told that the fat was being trimmed from national defense needs, but in truth the very sinews of our military defenses were being destroyed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

In the field of social legislation, I am proud of the part I played in bringing about liberalization of the Social Security Act. For 10 years I have been among a group of Congressmen who have militantly and consistently advocated increased benefits and a broader coverage under the Social Security Act. Many of the provisions of the new Social Security Act were contained in bills I introduced during the past 10 years to liberalize the provisions of existing law.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Having a firm belief that a universal pension with everybody contributing and participating, is the answer to the old-age problem, I continued my activities by serving on congressional steering committees on the Townsend plan and the American Pension Committee.

The part I played is best told by Dr. Francis E. Townsend, founder of the Townsend plan, and Mr. Russell Saville, of the American Pension Committee.

Dr. Townsend said on August 17, 1950:

Because you are one of the "101" immortals who voted for the Townsend bill in 1939 and because of your efforts to secure additional signers to Townsend discharge petition No. 15, I wish to commend you and I trust that the Eighty-second Congress will see you returned to Congress to support our program 100 percent.

Russell Saville of the American Pension Committee said on August 21, 1950:

Your great interest in the pension cause, running through your entire tenure in Congress and particularly during the present session, has not passed unnoticed. Your leadership at the head of the bipartisan Steering Committee of the House of Representatives working for a uniform Federal pension to take the place of old-age assistance marks a high-water mark in the history of the pension movement.

EFFORTS TO AMEND THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

In reviewing my work in the field of social legislation, I am greatly disappointed that the Eighty-first Congress did not approve my efforts to liberalize benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act.

I was one of 45 Members of Congress who introduced bills to liberalize the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act and to increase present benefits. Not one of the 47 Members of Congress received any consideration from the Democratic-controlled House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and as a result no action of any kind was taken on railroad retirement legislation. The responsibility for inaction rests entirely on the shoulders of Congressman ROBERT CROSSER, Democrat of Ohio, chairman of the Democratic-controlled House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

During the Eighty-first Congress, I pleaded, prodded, begged, and in fact used every parliamentary procedure at my command in an effort to have action taken on legislation to amend the Railroad Retirement Act. I was consistently refused such action by Chairman CROSSER who constantly explained that you cannot increase benefits without a corresponding increase in payroll taxes. Therefore, I yield to no one in the effort I put forth to amend the Railroad Retirement Act.

EFFORTS TO AID SMALL BUSINESS

Ever mindful of the fact that small business is the backbone of our economic life, I devoted much effort to aiding and assisting the businessmen of my congressional district and the Nation as a whole.

I take pardonable pride in the fact that I have on file scores of letters of commendation from small business enterprises in Blair, Centre, and Clearfield Counties expressing gratitude for my success in aiding them with their manifold problems.

From a national standpoint, Mr. Fred A. Virkus, chairman of the Conference of American Small Business Organizations, comprising 600,000 small business concerns, commended my efforts on June 19, 1950, in the following words:

You have the reputation of being one of the hardest working Members of Congress. I have found that you have voted according to what you considered the right thing to do and not according to pressure by lobbyists and special interest. * * * You have been one of the best friends the small-business men have had in Washington.

VETERANS AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

During the Eighty-first Congress I continued my efforts in behalf of the veterans of all wars and their dependents, an activity that I began after my discharge from the United States Navy in World War I.

My efforts were not alone in the field of veterans' legislation but I personally assisted hundreds of veterans and their dependents in obtaining benefits to which they were entitled.

During the latter part of 1949, I took time out from my congressional duties and served as State-wide chairman for the successful veterans' bonus campaign in Pennsylvania.

I can think of no better words of commendation for my efforts in behalf of veterans than the tribute paid me by Congressman JOHN RANKIN, Democrat, of Mississippi, and chairman of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, when he said in the House of Representatives on June 1, 1949 (p. 7253 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD):

There is no man in this House who has had more to do with veterans' legislation than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT]. He has been through two wars and knows what he is talking about.

LABOR MANAGEMENT

Believing that the welfare of all Americans demands that labor, industry, business, agriculture, and Government accept their duties and responsibilities. I favored the retention of the Taft-Hartley law because it protects the constitutional rights of the workingman and his employer.

In recognition of the fact that the Taft-Hartley law is not perfect, I supported efforts to improve the law by amending its provisions. While the House approved the amendments the Senate did not take action on the measure.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY MESS

As the result of amazing military ability, production and financial strength displayed in World War II, the United States emerged as undisputed world leader. We became the hope, the rallying point and the strength of the free peoples of the world. We could have enforced peace on the earth. We could have enlarged the territorial boundaries of freedom.

Instead our President and our State Department committed us clandestinely to the unmoral contract known as the Yalta agreement. Later, as if the betrayal of freedom of our friends at Yalta were not enough our officials supinely stepped into the Potsdam agreement bear-trap.

Directly and indirectly as the result of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements 600,000,000 people have lost what freedom they had and are now under the heel of the Russian Communist dictator. At the end of World War II the Russian Government controlled less than 200,000,000 people. Now it controls 800,000,000.

Instead of peace the blundering administration which controls the foreign policy of the United States, and so the destiny of all free people, has brought us again to war.

In voicing these harsh opinions of the manner in which the Truman administration has conducted the foreign policy of our country, I do so with considerable knowledge of the record and the facts. I am convinced that future written history of the past 5 years will more than bear out the comments I make here.

THE KOREAN CRISIS

Korea

Today our American boys are dying in the rice paddies of Korea because of the present administration's weak and vacillating foreign policy in the Far East and constant appeasement of the Russians which has resulted in the fall of Manchuria, China, and North Korea, and which threatens the entire continent as well as Japan and the Philippines. It must be remembered that the Congress itself has nothing to do with formulating the foreign policy of this country. That is entirely within the province of the President and the State Department.

I have favored a strong far-eastern policy, but Secretary Acheson told us in February 1949 it was the policy of the administration to "wait for the dust to settle" before deciding our next move in China. He also stated in January 1950, in his far-eastern report that—

> This defensive perimeter (where the United States will defend in the Far East) runs along the Aleutians to Japan and then goes to the Ryukyus.

In other words, that the United States was not interested in the defense of Korea, and that only Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines were in the perimeter of our defense set-up, thus announcing to the world that we would not intervene to halt Communist aggression in China, Formosa, or Korea, all three of which lie beyond that perimeter. To the Asiatic peoples, and unquestionably to the Soviet Union, Mr. Acheson's amazing declaration was an open invitation for the Chinese Communists to complete the conquest of China by taking Formosa and South Korea.

We were told by spokesmen of the present administration that South Korea could not be defended if attacked, and that it had no military or strategic value. So we withdrew our troops, leaving $56,000,000 worth of small arms and equipment, light jeeps, clothing, and food. The Republican members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee in an official document issued July 26, 1949, protested this withdrawal from Korea as occurring at the very instant when logic and common sense both demand no retreat from the realities of the situation.

It was on January 19, 1950, exactly 1 week after Mr. Acheson's statement about our perimeter of defense, that a majority of the House Republican Members joined 61 Democrats in rejecting the so-called Korean aid bill containing only economic assistance, with warning to the administration that without military aid to Korea and appropriate assistance to other critical areas in Asia, the proposed $150,000,000 in economic assistance would not only be useless, but it would enhance the prize dangled before the Communist aggressors by Secretary of State Acheson in January 1950 in his far-eastern report. Under the terms of the bill for economic aid, we would have sent fertilizer, seed, and money for building of roads, dams, and the construction of hydroelectric plant. It simply meant building up a greater and richer prize for the Communists to take over in Korea. What has actually happened in Korea today confirms our fears at that time. None of the economic aid, which was finally voted in February 1950 ever got there; and although $10,000,000 in military aid was voted for Korea, actually only the small amount of $200 worth of this aid ever got there, and that was Signal Corps wire. This accounts for the fact that when our boys were first sent to Korea they had only the small arms and equipment which had been left behind when our troops withdrew with which to fight back the heavy tanks and equipment with which the Russians had armed the North Koreans.

The present administration and the State Department have been running the show, and their first policy was as expressed by Owen Lattimore, State Department adviser for the Far East, who helped formulate the policy, "the thing to do is let her—Korea—fall but not let it look as though we pushed her." Neither the voting of military nor economic aid to Korea was consistent with such policy. On June 27, 1950, however, President Truman suddenly changed his mind, and our boys were ordered to fight in Korea. I regret that the mistakes of the present administration can now only be paid for in the high currency of blood and treasure.

A SOUND NATIONAL FARM POLICY

During the Eighty-first Congress I joined with agricultural leaders in Congress in advocating a sound, national farm policy for the country, the taxpayer, and the farmer.

In this connection, I worked arm in arm with my colleague and good friend Congressman HAROLD LOVRE, of South Dakota. For months he had conducted grass-roots conferences with better than 3,500 farmers and consumers in the Middle West. We agreed to sponsor jointly a farm bill that would incorporate the views of the family-sized farmer in the United States. As a result we introduced identical bills in Congress to provide a national agricultural policy to be carried out on a self-sustaining basis and to promote conservation and development of the Nation's soil resources.

Briefly the bill provides that farmers would choose their own organizations with elected county, State, and National committees directing the program from the farm level. The committees would work with the Secretary of Agriculture, who would determine the normal production needs ahead of planting time. This total would be divided among the farmers producing the particular product. They would receive 100 percent of parity for the produce marketed under these quotas.

If a farmer produced more than his quota and wanted to sell it, he could buy additional marketing quotas, paying enough for them to finance the disposal of the surplus through food stamps, exports, and new uses of the product. If the surplus did not cost the entire sum the balance would be returned through the local farm committees. Those who created the surpluses would thus stand the expense of disposing of them.

While we have received no action on the Lovre-Van Zandt bill, its provisions are being discussed in congressional and farm circles.

The sponsoring of the Lovre-Van Zandt bill is not my sole effort in behalf of the farmers of America. I have supported farm legislation and have been in constant contact with farm leaders in the State and Nation.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT

The recommendations of the Hoover Commission came before the Eighty-first Congress early in 1950, and legislation authorizing the President to prepare and submit reorganization plans was promptly passed. The President has submitted 35 reorganization plans, and all but 9 have been accepted by the Congress. The defeated plans were rejected mainly because they did not actually carry out the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. I have supported the purposes of the Hoover report, as I think it has gotten down to fundamentals and has been of definite assistance to the Congress in an effort to bring about improved and more economical ways of running the Government so that it will give better service at lower cost to all citizens. These reorganization plans have been in accord with my announced campaign slogan when I filed early this year for reelection to the Congress. I said then, and I say now, "I am for government that lives within its income and without most of yours." This means I am for national solvency which permits strong military defense and sound domestic progress but provides for paying all costs as we go and reduction of nondefense and nonessential Government expenditures. I take this position as to national finances as I believe financial preparedness is the source of all preparedness.

THE COAL AND RAILROAD INDUSTRIES

I continued my efforts during the Eighty-first Congress to convince the Congress that existing Government policies are a menace to the coal and railroad industries.

In my appearance before committees of both branches of Congress, I pointed out that the Government policy of subsidizing fuel substitutes such as hydropower projects as well as the importation of foreign oil, steel, and coal is playing havoc with the economy of this Nation and in particular with the economy of central Pennsylvania.

I called attention to the fact that since 1949, at least 177 coal mines have been abandoned or closed and nearly 18,000 soft-coal miners have lost their jobs.

I concluded by stating that if the Government wants to help the coal and railroad industries, let it cease the program of subsidizing hydro-power projects such as TVA and others. Let Congress shelve the St. Lawrence seaway project and let the administration restrict imports of foreign-mined coal, oil, and steel.

In addition to my appearances before congressional committees in behalf of the coal and railroad industries, I sponsored legislation providing for the creation of a joint congressional committee for the purpose of making a complete investigation and study of the available fuel reserves of the United States and the present and probable future rates of consumption and to formulate a national fuel policy to meet the needs of the United States in times of peace or war.

RECIPROCAL TRADE

Throughout the entire Eighty-first Congress I was one of the many Members of Congress who daily labored in an effort to convince the administration that the importation of cheaply manufactured foreign products was destroying the jobs of workmen in my congressional district.

Numerous times I addressed the Congress presenting factual information regarding conditions in the leather, gas meter, textile, pottery, light bulbs, coal, and fur industries.

I was in touch with President Truman, the State Department and the Committee on Reciprocity protesting the importation of foreign goods that are being dumped on the American market and which are menacing the jobs of American workmen. These foreign products are manufactured in many instances by slave labor behind the iron curtain.

I am sorry to report that the present Democratic administration has turned a deaf ear to my pleadings and if it were not for the Korean War and the need for expanded production, American workmen would be walking the streets as the result of reciprocal trade agreements now in effect.

MISCELLANEOUS

At all times during the Eighty-first Congress I was keenly interested in legislative proposals in the field of atomic energy, health, education, housing, postal service, taxes, economic controls, scientific research, and other subjects vitally affecting the American people.

It took many hours of night work to prepare myself for not only the debate on these measures, but to vote intelligently and in the best interest of those whom I represent.

ORCHIDS FOR CONGRESSMEN

In the October 14, 1949 issue of the Congressional Quarterly, an independent news feature organization, I had the honor of being named as 1 of the 10 outstanding Members of the Senate and House of Representatives during the Eighty-first Congress. Of the 10 selected out of the total membership of 531, I was the only Republican Member of the House of Representatives, the other Republican being Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH, of Maine.

My selection was based on my legislative activities in behalf of national defense, social security, and the veteran and his dependents.

NEW PROJECTS

During the Eighty-first Congress, in cooperation with groups in the Blair-Centre-Clearfield District, I was privileged to play a part in the successful effort to secure new projects for the Twenty-second Congressional District of Pennsylvania. These projects are as follows:

Garfield Thomas water tunnel, State College, Pa.: Over-all investment $1,775,000; number of employees 20; annual payroll $60,000.

United States Veterans' Administration hospital, Altoona, Pa.: Over-all investment $7,000,000; number of employees 250; annual payroll $800,000.

All-American Airways—air-mail and passenger service serving Blair Centre and Clearfield Counties: Number of employees 6; annual payroll $19,000.

Reopening of the Sylvania plant, Altoona, Pa.: Number of employees 500; annual payroll $1,500,000.

In addition to the above projects, I have worked with various business groups in bringing new industries to their communities.

PERSONAL SERVICES TO CONSTITUENTS

I want to mention the efforts I made to keep in touch with you and to keep you informed of happenings in Washington.

As you know, I reported weekly by radio, and I also wrote a column for daily and weekly newspapers.

Reprints from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of statements I made in Congress were mailed throughout the congressional district.

In addition, I conducted a public-opinion poll with the help of the newspapers in my congressional district. The poll was for the purpose of determining the sentiment on national issues.

On most of the week ends when free from congressional duties in Washington, I visited as many communities as possible in my congressional district and interviewed constituents in an effort to help them with their problems.

NEAR-PERFECT ATTENDANCE RECORD

During the Eighty-first Congress I maintained my near-perfect attendance record being included among a handful of Congressmen who have the enviable record of missing less than 6 percent of quorum and roll calls. It has been a difficult task to maintain such a fine attendance record because often committee assignments make it impossible to be on the floor at all times. During my entire congressional career I answered 96.1 percent of all quorum and roll calls.

CONCLUSION

As a member of the House Committee on the Armed Services and the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, together with my legislative and other duties, the Eighty-first Congress has proved a very busy one for me. I devoted all of my time and effort to the job of representing you in Congress. I considered all issues first from the standpoint of their effect on our Nation and on the American people as a whole.

I have tried to meet every issue fairly and squarely and at no time did I permit narrow, partisan views to influence or hinder me in doing what I considered my duty.

To many of you who have written letters of gratitude and encouragement, I am profoundly grateful. I assure you that I treasure your best wishes and shall always strive to justify your confidence and respect.

Senators—Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following two editorials which appeared in the Daily Times, published in Mamaroneck, N. Y., under date of August 17, entitled "Draft-Proof Senators" and "Roll-Back on Prices."

DRAFT-PROOF SENATORS

On Tuesday the United States Senate postponed until next Monday the vote on the economic mobilization bill, the legislation designed to put the Nation upon an all-out war footing.

The postponement was ordered when it was learned that a number of Democratic Senators wished to attend a party rally at Huntington, W. Va., on Friday, the day set for the vote on the bill.

"The success of the Democratic Party in the coming elections," explained Senator MATTHEW J. NEELY of West Virginia, "is more important to the United States and to the world in general than any other consideration."

Yes?

We wonder how many American soldiers will die between Friday and Monday?

And we wonder if the Senators would be amenable to postponements of this nature if they, themselves, were not exempt from the draft for armed service?

ROLL-BACK ON PRICES

When and if price controls are put into effect by the administration it will be necessary to pick a certain date. Prices will then be frozen as they were at that time.

There are two schools of thought as to what date will be selected for the roll-back. One group thinks the period chosen will be for the month prior to June 25, when the Korean war started. The other believes the time selected will be the 30-day period just prior to the time the controls are ordered.

Which is right will make a great deal of difference to the American consumer. We know what prices were in the period between May 25 and June 25 of this year. But what they will be a month hence, or 3 months, or a year, no one can tell.

For already labor unions, scenting wage controls, which must accompany price controls if we are to avoid black markets and shortages, are demanding higher wages. Strikes to secure these demands are becoming increasingly more frequent. This is, in effect, a race against time to jack up wages before controls are ordered. And every time a wage is raised prices must necessarily be increased since labor is the largest cost item in any commodity.

Therefore, in plain logic, the longer we wait before we have price and wage controls, the higher will go both prices and wages, and this means the heavier will be the blow to the family's pocketbook.

Think it over.

Appointment of General Marshall as Secretary of Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, we are faced with a critical situation in the midst of our war effort. It arises as a result, first, of inadequate preparation of our Military Establishment to meet the emergency with which we are now faced; second, because of what has been apparently a feud between the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense. This latter condition grew to such proportions, together with general dissatisfaction with the failure to properly arm the military, that the President has seen fit to accept the resignation of the Secretary of Defense. This course has evidently been adopted by the President to offset the growing indignation of our people. I am inclined to believe that the people would have been additionally pleased if Secretary of State Dean Acheson had take a similar course as the Secretary of Defense. The responsibility for our present unfortunate position rests upon the shoulders of each. The policy pursued in China and Korea by the State Department has had a part in bringing us to the unfortunate position in which we now find ourselves, and it should bear its fair share of the responsibility. It is plain, however, that it is the present intention of the administration to let the Secretary of Defense be the scapegoat, and, thereby hope that the resentment of the people will be sufficiently appeased not to demand the resignation of the Secretary of State. It remains to be seen whether the disposal of the matter in this manner can be successfully accomplished.

In view of the expressed intention of the President to appoint General Marshall in place of Secretary Johnson, the question is now raised as to the propriety of appointing a military man in the Office of Defense. It has been a long tradition in our country that only a civilian should occupy such an office. This has been due to a desire to prevent military rule being imposed upon a free people. Thus, a question of policy must be decided in passing upon the pending bill, to authorize the President to appoint General of the Army George C. Marshall to the office of Secretary of Defense.

The argument that is made against the pending bill, in most instances, has not been based upon any question of the personal fitness of General Marshall or upon any fear that he will set up an overwhelming military government, but upon the ground that it would violate the tradition of our country. While there may be some justification for holding to tradition, yet we cannot, in my opinion, overlook the advantages that would come to our national defense structure in this time of need by the appointment of a man with the ability and experience of General Marshall. He has had a long and distinguished career in the Army. The experience and knowledge he has gained during this service, and particularly as Commander in Chief of the Allied Armies in World War II, in my opinion, equip him as no other man with the knowledge and ability to build our military forces to that standard of strength that is so necessary in the dangerous times in which we are now living. Furthermore, he possesses the confidence of our people. This is a great asset. It gives him additional strength in the performance of the important task to which he has been called. These are days that call for strong men. General Marshall is a strong man. He can and will do the job expected of him. The Nation will feel safer with him at the helm of our Defense Department.

As a part of my remarks I include an editorial entitled "Nation Will Applaud Marshall Appointment," appearing in the Courier-Post Newspaper of Camden, N. J., issue of September 14, 1950. This editorial closely, forcibly, and logically sets forth the reasons that justify the passage of this bill, enabling the President to appoint General Marshall as Secretary of Defense. It reads as follows:

NATION WILL APPLAUD MARSHALL APPOINTMENT

President Truman's replacement of Defense Secretary Johnson by General Marshall should help restore unity within the Cabinet and the administration which has been a crying need in recent months.

Criticism and abuse has been heaped on Johnson both for things for which he was responsible and things for which he was not. Defense economies which now are seen to have been mistakes were hailed by press and public at the time he made them. Though he accepted the praise for them then and has shouldered the blame for them since, it is only reasonable to believe that the economy policy stemmed from the President himself and that Johnson's real share was only in executing it.

Johnson's departure should end the bitter feud between the Defense and State Departments which has done so much to destroy confidence in our foreign policies. Inferentially, it makes Secretary Acheson the winner in this feud and strengthens his position in the administration, since he and General Marshall see eye to eye on most points in the Far East. For this very reason, however, and because Marshall, as Secretary of State, had so much to do with formulating far-eastern policy and the decision to write off Chiang Kai-shek, the controversy over that policy will continue to rage. But now it will not rage within the administration itself.

Marshall's apointment violates a deep-rooted tradition in our Government that civilians, and not military men, should head our Military Establishment and direct its policies. It will even be necessary, apparently, to amend the laws in order to permit him to accept his new post.

But Marshall's case is exceptional. He has already served as head of the State Department and is universally regarded as more than a professional soldier. If the letter of the tradition is to be broken, no individual is less likely than Marshall to bring the professional soldier's attitude to the job, or to violate the spirit of the tradition.

The resignation of Johnson, and the Marshall appointment, come within a matter of days after Mr. Truman's flat assertion that both Johnson and Acheson would remain in the cabinet as long as he was President. This sweeping statement seemed a risky one to make at the time. Now that he has had to reverse himself on it so quickly, the Chief Executive may better realize his weakness for speaking without sufficient meditation, which is much more serious in a President than in a person of less exalted rank.

The Johnson resignation also is interesting because it was demanded by the Marine Corps League in a resolution passed after Mr. Truman's celebrated faux pas and apology to the Marines, though there is no evidence that this incident had anything to do with it.

General Marshall's appointment will end the persistent rumors that Mr. Truman was preparing to emulate Franklin D. Roosevelt's example of 1940 and bring Republicans into his cabinet for national-unity purposes as F. D. R. did with Secretaries Stimson and Knox.

Such a move might have been at the same time a stroke of political genius, as Roosevelt's undoubtedly was, but evidently Mr. Truman never had it in mind. Perhaps Marshall's appointment is the next thing to that of a Stimson and a Knox, since the general, while a Democrat, is not a politician in any sense of the word but replaces a man who always was very active politically.

General Marshall, in any event, has the confidence of the country and is one of our greatest living men. The Nation will feel safer with him at the helm of our Defense Department.

Senseless Government Waste Brings Added Burdens to Taxpayers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks I wish to include an article by the alert and able correspondent, Mr. Herman A. Lowe, which appeared in the September 10, 1950, issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

This article presents in a lucid manner additional examples of unexplainable and senseless Government waste which have been uncovered and brought to public attention by Delaware's distinguished senior Senator, JOHN J. WILLIAMS.

I strongly urge every Member to read this article. The facts disclosed by Senator WILLIAMS show conclusively, as Mr. Lowe has pointed out, that our Federal bureaucracy still refuses to do business with itself and as a result causes the taxpapers' pocketbook to take still another terrific beating.

The article by Mr. Lowe follows:

SENSELESS BUSINESS METHODS OF UNITED STATES BRING ADDED BURDENS TO TAXPAYERS

(By Herman A. Lowe)

WASHINGTON, September 9.—The Federal bureaucracy is fighting itself again. It won't let its right hand know what its left hand is doing. It refuses to do business with itself and, as usual, the result is a terrific beating for the taxpayers' pocketbook.

These latest examples of senseless Government waste have been uncovered by Delaware's Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS who, since his election nearly 4 years ago, has plugged away with tenacious single-mindedness at the job of disclosing such facts.

Here are some of the most recent "cuties" dug out by WILLIAMS:

On June 20, 1949, the War Assets Administration (a Government agency) leased 43 warehouses at Camp Crowder, Mo., to the V. M. Harris Grain Co., of Scott City, Kans. The annual rental for the 331,000 square feet of floor space was $16,700.

The Harris Co. promptly turned around and sublet the property to the Commodity Credit Corporation which, by the end of March 1950, had paid $138,658 in rent on the 43 warehouses to the Harris Grain Co. The places were used to store surplus grain which the Commodity Credit Corporation purchased and took off the market to support prices.

Then the CCC needed additional storage space for surplus grain it had bought in the area.

Did it go to the War Assets Administration and dicker for some more of the surplus buildings at Camp Crowder which was a Second World War Army training camp?

No, indeed. It waited until the Midwest Storage and Realty Co., of Kansas City, leased 163 of the buildings from WAA for an annual rental of $11,270. Then CCC sublet from Midwest Storage for $158,083—which figures out to about 1400 percent profit for the Kansas City company.

Why didn't the two Government agencies do business with each other directly? Senator WILLIAMS suspects there is more to this than meets the eye, but he is having trouble getting additional facts.

WILLIAMS told the Senate the other day that:

"The Department of Agriculture has been buying U. S. No. 1 potatoes from the farmers in North Carolina at an average cost of $1.68 per hundredweight, and then immediately reselling them to the same farmers for 1 cent a bag to be dumped as fertilizer or in the hog lots.

"At the same time the Armed Forces needed 23,500,000 pounds of potatoes. They paid $2.95 per hundredweight."

The Commodity Credit Corporation, subsidiary of the Agriculture Department, has bought up 192,000,000 pounds of surplus butter. Does the Army get any? No, the surplus butter is kept in caves and becomes rancid. The Army has been buying butter on the open market at approximately 61 cents a pound.

WILLIAMS is a quiet, slow-to-anger kind of guy. But he admits these things get him mad.

East of the Iron Curtain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "East of the Iron Curtain," from the Christian Science Monitor.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EAST OF THE IRON CURTAIN

(By Joseph C. Harsch)

WASHINGTON.—It soon will be a year since three members of an American family, all traveling on valid and duly visaed passports, disappeared, one by one, behind the iron curtain, without a trace.

The first to go was Noel Field, former official of the State Department, later director of the Unitarian Service Committee's medical and relief organization in Europe during the war. He disappeared in Prague on or about May 12, 1949.

Next to disappear was his brother Herman, a Cleveland architect, who had gone to Poland to study reconstruction architecture in Warsaw and was escorted by friends to the airport in Warsaw on August 22. He was not aboard the plane when it reached Prague, and there had been no intermediate stops of the plane.

Noel's wife, Herta, was waiting for Herman's plane at the Prague Airport on August 22. She reported Herman's nonarrival to his wife, who was waiting for him in London. Then she, too, disappeared. The last known trace of her is a letter to a friend in Switzerland dated August 26.

Since the disappearances, the State Department has written a number of notes to the Governments of Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary asking information about these three persons. The Poles have replied invariably that they are investigating. Their investigations have brought no information to our Government or to relatives of the three vanished Americans. The Hungarians claim that none of the three ever entered their country. The Czechs claim that Noel and Herta both left Czechoslovakia of their own volition, but are unable to say when or where they crossed the frontier.

The case is complicated in several ways. Noel Field was an intimate personal friend of Lawrence Duggan and also a fairly close acquaintance of Alger Hiss in the middle thirties when all three were employed in the State Department. The House Un-American Activities Committee has claimed to have evidence that Noel Field was once a Communist Party member.

During the war Noel Field was instrumental in rescuing many persons from the German gestapo. In that activity he developed contacts with the underground movement in both France and Germany. He was used by the American Office of Strategic Services as a channel for transmitting funds, leaflets, and instructions to the resistance and underground movements.

Herman Field also had extensive contacts with political refugees from eastern Europe. He had aided Czech refugees to escape after Munich to Poland, and later from Poland to the west.

The supposition is that Noel Field was seized by the secret police in Prague because he had personal contacts with a number of the Titoist variety of Communists, who at that time were beginning to be picked up throughout the satellite area in connection with the great 1949 purge of "deviationists." Since Noel Field was known to have been used by the OSS during the war, the iron curtain police may have suspected that he was a secret American intelligence agent attempting to establish contact with the anti-Stalinist underground. They may have seized the other two just to cover their tracks.

There are several reasons for a real effort to rescue these three Americans. One is that Noel Field probably could throw more light on the Duggan-Hiss cases than any other living person. Another is that failure to take strong measures probably will convince the Cominform secret police that the three probably were secret American agents and that, therefore, our Government considers them expendable. Another reason is that, whatever their past, they carried valid American passports.

If three American citizens bearing American passports can disappear without trace east of the curtain, then there is no security for any American in that part of the world.

If that is the case, the State Department should refuse passports for Americans to travel to those countries.

Either the mystery should be cleared up or Poland and Czechoslovakia should be declared unsafe. Hungary already has been declared unsafe over the Vogeler case. But at least we know where Mr. Vogeler is. The Hungarians have been penalized for the fraudulent and lawless arrest of one American, The Poles and Czechs have gone unpunished for a year for the total disappearance within their borders of three Americans.

SDA Bill of Rights for Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. D. ROOSEVELT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, in these times when the youth of America is once again being called upon to defend their birthright of liberty and safety, we are finding good reason for pride in their maturity and in their responsibility. As evidence of that, I should like to call to the attention of the House the Student Bill of Rights adopted by the Students for Democratic Action at their third annual convention at Swarthmore College.

SDA BILL OF RIGHTS FOR STUDENTS

Students for Democratic Action favors free exchange of ideas; our opposition to communism and fascism in no way qualifies this position. A spoon-fed educational program denies American students their faith in democracy and prepares them poorly for participation in the real world of competing ideas. We are certain that totalitarian dogmas can be defeated openly and fairly without the curtailment of the political liberties of their proponents. We oppose the censorship of books and other educational materials. Secrecy for scientific data is necessary only so far as it assures national security; otherwise it should be held to the strictest minimum.

FACULTY RIGHTS

We oppose legislative and college administrative efforts to suppress teachers' rights. To demand that a professor sign either a non-Communist oath or a loyalty pledge is to deprive him of his privileges as a citizen in a free society. College faculty members who are often especially qualified for civic leadership should in no way be denied the chance to take part in off-campus political affairs. The holding of any political or religious opinion should not in itself be considered evidence of incompetence to teach. Employment, rehiring, and tenure of faculty members should depend solely upon their qualifications to teach their particular subjects. Decisions regarding faculty tenure and the college curriculum are properly the province of the faculty, rather than of nonacademic elements which are often in control of college policy because of financial influence. Dismissal should result only after the accused is tried publicly by his faculty colleagues.

We urge the American Association of University Professors and the teachers' unions to redouble efforts to increase their membership and to defend more militantly the rights of their members when they are discharged for political affiliation or activity. Teachers should have the full right to strike, bargain collectively, and form unions.

We view with apprehension the increase of unwarranted restrictions placed by many college administrations and State legislatures upon the rights of students to organize groups, to hold off- or on-campus meetings, to hear speakers of their own choice, and to publish and sell newspapers and magazines. Students are entitled to clear statements from their college administrations concerning their rights in the above matters, and should resist infringements on these rights by State legislatures.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION

We oppose current efforts to establish sectarian religious instruction in public schools whether on "released time" or any other basis. We feel these efforts to be both a violation of academic freedom as well as a contradiction of the American tradition of separation of church and state. Religious services and sectarian courses offered in nonsectarian colleges should be voluntary rather than compulsory.

STUDENT BILL OF RIGHTS

SDA chapters should cooperate with the National Students Association and the American Civil Liberties Union in making academic freedom a reality for American students and teachers. We reaffirm our support for the SDA bill of rights, as revised below:

1. The policies of every college in relation to student activities outside the classroom should be set forth in definite terms, with support from the college community. To insure democratic procedures, interpretation of the precise policy should be made by a body of equal number of elected student and faculty representatives.

STUDENT ASSOCIATIONS

2. The stated policy of a college should make it clear that students are free to organize associations for political, religious, social, and other purposes and that they are free to invite and hear on campus speakers of their own choice. Student organizations may properly be required to register their organizational names, purposes, bylaws, officers, and activities with the college authorities. They should not be required to disclose membership lists. Disapproval of the actions of any of the organizations shall not be grounds for interference by the college, unless these organizations function in some way contrary to the rules set forth in previous and subsequent paragraphs. Secret societies may, of course, be prohibited or regulated.

OFF-CAMPUS RIGHTS

3 No disciplinary action should be taken against students for engaging in activities such as campaigning for political candidates, picketing in labor disputes, participating in public demonstrations, etc., provided such students do not claim to be representing the college.

4. A student association should be permitted to use the name of the college and its own name in all activities held on college property. However, restrictions may justifiably be placed on the use of the college name when an organization's activities extend beyond the campus, but such restrictions should be administered only by the student-faculty body recommended in paragraph 1.

5. The use of college property for other than its primary purpose of instruction should be made available to any registered student organization carrying out its stated purpose in accordance with the regulations for use of college property. Such use should in no way be contingent on the purpose of a meeting. Student organizations should not be disciplined for meeting off the campus. Students should be free to post publicity for their meetings.

FACULTY ADVISERS

6. In institutions where it is thought desirable to have faculty advisers for student organizations, such advisers should be chosen by the student organizations themselves. In no case should advisers have authority to regulate or veto the activities of a student group. Student groups should not be forbidden to function because no faculty member will consent to serve as their adviser and no adviser should be held responsible for the actions of his group.

PRESS FREEDOM

7. College students should be permitted to publish and sell such newspapers or magazines as they wish, subject to the provisions for registering with the college authorities the name, purposes, and editors of such publications. No censorship by the college authorities should be exercised over the contents of any publication. If student editors abuse their responsibility, or fail to live up to responsibilities ordinarily accepted by the press, disciplinary action should be taken by the student-faculty body recommended in paragraph 1. However, editors should not be penalized for editorial expression of opinion.

8. Membership on the staffs of college-financed publications should be open to all students, the only criteria being journalistic ability and interest. The student- or staff-elected publication board should be free to select editors without the exercise of control or influence by the college authorities or faculty. A student editor should be removable only for previously listed reasons. Removal of student editors should be under the jurisdiction of the representative body specified in paragraph 1 or carried out by the student-publication board in open trial.

STUDENT GOVERNMENT

9. Every college should have a system of popularly elected student government acting as the agent for student activities and opinion. But experience has shown that freedom of organization on the campus is no safer in the hands of a student council than it is in the hands of any other person or group. Consequently, whatever regulations student government exercises over student organizations should be subject to the same safeguards as are regulations exercised by the college administration.

10. Students employed by colleges should have the right to form unions and bargain collectively.

11. Students should have the right to petition for changes in faculty and curriculum.

The Wisconsin General Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared on the subject of the forthcoming Wisconsin general election. I ask unanimous consent that the text of it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN VICTORY ASSURED IF WE ARE NOT OVERCONFIDENT

The people of Wisconsin will go overwhelmingly to the polls on Tuesday, November 7, 1950, and will elect the Republican ticket.

The following are the candidates endorsed by the Republican State convention:

For United States Senator, Senator ALEXANDER WILEY.

For Governor, Hon. Walter Kohler, Jr.

For Lieutenant Governor, the Honorable George Smith.

For State treasurer, the Honorable Warren Smith.

For secretary of state, the Honorable Fred Zimmerman.

For attorney general, the Honorable Vernon Thompson.

I am humbly confident that the people will recognize the need for continued experienced leadership of Wisconsin in the United States Senate and at Madison, our State capital. There we have had sound, intelligent, far-seeing administration under Gov. Oscar Renebohm, and I know that our people will want to continue in these policies under Walter Kohler, Jr. We must not, however, be overconfident.

Inevitably in a campaign season, millions of words fill the air, the newspapers, political literature, and letters.

When, however, you boil down the essence of all the campaign arguments, the charges, the accusations—boil them down to one point—it is this:

THE BASIC ISSUE: FREE ENTERPRISE

"Do the people of Wisconsin and the people of America believe in continuing in the way of free enterprise, or do they want to go the socialistic way of other countries, England and other foreign lands?"

That is the principle question. In fact it is the only real question, whether you are voting in Milwaukee or in Superior, in the city or out on a rural route.

On the one hand, your senior Senator, ALEX WILEY, is dedicated to the preservation of the American free-enterprise system. Yes, I am dedicated to the American proposition that a man has a right to work where he pleases, to build an industry, create jobs, own a home, own a farm, sell his goods and services at a profit, do things as he pleases so long as he does not hurt anyone else.

DEMOCRATS WANT ALL-POWERFUL STATE

On the other hand, the Democratic Party is committed to the alien notion that it is the state which should plan everything, direct everything, order everything. It is the all-powerful state which should direct socialized housing, socialized farming, which should proceed with unlimited spending, unlimited taxes, unlimited powers. That is their idea.

Naturally the Democrats are not willing to admit frankly that the end result of what they propose is socialism. They will veil that end result in all sorts of glittering generalities. They will say that all they want to do is allegedly to help the common man. The people, however, have a right to ask: "How can you help the common man by taxing him to death?" "How can you help him by burdening him with a thousand and one controls—even in peacetime?" "How can you help him by ordering him about, bothering him with nonsensical questionnaires, spying on him, snooping on him?"

THE DEMOCRATIC WAR PARTY

In recent months, another major issue has come to the fore. It is a fact that three times in 33 years the American people have been precipitated into war. Three times in 33 years, 1917, 1941, 1950, American boys have gone off to foreign battlefields. Those three times we have had Democratic Presidents in office. Three times we have been marched unwittingly down the road to foreign slaughter.

We all recognize that it is our patriotic obligation to defend our Nation. We all recognize that America is challenged today by world-wide communism.

CHICKENS COMING HOME TO ROOST

We feel, however, that under Republican leadership, we might have avoided the bloodbaths which have been our lot. We feel, for example, that at the present time the Democratic chickens are coming home to roost; the chickens of Yalta, Potsdam, Tehran, the secret agreements with Dictator Stalin, the disgraceful appeasement of the Reds, the terrible sell-out of devout Poland.

CLEAR-CUT CHOICES OPEN TO VOTERS

Thus on both domestic and foreign policy, the people of Wisconsin have clear-cut choices:

Do they want socialism or do they want free enterprise?

Do they want more wars, more appeasement, more softness to communism, more secret deals; or do they want frank, open, strong diplomacy?

If anybody in Wisconsin wants socialism, wants secret appeasement, then he is welcome to vote for the Democratic Party. I do believe, however, that the people of the Badger State will overwhelmingly vote for continued Republican leadership.

REPUBLICANS HAVE BEEN STANCH FRIENDS OF FARMERS

We of the Midwest pride ourselves in our balance between industry and agriculture. We of America's dairyland know that the Republican Party has been the traditional friend of the American farmer, and in particular of American dairying. For over 34 years, I personally have owned and operated a Wisconsin dairy farm and I know the farmer's problems at first hand. It is our Republican Party which is spearheading the fight for the St. Lawrence seaway. It is the Republican Party which has led the fight against the labor big shots in the East, who have constantly sought not only to bring about unnecessary industrial strife in the Midwest, but who now seek to control the Midwest politically.

LABOR BIG SHOTS TRYING TO PURGE SENATOR WILEY

A handful of labor bigsters are in fact trying to control this Nation, lock, stock, and barrel. They want to purge United States Senators like myself who have refused to take their orders. They want to destroy the vital Taft-Hartley law, which is our only protection against dictatorship by a few labor racketeers.

The honest rank and file of American labor—the average workingman of the A. F of L., the CIO, the Railway Brotherhoods, the Machinist's union, and other unions, does not, however, believe in communism, does not believe in senseless industrial warfare, does not believe in secret appeasement, does not believe in socialism. That is why the honest rank and file of our workers will support their senior Senator, will vote for Walter Kohler, Jr., for the Republican Party, for GOP Congressmen, assemblymen, and State senators, just as will all average citizens in other types of occupations.

HOW BIG SHOTS ARE TRYING TO SMEAR SENATOR WILEY

The labor big shots are recklessly pouring in thousands of dollars of money and millions of pieces of political smear literature in order to try to defeat me. They did this in 1944 and 1938, and their wretched efforts were unsuccessful then as I know they will be unsuccessful now. It is, however, essential that every American who believes in the free enterprise system work as hard as those who oppose it. Yes, every American should register and encourage every possible other voter to go to the polls on Tuesday, November 7. That is why I am glad that all over Wisconsin in every one of our 71 counties, individuals have taken on themselves the responsibility to:

HOW ALERT VOTERS ARE STRIVING FOR SENATOR WILEY AND GOOD GOVERNMENT

A. Call up by phone their friends, their neighbors and business acquaintances in order to have them support Senator WILEY, Walter Kohler, Jr., and the rest of the GOP ticket.

B. Write letters to their friends.

C. Distribute political literature in the mails, in letter boxes, under doors.

D. Hold political rallies.

E. On November 7, arrange to transport invalid or ill voters to the polls.

F. Help to collect the necessary finances to support this fight. Support the Republican State Finance Committee.

G. Organize citizens' committees both generally and in given occupations—doctors, lawyers, farmers, teachers, businessmen—on behalf of my reelection and on behalf of the election of the entire Republican ticket.

H. Cooperate with Wayne Hood, our splendid Republican State chairman, with Jack Rouse, our party's hard-working executive secretary at the Hotel Lorraine in Madison and with our 71 industrious county chairmen and other officers in striving for GOP victory.

EVERYONE HAS A JOB TO DO NOVEMBER 7

It takes work, hard work on the part of all of us. I have been here on the job for 12 years, working night and day, 52 weeks a year. It is a privilege to do so.

I well recognize that the average man has his personal affairs to attend to, his business, his job, or his farm, his family, his home; but this is not the sort of situation where we "can let George do it." This is the situation for you—the average voter—to take hold of.

You don't want Pendergastism, you don't want crime allied with crooked politics, you don't want the Democratic war party, the party that had coddled the Reds, the party that works hand-in-hand with the leftist labor big shots.

So, Tuesday, November 7, is not only important insofar as your Congress is concerned. It is a crucial day insofar as Mr. and Mrs. Average American is concerned. You need and must have experienced leadership in Washington and Madison.

THE CHALLENGE TO YOU

So, will you support free enterprise against socialism?

Will you support peace and preparedness against war?

Will you strive for prosperity rather than Government bungling and depression?

The challenge is up to you, the decision is up to you, the future of America and the world are up to you.

Go to the polls November 7 and vote Republican, for yourself, for your country, and for your world.

A Short Tour in the Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, my two colleagues from New Jersey, the Honorable Representatives ADDONIZIO and HOWELL, went back into the Army with me last week.

We offered ourselves as Congress' first "guinea pigs" after newspapers in the Garden State had repeatedly criticized certain aspects of the Federal inductee machinery. In order to determine firsthand if this public criticism was warranted, we appeared at the Newark induction station early one morning and underwent the same processing as the regular inductees, including submitting to the literacy test which has been the main target for editorial attack.

After this, we departed for Fort Dix with a group of inductees and for 2 days lived with the men. We ate in the enlisted men's mess halls, we slept in the enlisted men's barracks, we participated in their training, in their world affairs indoctrination, in their recreation. And, most important, we listened to their gripes.

Out of our 3-day tour of duty, myself and my colleagues have formulated a 3-point plan of suggested reforms within the draft machinery which I would like to outline briefly at this time.

First, the literacy tests on which the Army is rejecting an average of 60 percent of potential inductees in the New Jersey area is too severe. With World War II veterans and family men facing induction before many months, in light of the present world situation, we must lower the standards to take advantage of all sound-bodied manpower. Certainly a man who drives a truck or cooks in civilian life can drive a truck or cook in the Army, even if he can't pass the present literacy tests, which we personally thought were confusing, even to college-educated men.

Second, we discovered that the Newark induction station, under the capable and efficient command of Maj. Walter C. Money, has set up an X-ray system which is costing the taxpayers only 50 cents per picture. It is a system which is workable anywhere, and we recommend that it be adopted for all induction stations to save our taxpayers such fantastic bills as the $1,000-per-day rate reported in some sections of the country.

Third, we recommend that tax-free privileges be restored to military stores serving members of our Armed Forces. One of the biggest and most warranted gripes we found at Fort Dix was that soldiers, who are serving our country on a lower pay scale than civilians, are forced to pay civilian prices, even in their own post exchanges. It is only fair that, with a shooting war once more in progress, World War II's tax-free privileges be returned to our soldiers. They need every break we can give them.

Dr. John W. Rustin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. MAHON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, when one thinks of people in Washington, D. C., the Capital City of the Nation and the political center of the world, he usually thinks of people who have official positions with the Government. There are other people in Washington who have no official connection with the Government who are doing a great national service.

I am inserting for printing in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of September 15, 1950, which pays tribute to the magnificent job which has been done in Washington by Dr. John W. Rustin, who for about 14 years has been pastor of Mount Vernon Place Methodist Church in Washington, D. C. Dr. Rustin is completing his work in Washington and is about to assume a new work in Nashville, Tenn. Dr. Rustin has made a tremendous contribution to the moral and spiritual development of the city of Washington—he has been both a religious and civic leader—and I think it very fitting that the editorial from the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD. The dynamic personality of John Rustin will be missed by large numbers of people in Washington—civilians and public officials alike:

[From the Washington Post of September 15, 1950]

DR. RUSTIN'S SERVICE

Dr. John W. Rustin, for 14 years pastor of the Mount Vernon Place Methodist Church, is now saying his farewells as he prepares to take over the pastorate of Belmont Methodist Church in Nashville. His sermon on Sunday will terminate his service. His going will be a great loss to the community as well as to his congregation. The latter will miss his courageous and progressive preaching, which regularly filled his church to overflowing, so that there was scarcely standing room left. And this city will be deprived of a man who gave himself wholeheartedly to the city's civic and religious life. It was as "John" that he was known to many people—testimony to the personal imprint he made upon them, and the affection in which he was held.

Son of a Georgia circuit rider, Dr. Rustin has retained a fervor of spiritual conviction and a warmth of human sympathy that have been the most impressive witnesses of the faith he expounds. Today when pulpits are tending to become lecture platforms and the churches to lose themselves more and more in administration, Dr. Rustin has demonstrated that it is possible to be both preacher and pastor to a great congregation and to minister personally to many outside it.

Correcting Injustice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me by the House, I am including herewith an editorial by Mr. Dwight Payton, one of the leading editorial writers in our congressional district.

It is entitled "Correcting Injustice." This editorial reflects the feeling of quite a number of veterans of World War II. I believe it is worthy of your consideration.

[From the Gazette-Record, Scranton, Kans.]

CORRECTING INJUSTICE

A young farmer-stockman of Osage County, veteran of World War II, recently remarked, "You know, if I had a couple of hundred years allotted to me for this life on earth, I would be right glad to put in another 4 or 5 years in the Navy."

His comment points up a grave injustice being done through lack of any policy in drafting for the Armed Forces. A large number of men, veterans and subject to call, are being kept on a make-no-plans-for-the-future basis when there is no excuse for such. Formation of a policy for drafting men would put an end to this uncertainty and there is no good reason why such a policy is not in effect.

Our veterans might also feel that it would only be fair to dip first into the deferred ranks of the last war before calling on them for a second hitch. Some such provision should be speedily put into effect and the demand for it might well come from the home fronters of which group this writer is one.

Of course, in event of an all-out war, there would be no question of such a balance-up, but until that time comes the element of fairness deserves full attention. It is easy to say that those who stayed in the Reserve Corps took a chance of being recalled, but it is not so easy to say that one man should have to serve twice in the Armed Forces, spend double years away from home and family, denied opportunity to develop his own interests, while another is never called.

Another consideration by way of policy would be to provide for the possibility of continuation of small-front wars. When only a small fraction of available manpower is to be used, it stands to reason that some method of limiting service and providing a rotation system should be established.

The Habit of Lying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Council Bluffs (Iowa) Nonpareil:

THE HABIT OF LYING

Lying is prevalent in today's world. As a matter of fact, it has always been a common habit. As far back as history goes there are accounts of lies in all phases of human relations.

The psalmist David, greatly afflicted, once wrote: "All men are liars."

A lie is an untruth. It may consist of giving a false impression by something said, by telling only a part of the truth, or by the way one acts without saying a word.

What constitutes lying is indicated by the oath administered to witnesses in courts of law: "Do you solemnly swear to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?"

Witnesses invariably answer in the affirmative, but it is common knowledge that our courts reek with perjury.

The purpose of lying is to gain some advantage. It may be a financial advantage, an advantage over some other person, an advantage in pretending we have done what we have not done, or, vice versa, an attempt to gain advantage by pretending that we know more than we do or are more capable than we are.

Lying is very much like stealing, which is also done for personal gain.

It may seem that an advantage is gained by lying, for many a lie is told that is never found out, just as the perpetrators of many thefts are never apprehended.

But many people think they get away with lies when they do not. You have doubtless heard it said of more than one person, "His life has been a lie." Yet the people thus described probably were sure their lies had never been detected.

Lying is always harmful to the liar, whether he realizes it or not, and is usually harmful to others—often to those he loves best.

Lying is also contrary to God's command. No sin is more emphatically condemned in the Bible than lying.

The ninth commandment says, "Thou shall not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

Proverbs 6: 16–19 says: "These six things doth the Lord hate; yea seven are an abomination unto Him: A proud look, a lying tongue, hands that shed innocent blood, a heart that deviseth wicked abominations, feet that be swift in running to mischief, a false witness that speaketh lies, and he that soweth discord among brethren."

Lying is practiced without much compunction, but it is a grievous sin. It may seem a convenient way of escaping minor difficulties and embarrassments, but little lies often make big lies necessary and eventually lead to ruin.

"Be not deceived, God is not mocked; for whatever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

TRYING TO FORGET TYDINGS REPORT

The report of the Tydings committee is already all but forgotten, and the Democratic leaders hope it will be completely forgotten before election.

Why? Because it is everything a report of an impartial investigating committee ought not to be—one-sided, unfair, frantic, hysterical. It is couched in such intemperate language and so manifestly partisan that not a single Republican voted to accept it, although a number of Republican Senators thought Senator MCCARTHY had gone too far in his charges.

They refused to subscribe to the TYDINGS findings which in effect say that Senator MCCARTHY is a vicious criminal, guilty of subversive activities, who should not only be expelled from the Senate but probably ought to be placed in solitary confinement for the rest of his life.

According to Senator TYDINGS and his administration colleagues, no American was ever quite so low as JOE.

They would like to have the American people believe that there never was and never will be anyone in the administration who in any way sympathized with communism.

If at any time any of the administration pets were found to have taken secret papers from the files and turned them over to Russian agents, they were just indiscreet.

Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., one of Harvard's left-wingers, tried to explain their derelictions in a recent magazine article. He said that Alger Hiss and his pals in the State Department were just ardent, high-minded idealists, who meant no harm.

Their thefts, according to Schlesinger, were not only understandable but entirely excusable, because in an earlier day "many Americans looked on Communist Russia as a great and significant social experiment."

The vast majority of Americans are not so gullible. They see no great and significant social experiment in the brutal butchery of all opposition in Russia or the ordered starvation of 5,000,000 farmers, because they thought they had a right to the food they had grown.

The idealists Schlesinger writes about stole war secrets that may be in part responsible for the butchery of American soldiers now going on in Korea.

Our prisons are full of men indiscreet enough to be caught stealing and robbing.

But not even the most unscrupulous shysters among the lawyers who tried to keep them out of prison, ever tried to free them on the plea that their ideals were so lofty they didn't know right from wrong.

It was left for the Tydings committee to insist that the idealists be given a clean bill of health, and that their accuser, Senator MCCARTHY be consigned to the lowest depths of infamy.

To their horror, the administration henchmen are finding out that more people believe Senator MCCARTHY than believe Senator TYDINGS. That is why the administration is so anxious to have the Tydings report consigned to oblivion as quickly as possible.

This Can Stop Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON
OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of an article entitled "This Can Stop Russia." Some weeks ago the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] wrote this article for Coronet magazine. His great fight for what he has called a "Marshall Plan of Ideas" has just resulted this week in the Senate action trebling or quadrupling the State Department appropriation for the area for which he was responsible as Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs from 1945 through 1947. In this article the Senator from Connecticut explains why, in order to help create a world climate for peace, we must hammer home to the world what he calls "America's Big Truth." This article will not be published in Coronet until September 22, and I am grateful to its editors for permission to reprint it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the Congress just before we plan to recess.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS CAN STOP RUSSIA

(By WILLIAM BENTON, United States Senator from Connecticut)

HERE IS A BOLD PROGRAM TO SELL DEMOCRACY AND HALT THE SPREAD OF COMMUNISM

For 5 years now I have been trying to awaken this country from a complacent and dangerous sleep. I have talked, written, and proposed in the Senate, over the radio, and to anyone who would listen. My program is quite simple: in order to create a climate for peace and defeat the big lie of communism, we must hammer home to the world America's big truth.

Arms and ammunition are necessary to the protection and defense of our independence. But to win a war that results in the survival of what we stand for, human ideas can be stronger than weapons. But we must act quickly if we are to win.

The Korean situation may be only a fuse to set off disastrous explosions of Communist violence in other parts of the world. And it requires no Government official to tell you that such action means World War III.

Before it is too late, we, as a great peace-loving nation, must wrest from Russia the initiative in a fighting war of ideas. If we do not, the remaining free nations stand to suffer the fate of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and other countries that have raised their hands in silent surrender.

In effect, this is a last call to reason—a final appeal to those who understand why propaganda cannot be defeated by troops, planes, or bombs. To some extent, the dreams of myself and my colleagues are beginning to be realized.

For instance, I took great hope, not long ago, in the announcement that President Truman supported our effort to have Congress increase the State Department's Voice of America appropriation by an additional $89,000,000.

Money, however, is not the real problem here, for President Truman's proposals would not cost nearly as much as we spend for atom bombs, and not one-twentieth as much as we now spend for farm subsidies. Actually, I believe our plan should be regarded as a hopeful way of saving money, since nearly three-fourths of our vast Federal budget is attributable to war.

Our best hope for realizing our investment in the future is to seize the initiative in the cold war of ideas. The only way to accomplish this is by taking the offensive in the battle of propaganda.

We must ask ourselves, when we read of the North Korean aggressors, of Red storm troops in east Berlin, or of secret trials in the Balkan countries—how did they get that way? A very large part of our answer will be: because of false Soviet promises, coupled with false accusations against western democracy.

You do not have to look any further than the Communists' outrageous claims that the Republic of Korea, on word from Wall Street and John Foster Dulles, invaded Northern Korea. Yet, strangely enough, millions of people throughout the world are ready to believe that—because it is told them, and repeated to them in infinite variations, by a diabolically clever propaganda machine.

The road to lasting peace calls upon us to set the record straight, and to do it on a scale never before attempted in history. In my service as Assistant Secretary of State, I saw the true nature of the Soviet's challenge; they have flung down the gauntlet to western civilization in a struggle for the minds and loyalties of mankind. Their skill in that struggle is a far greater threat to the free world than the Red army—in Korea, Berlin, or even Moscow. The scale of their effort is without precedent. Their success can be measured in the 800,000,000 human souls who now move to the beat of Stalin's dictates.

The Communists were specialists in the big lie long before Hitler. They learned that the big lie, if it is shouted loudly and often enough, can, in the absence of a counterargument, produce the kind of action—or inaction—the Communists want. The kind of action or inaction they want in this crisis is anti-Americanism.

What can we do about this? To put it simply, we can oppose the big lie with the big truth. Eleven other Members of the Senate joined me not long ago in sponsoring Senate Resolution No. 243, which calls for a Marshall plan in the field of ideas and spells out, in general terms, how the big truth can be launched.

We use the phrase "Marshall plan" for these proposals because the Marshall plan sprang from a positive, boldly conceived proposal on a scale adequate to the need. It was designed to close the dollar gap until recovery could permit Europe to earn its own way. This plan was no mere containment of communism; it has been a smashing setback for communism, and by means other than war.

Each day that passes proves the necessity for immediate launching of a Marshall plan of ideas. For, if we succeed in this broad and imaginative project, we are forging a weapon more powerful than the most deadly secret weapon that we or our enemies can ever produce.

Today the United States faces two main questions in the launching of a Marshall plan of ideas: (1) How do we go about reaching the hundreds of millions we must talk to? (2) What do we say to them?

The ECA in Europe has shown great resourcefulness as to means. In addition to the mass methods of press, radio, and film, it has met special situations with imagination and vigor.

This past summer ECA toured the canals of France with showboats carrying documentary movies and displays. In Sicily, where the wandering minstrel is still a chief source of information, ECA has its own native troubadours, who tell the romantic story of a boy and girl in love, and how the girl was saved from fatal illness by penicillin flown from the United States by ECA.

My own three proposals are perhaps more obvious, but they must be carried forward on a scale commensurate with the need. My first proposal calls for creation of a unified world-wide broadcasting network, potentially capable of booming a signal into every radio receiver on earth—by medium or long-wave signals where needed, not only by short-wave transmitters.

Even with its limited system, the Voice of America today receives more than 20,000 letters a month from overseas, despite the fact that only a fraction of the world's receivers are equipped to receive short-wave broadcasts.

The Kremlin was so alarmed by our Voice broadcasts in Russian language (which I had the privilege of launching in 1946), that it has installed at strategic points in Russia some 200 transmitters for the exclusive purpose of jamming our broadcasts from the United States and England. Can we not conclude from this that the Kremlin feels it cannot afford to let its people know the facts about our American way of life?

Important though it is to reach the Russian people, there are other peoples who are even more important. These are in the critical areas of nations that are undecided, wavering, or under Moscow pressure. It is here that we must concentrate, and in the underdeveloped areas of the world.

For this task, broadcasting has unique virtues. It is instantaneous. It can leap over censorship at boundaries. It is cheap. It can reach remote areas as easily as metropolitan centers. It poses no requirement of literacy. It is not affected by shortage of paper or film stock. Above all, it can reach hundreds of millions of people, and it can reach them quickly.

My second proposal calls for a world-wide program of producing and distributing documentary and educational motion pictures, designed to explain the democratic ideals which underlie our foreign policy.

Nothing equals the motion picture in its capacity for gripping and holding masses of people, and communicating information and attitudes in vivid, memorable form. If we would exhibit documentary films to at least one-fourth of the population of the earth once a month, their impact could well change the face of history.

There are some 91,000 theaters in the world where motion pictures are shown. They have a seating capacity of 39,000,000 people, so that, in theory, half a billion people could see a single film in 2 weeks. Further, there are tens of thousands of 16- and 8-millimeter projectors in the schools, churches, clubs, and homes of the world.

Even where there are no projectors, our State Department has drawn crowds from miles around when they have toured foreign towns and villages with projection trucks, showing films like Valley of the Tennessee and Tuesday in November, the latter a documentary on American elections.

My third proposal calls for immediate expansion of our program for bringing labor leaders, journalists, students, and others to the United States. Foreign students of our universities have always been among our best friends abroad. Many go home to become leaders in their countries.

I favor an exchange program which would absorb as many as 100,000 foreign students a year, a vast increase over our present enrollment of such students. I also favor—as even more urgent—a huge expansion in our program for bringing to this country for relatively brief visits the key leaders of opinion from foreign lands.

The ECA, under its technical-assistance program, brought 900 people from European industry and agriculture last year to study our methods. Two among the 900 were influential Italian labor leaders. When they had seen American labor-management relations, when they had seen that our workers share in the benefits of increased productivity and from the use of labor-saving machinery, when they had seen that competition is not without economic value to our workers, they went back to Italy, pulled 700,000 workers out of the big Communist-dominated general trade union, and launched an independent union.

At the start of the technical-assistance program, a group of Norwegian labor leaders came here to study the American system. When they returned to Norway, they found that a similar group had just come back from a visit to Russia. By mere comparison of the findings of the two groups, it was directly seen how infinitely better the workers fare in the American free-enterprise economy than in the economy of the U. S. S. R.

Broadcasting, motion pictures, and exchange of persons are my three main methods of gaining communication with the rest of the world, though every technique should be explored, including the use of the comic-strip books. But what do we want to communicate? I think of four things we should say to counteract the fraudulent Communist propaganda:

1. Without boasting, without falsifying, let us begin to dramatize abroad the strength and potential stability of the United States. Let us make clear that, although we have many problems, under the American business system our whole people, and not just the few, share a rising standard of living. Let us dramatize our peaceful record and peaceful intentions—our devotion to the ideal of political and economic independence for all peoples. Let us explain that we are a people slow to anger, but united and mighty in a righteous cause.

2. Let us increasingly share with other peoples our agricultural, industrial, and business know-how, the results of our research in medicine and public health, what we have learned about labor-management relations, city planning, public education, power development; and let us invite others to teach us what they have learned.

3. Let us begin, preferably in concert with other free nations, to dramatize those ideals which the free nations hold in common. Chief among these are personal and political freedom, equality of opportunity, and the God-given dignity of the individual. These are the ideals which most clearly divide us from the Communists, and in which they are most vulnerable in the eyes of the world.

4 Let us begin deliberately to lay bare before the world the gaping difference between Soviet deeds and Soviet words.

I urge that we say these things wherever possible through the United Nations and UNESCO, and jointly with other free nations. But much of the job will of necessity devolve upon ourselves, acting through groups of private citizens and through our Government.

Can we peacefully win men toward faith in human dignity and individual freedom? Of about 200,000,000,000 people who have lived on earth since the time of Christ, not more than 2,000,000,000 have known freedom as we understand it. As freedom has grown and spread, it has faced a series of stupendous totalitarian reactions. But it has survived because it is an inspired faith.

But it cannot and will not survive unless we are prepared to defend it. And our obligation to history, to the world and, most important, to ourselves, demands that we beat Russia at her own game. For, unless we can convince the people of the globe that our ideas spell peace, freedom, and happiness, we shall lose the war of guns as well as the war of ideas.

St. Lawrence Seaway and Its Relationship to National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 15 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the development of the St. Lawrence seaway has become a priority project. Our national security, our strength as a free Nation, may well depend upon the construction of this important artery of transportation.

It is most unfortunate and may well prove disastrous to our national security that the St. Lawrence seaway bill has not been acted upon by the Congress.

While the seaway is of particular concern to the State of Minnesota, it is of even greater importance to the entire Nation.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address prepared by me on this vital subject, The St. Lawrence Seaway and Its Relationship to the National Defense.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND ITS RELATIONSHIP TO THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

It is always a pleasure for me to speak to my fellow Minnesotans, the kind of pleasure a traveler feels when he glimpses the familiar outlines of home and exchanges greetings with old friends. And today it is a very special pleasure, because I want to talk with you about our State's future. There is not one of us—from the miner extracting the earth's treasures, to the man in the factory, to the white-collar worker at his desk, to the farmer who sees his fields of ripe grain stretch to the horizon of the Minnesota sky—who has not a very personal interest in what the next generation will bring to our State.

These are times of far-reaching economic changes. It is not unusual that Minnesota's future should be intertwined with an issue which also has great significance for the Middle West and our Nation as a whole. I am speaking of the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin.

From the days of the earliest settlement of our forefathers in the Northwest, this waterway has been the very lifeline of our industrial growth. The Governments of Canada and the United States—in the belief that great natural resources should be developed for the benefit of the people—have been making improvements along the channel. In 1855 at Sault Ste. Marie the first primitive lock was constructed between Lake Superior and Lake Huron, opening the way for the ore boats. Today on that spot are the famous Soo Locks through which pass 85,000,000 tons of ore a year. In 1932 the Canadian Government completed the Welland Canal and locks, making it possible to navigate a 300-foot drop between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. The question of further improvements at Niagara Falls is also under consideration. Each time a barrier has been removed from the channel, the trade in grain and coal and ore has increased. Every improvement has lifted the wealth and standard of living of the surrounding regions.

Now there remain only 113 miles of river to be brought under control. It is this relatively short stretch of water which has become the core of controversy. And here lie the answers to some of our questions about Minnesota's future.

The St. Lawrence seaway project would make these 113 miles navigable. It would provide a 27-foot channel from Duluth at the head of the Great Lakes through the St. Lawrence and out to the Atlantic Ocean, a distance of 2,400 miles. Obviously, this would open the interior of our continent to the trade of the world. A dam and powerhouse would be built in the International Rapids of the St. Lawrence River in northern New York. The water's energy would be converted into electric power and sold to residential and industrial users in New York and probably in New England.

The seaway has received unstinting support in Minnesota and other forward-looking States, but for a quarter century, whenever it reached Congress, it has been battled to a standstill by—principally—a tight little knot of potent but misguided people.

If the seaway were a reality, Minnesota's products could be sent into the markets of the world—her wheat and flour, her flaxseed, dairy foods, lumber, farm machinery, and other manufactures. And the wealth of the world would pour back to the people of our State. It would come in the form of payment for our goods. It would come in the form of raw materials from new sources.

Minnesota's farmers would stand to gain in two ways: They could expect their products, enjoying the advantage of cheap water transportation, to become competitive in world markets. And, as always, they could expect to prosper in direct relation to Minnesota's urban centers which will be stimulated by the new outlet to the Atlantic. Our cities on the shores of Lake Superior—Duluth and Two Harbors—will become busy ocean ports. Our inland cities—Minneapolis and St. Paul, for example—cannot help but benefit from the State's growth in agriculture, manufacturing, and shipping.

Although it can be said that Minnesota's body is composed of fertile farmland and thriving cities, her veins are truly of iron. From the great ranges of the Lake Superior region comes the high-grade iron ore which supplies nearly 85 percent of America's vital steel industry. In a giant semicircle, beginning at Buffalo, swooping down through Pennsylvania and southern Ohio, and up to Chicago, the steel mills of the United States are concentrated. They are there for a reason—because our Lake Superior ore is easily and cheaply accessible. From these reserves came the ore for steel which has contributed to our high standard of living. From these reserves was produced the steel for the weapons of our victory in World War II. And now again our iron and steel will go forth to protect our way of life.

But the Superior ore gradually is being depleted. I say depleted, not exhausted. Until now approximately 2,500,000,000 tons have been consumed. The remainder is estimated at from 1,300,000,000 to 1,600,000,000 tons, of which 500,000,000 to 600,000,000 tons are in open-pit ores. These are being used up at the rate of 50,000,000 to 55,000,000 tons a year.

How long could they last if they were subjected to the demands of another war, or even of stepped-up rearmament, as the President has ordered? In 20 years at the very latest—some experts say in half that time—the steel mills will need other sources of iron ore.

Naturally the steel industry knows this and it is already seeking and finding new deposits of ore. United States Steel has purchased land on the Delaware River in eastern Pennsylvania for a new steel mill to use ore from Venezuela. Bethlehem Steel is expanding in Baltimore, and using Chilean ore.

There is talk of a steel mill to be built in New England. All of them want to be near Atlantic coast ports in order to utilize foreign ores.

What effect would this have on the Middle West? A tragic one. The men who make steel are hard-boiled and realistic. They choose their plant locations because transportation of ore to steel mills is a heavy factor in production costs. If their supply of ore runs out, they will relocate closer to a new supply. It would make no difference to them—nor any other businessman in the same situation—that the Middle West might suffer.

The entire livelihood of some of our Minnesota towns depends on iron ore. If we continue to mine it at the current rate, their source of prosperity will be drained dry eventually. We have seen the ghost towns of the West—pitiful skeletons where men once lived and thrived on a single commodity—gold. When that was exhausted the town and its inhabitants went with it, leaving nothing but dusty remains. Are we going to let this happen to the ore towns of Minnesota? Our fine cities of Hibbing, Virginia, Coleraine, Buhl, Ely on the Mesabi—and Crosby and Ironton on the Cuyuna—were nourished on ore and through it made a great contribution to the economy of our Nation. The answer is "No." Not as long as the splendid people of Minnesota continue to exercise their rights of citizenship wisely.

Our first step is to keep the steel industry from deserting the Middle West. We must not only preserve our ore supply, but we must have supplementary ores. In Labrador there are deposits which compare in quality to our best Superior ore. If the seaway were open, Labrador ore could come in via a cheap water route, to supplement, but not to supplant, our Minnesota ores. It would be unnecessary to move steel plants to the Atlantic coast to receive foreign-ore shipments if Minnesota and Labrador ores could be used as complementary sources. It would be unnecessary to watch the decay of Minnesota's ore towns, to see their populations desert, their businesses sicken and die, and their markets disappear for the farmers of the State. The recent census shows that Minnesota has gained almost 200,000 in population these last 10 years, putting us up close to 3,000,000. This trend, however, may not continue. The experience of our neighbors, North Dakota and Nebraska, who lost population to the coastal States, is too close for comfort.

The seaway would give the steel industry the assurance it needs and wants that it could remain exactly where it is, and, by the same token, the seaway would stabilize the economy of the Middle West. It would resolve our uncertainties about the future.

I do not wish to overlook the existence of the great veins of second-grade ore—the taconites—which we also have in the Lake Superior region. I am tremendously interested in the development of taconite ore, and where national legislation is necessary to bring it into use I shall do all within my power to secure such legislation. Research is now under way to develop our taconites. However, the best estimates say that we cannot expect more than about 20,000,000 tons by 1970. Now, since current demands average about 50,000,000 tons of open-pit and 30,000,000 tons of underground ore yearly, you can see that 20,000,000 tons of taconite concentrates would only meet part of the future needs of iron ore.

We know that the development of taconites will employ large numbers of people. It will put our second-grade ores to good use. There is no doubt that we should go ahead with it; but the steel industry is not going to wait for us to do it. As long as cheap foreign ores are available, it will move to coastal areas to get them—that is, unless we can have Labrador ore shipped in via the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway to meet and combine with our Minnesota ores in the blast furnaces of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan.

Ours is not a selfish interest. It is not just Minnesota, not just the Middle West, but the entire Nation which needs the seaway. National security demands not only that the Middle West remain the center of the steel industry, but that iron ore coming to the Middle West be shipped in by the protected route of the St. Lawrence. Secretary of the Army Frank Pace, Jr., speaking for the various defense agencies and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had this to say about the seaway:

"In time of emergency it is essential that adequate quantities of iron ore be readily available to meet the needs of the Armed Forces. The Labrador ores are generally recognized as the most important now available within the North American continent. If the seaway is completed, ore from this area could be brought into the Great Lakes steel-industrial area over a protected inland water route, requiring, in time of war, less protective measures than open-sea routes."

Now that President Truman has asked for a $10,000,000,000 mobilization program, we naturally are concerned over rising Federal expenditures and any further drains on the Treasury. It is good to know in these circumstances that the seaway is expected to be self-liquidating. Both the Canadian and United States Governments have agreed that a system of toll charges should be established. Farm and industrial leaders have indicated their willingness to pay these tolls. And even with the tolls, the seaway remains a cheaper method of transportation. Power sales will be another source of revenue to help with self-liquidation. The cost of $388,000,000 to the United States would be liquidated in 50 years. And the benefits in dollars to our farms, factories, and great metropolitan centers would be incalculable.

Since 1919 the State of Minnesota has supported this project. The States of New York and New England expect to receive electric power from the dam on the St. Lawrence River. We in Minnesota want to see them get it. We want their electricity bills to drop and their standard of living to rise. When easterners are prosperous they buy more of our products—particularly those shipped over a cheap water route. Any great economic development that is helpful to one region of the United States will result in national benefit. And so it is with the St. Lawrence seaway.

You may wonder why such a worthy proposal has failed to receive congressional approval. It has been supported by Presidents and Congressmen of both political parties, since it was first introduced. But its opponents are powerful and articulate. The railroads and the power companies of the Northeast, in the mistaken belief that it would take business from them, are fighting the seaway. They have battled it so successfully over the years that we still do not have it.

I am reminded of the time, around the turn of the century, when the great railroad baron, James J. Hill, put up a terrific battle against approval of the Panama Canal. The American taxpayers, he said, would be pouring their money into a lily pond. He claimed the Canal would ruin our transcontinental railroads. Well, he was wrong on both counts. The Panama Canal became a vital part of our national defense and an essential link in our foreign trade. And our transcontinental railroads are among the most profitable lines in the country. The same thing happened to the southern power companies which fought TVA tooth and nail. Today they are utilizing low-cost TVA power and their profits are higher than ever.

At this moment resolutions to complete the St. Lawrence seaway are in committee in both Houses of Congress. It is most unfortunate that the Congress has not acted. We must continue the fight for this great legislation.

The St. Lawrence seaway is the key to Minnesota's future. It holds opportunity, development, wealth. Our industries are entitled to the expansion brought by low transportation costs. The Middle West is entitled to send its products forth to world markets. It is time for Congress to recognize the needs of the Middle West and of our great State of Minnesota.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH W. GWINN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

PROVIDENCE, R. I., August 17, 1950.

GUY GEORGE GABRIELSON, ESQ.,
Chairman, Republican National Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GABRIELSON: On August 14, 1945, Japan accepted the Allied terms of surrender and World War II came to an end. On June 25, 1950, less than 5 years later, the North Koreans crossed the frontier into South Korea, and a war was started which may ultimately develop into world war III. While on the surface it is a war against the North Koreans, it is in reality a war against Russia.

What has led to this war in which we have become involved—the third in 31 years? Has the conduct of our Nation's affairs been honest and able, or is the reverse true? These are questions which the American people are entitled to have answered, and answered now. If there have been mistakes or worse in the past, how can their repetition in the future be prevented unless the facts are known?

The answer to these questions undoubtedly lies in the incredible bungling (to speak mildly) of our Nation's affairs by the party which has controlled our National Government for the past 17 years. It began in the first year of President Franklin Roosevelt's first term when, on November 17, 1933, diplomatic relations with Russia were resumed, ending a policy of nonrecognition which had prevailed since the overthrow of the Kerensky government in 1917. From that time on the foreign policy pursued by our Government has had the effect of building up Russia from a comparatively weak nation to a very strong one. This course was followed despite the knowledge that the Russian Government was one of the most cruel and ruthless despotisms the world has ever known.

Even after the end of World War II, when it became clear that Russia was building a huge war machine with the obvious intention of using it against us, our Government continued to follow a course in Asia that played right into Russia's hands. It shamefully betrayed our stanch ally, Chiang-Kai-shek, and the Nationalist Government in China, and turned China over to the Communist stooges of Moscow. By so doing it rendered impotent the one power in Asia that could have stopped Russia in her tracks, and by so doing have prevented the present war in Korea.

Very revealing statements have been made and articles and books written on the subject of this country's policy toward China by such men as (1) Ambassador William C. Bullitt, who was President Roosevelt's first Ambassador from this country to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, from 1933 to 1936, President Roosevelt's Ambassador to France from 1936 to 1940, and his Special Envoy to Nanking, China, in 1934, and who returned to China again in the summer of 1947 to write a series of articles for Life magazine; (2) Dr. WALTER JUDD, Republican Congressman from Minnesota, a recognized authority on China, who spent a number of years there as a medical missionary of the Congregational Church and as the managing head of certain hospitals; (3) Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer, who succeeded General Stilwell in China; (4) Maj. Gen. Claire Lee Chennault, the celebrated American general who commanded the famous Flying Tigers in China during World War II, and who wrote a book on China bearing the title "Way of a Fighter," which was published early in 1949; (5) Mr. Roscoe Pound, former dean of the Harvard Law School and one of America's leading jurists, who spent 18 months in China ending in the spring of 1949, during which he served as adviser to the Ministry of Justice of the Nationalist Government; (6) Maj. Gen. Patrick J. Hurley, President Roosevelt's personal Ambassador to China in the latter part of the last war; (7) Joseph P. Kamp, author of America Betrayed; and (8) Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

The conclusions to be drawn from the statements of the above persons and from press reports and other resources are these:

(1) The United States is in great peril. If a war with little Korea can do what it has to this country, what will the ultimate war with Russia do?

(2) Through American aid and the incredible errors and bungling of our Government (to put it mildly), Russia has been built up from a comparatively weak nation to a very strong one, while our own military power during the past 5 years has steadily and drastically declined.

(3) Russia intends to use her huge military machine to conquer and enslave the world.

(4) The Chinese Communists are, like the Korean Communists, acting under the orders of Russia, and control of China by them means control by Russia.

(5) Control of China by Russia will probably lead to Russian control of all Asia, which has one-half the population of the world.

(6) With Russia in complete control of Asia, it is probable that she will be able to achieve her ambition of world conquest.

(7) With Chiang in control of China, there would have been no Korean War, and the danger of Russia's getting control of Asia would have been eliminated. As a result, the thousands of American lives which have been and will be sacrified in Korea would have been saved.

(8) The responsibility for all this rests with President Harry S. Truman and his predecessor in office, Franklin D. Roosevelt. While many of the acts that have created this state of affairs may have been performed by persons other than the President, such persons held office only at his will and could have been removed by him at any time. Instead, he has consistently supported them and their policies and has insisted on continuing them in office. The responsibility, therefore, is his.

(9) The present indecision of our State Department as to the course to follow regarding the defense of Formosa and the support of Chiang, described in the press as a "dilemma" is no dilemma at all, unless it be a domestic political one of having to admit to the American people that its previous policy toward Chiang has been utterly and disastrously wrong. If Formosa is of great military importance to us, as General MacArthur and our other military leaders seem to think, and if our policy toward Chiang has been wrong, the parlor debate now going on should be stopped before it is too late, and we should declare to the world that Chiang is our ally and that we will support him to the limit. We need as never before allies that will do something more than talk and take our money.

Not only has the clique that has ruled the United States for the past 17 years pursued a foreign policy that has placed this Nation in the greatest peril in its history, but it has followed an equally disastrous domestic policy.

For 17 years the Federal Government has been under the domination of individuals who, having seized control of the Democratic Party, have been steadily leading the Nation down the road to socialism.

In violation of the rights expressly reserved to the States and the people by the Federal Constitution, these Socialist planners have succeeded in steadily diminishing the powers of the States and increasing the power of the Federal Government, until today we witness the sickening spectacle of State and municipal officials going to Washington in a steady stream with hat in hand begging for Federal aid—aid which is granted only on conditions that render the States and municipalities still more subservient to the Federal will. The obtaining of this money by the State and municipal officials is proclaimed by them as a splendid achievement, despite the fact that the money which they obtain is money which the Federal Government has collected from the people of the very States which they represent; for it must be remembered that, with minor exceptions, every dollar of revenue collected by the Federal Government comes from the same sources of revenue that are available to the States.

The result has been the building up of a huge Federal bureaucracy with 2,000,000 individuals on the payroll at a tremendous cost to the people of the country.

Through abuse of the taxing power the Federal Government takes each year a large part of the income of the people of the States and hands back to the States only a small fraction of the sums so collected. For example, for the 5 years, 1944 to 1948, both inclusive, the figures for Rhode Island are as follows:

Year	Payments to Federal Government by Rhode Island taxpayers	Federal aid to Rhode Island
1944	$257,513,531.32	$5,435,203
1945	246,342,330.13	4,511,754
1946	225,919,539.43	4,091,500
1947	216,325,430.14	5,079,210
1948	236,234,082.51	31,848,753

The large increase in Federal aid in 1948 was due to veterans' education facilities, which increased from $164,866 in 1947 to $24,424,719 in 1948.

This practice of the Federal Government is very harmful.

(1) It deprives the States of sources of revenue to which they are justly entitled and makes it difficult for the States and municipalities to raise the revenue needed for their own operations.

(2) It greatly increases the power of the Federal Government and diminishes the power of the States. In fact, it is the most effective imaginable scheme to create a centralized government, and is a sly constitutional destruction of American constitutional government.

(3) It is extremely costly, for not only does it result in building up and maintaining a huge and unnecessary Federal bureaucracy, but much more money is spent for the various purposes than would be the case if the States raised their own revenue and spent it for their own purposes.

(4) It therefore increases greatly the amount of taxes which the people must pay.

In its lust for power the Federal Government under Mr. Truman spent in five peacetime years, from July 1, 1945, to July 1, 1950, $214,000,000,000, an amount greater by $34,000,000,000 than the total amount spent by all the 32 previous Presidents in 152 years, from 1789 to July 1, 1941. In 1931 the cost of the Federal Government was $30 for each man, woman, and child. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, it was over $300. This has been merely a continuance of the policy on the part of our Federal managers of "tax, spend, and elect," the formula for socialism proposed by the late Harry Hopkins and so religiously followed by the Roosevelt and Truman administrations.

Through this and other policies of the Roosevelt administration a depression, which started in 1929 and should, according to all normal experience, have ended within 2 or 3 years, was stretched to 11 years, and it took a war boom to end it. Throughout the life of our country there has been no depression to approach it, either in length, severity, or cost. During this period we had the greatest unemployment in our history, with an average of 10,000,000 unemployed. Have these facts been forgotten by the people?

The war ended the depression by putting everybody to work. The war at the same time created an unprecedented scarcity of materials and goods that kept industry operating at capacity for more than 3 years after the war ended.

During the Roosevelt and Truman administrations, through deficit spending due in large part, but by no means wholly, to the war, the national debt has been increased from $21,000,000,000 in 1933 to almost $260,000,000,000 at the present time, and an inflation has been caused which has cut the purchasing power of the dollar almost in two as compared with 10 years ago. As a result there has been a drastic increase in the cost of living, and the solvency of the Federal Government has been endangered.

During this period the New Deal administration has consistently followed a course based upon an alien philosophy of government, which, as history has demonstrated time and time again, can have but one ending—the complete loss of freedom, and the enslavement of the people in a fully regimented and Socialist state.

Again and again have the people been warned of this. A majority, however, have ignored the warning. Bought by Government jobs and hand-outs at the taxpayers' expense, and cajoled and deceived by Government promises and by the temporary benefits flowing from an inflated economy, a majority of the voters have chosen to continue in office the most incompetent and unscrupulous administration the country has ever known—an administration which led Senator BYRD, of Virginia, a Democrat, to say on the floor of the United States Senate on July 14, 1949, referring to President Truman's speech the night before on the economic report:

"I say that the fiscal program announced last night by the President is the certain road to ruin. Unless the Congress and the people can defeat this program, we will go over the precipice of financial disaster.

"Such a program can only hold in prospect for business increased taxes or national insolvency. Increased taxes applied to a declining business probably would reach a point of confiscation, and insolvency would mean default on the public debt, in which is now invested a great part of the security of the American public. Confiscation would mean socialism, and default would mean national bankruptcy."

It is under these conditions that we face the prospect of a third world war, with a national debt of nearly $260,000,000,000, as compared with $60,000,000,000 at the beginning of World War II.

If world war III comes shortly and we win it, we shall be ruined economically. If it is deferred for a number of years, it is probable that we shall also be ruined economically; for there is little chance of raising sufficient revenue to meet the increased costs of either a long cold war or a series of wars with Russia's satellite nations. This certainly could not be done with an administration which insists, even in the face of a growing deficit, on politics and handouts as usual, and opposes every constructive effort to eliminate nonessential expenditures. The inevitable result will be the serious impairment, if not the virtually complete destruction, of the purchasing power of the dollar.

As a result of the amazing stampede on the part of Congress to give to the President at this time dictatorial powers over our economy, we appear on the verge of becoming a regimented state, which is what the Socialist planners, of course, desire. If this step is taken, it may be found difficult, if not impossible, to prevent the complete conversion of the United States into a Socialist state, the goal of the New Deal administration for 17 years.

Perhaps it is too late to save the country from the impending ruin brought on by the New Deal administration. The only hope is to elect to office men who will put the good of their country above all else, men who will refuse to follow the New Deal Socialist line which has brought us to the brink of disaster. This applies not only to national but to State and local offices as well.

The Republican Party seems to be the only available agency to which to turn in this hour of need. Unfortunately, it has shown a lack of courage in the past in failing squarely and vigorously to oppose the New Deal's Socialist program. If the Republican Party is to survive, this course must be abandoned, and the issue must be squarely presented to the people of whether they shall have socialism or liberty.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT B. DRESSER.

The Statehood Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times entitled "The Statehood Bills" under date of September 8, 1950:

President Truman is right in pressing upon the Senate the urgency of the bills granting statehood to Hawaii and Alaska. This is obviously the psychological time for their passage. This action would put us in a stronger position in the Pacific when we need all the strength we can muster. It would be, in a very real sense, a closing of our ranks.

The support for these measures, both congressional and public, is widespread. They were adopted in the House by large majorities. It is believed that they can win overwhelming Senate approval if the Democratic policy committee permits them to come to the floor. The reasons for adoption are many and sound. The ground for delay at this point is flimsy and may possibly be unworthy.

It has been suggested that a long Senate debate might be precipitated at a time when some legislators are eager to get home to make political hay. This is not a valid excuse for sidetracking legislation that the country wants and that a majority of the Congress is ready to approve. Behind this suggestion of protracted debate is the more sinister thesis that the long objection will come from a small group of Democrats who fear that legislative representatives of Hawaii and Alaska would support the civil rights phases of the Truman program. It is certainly no display of statecraft to impede the legislation for Hawaii and Alaska in order to pander to the prejudices of a minority.

The President's appeal should be heeded. The measures should be brought out and adopted before any adjournment.

American Medical Association Attack Upon the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, there is a simple truth that needs constant repetition in these days of confusion and pressure. We must never lose sight of the fact that our democracy depends for its strength upon the wisdom of an informed people—a public that has access to the facts about important issues so that each American can weigh all sides of controversial questions and come to his own independent conclusions.

That independence of mind is America's greatest strength. It is not to be found under Communist or Fascist dictatorships. Anything that seeks to undermine that independence, that seeks to substitute manufactured stereotypes for independent opinion seeks, in effect, to weaken and erode our strength and to drug our minds.

AMA CAMPAIGN STARTS OCTOBER

To help preserve that independence of mind, I call attention to a forthcoming assault on American free thought which will be among the heaviest ever launched by powerful interests. I refer specifically to the forthcoming advertising campaign which the medical lobby will launch in the press and radio starting October 8, expending for this one month alone $1,110,000. That saturation campaign is designed to spread by massive injections of untruths, lies, distortions, and innuendoes a contagious infection among our people so that they will fall victim to the big-lie technique of the medical lobby's $100,000 a year propagandists.

These doctors of public opinion are seeking to doctor, drug, and slug the American people into believing the crude big lie that sickness is health; that insurance is socialism and communism; that the President's plan for National Health Insurance is socialized medicine. With 90,000,000 printed political tracts and diatribes and other special pieces of propaganda, these political medicine men are shouting from their million-dollar soapboxes, microphones and presses against health insurance.

The medical hucksters are not merely attacking the President's health program. They are not only attacking Federal aid to train more and badly needed doctors and health personnel. They are not merely attacking Federal aid to increase local health units in American communities throughout the land. They are not merely attacking disability insurance.

AMA CAMPAIGN AGAINST FAIR DEAL

No; they are using these needed legislative measure as springboards in a desperate effort to defeat all Fair Deal measures and supporters. This is a fight against progress itself in economic and social fields. The AMA is a Dr. Jekyll in the field of medicine; it is a rampaging Mr. Hyde about measures to meet human needs. Willfully suppressing independent-minded doctors, it is launching a million-dollar attack against the Fair Deal and against this administration and every Member of this Congress who supports the idea that we can hope and plan for a better life.

The magnitude of that campaign against progress can be realized from the outlined report of proposed action in Editor and Publisher of August 26, 1950, which in substance is quoted further on in this discussion. According to the medical lobby's chief propagandists, their saturation campaign is designed to invade every home where a newspaper, magazine, or radio can be found The combined weight of that attack undoubtedly is designed to have a narcotic effect upon the American mind, to deaden it with a platitudinous repetition of untruths and slanders, to inoculate it against the truth that the President's plan is the sound and sensible way to take the dollar sign out of sickness.

I submit that this spurious AMA campaign is a terrible threat to freedom of American thought. Let me document that statement and indicate the precise type of threat—a threat that is real and as dangerous and ominous as that of communism or fascism.

LOBBY SUPPRESSES LIBERAL DOCTORS

The medical lobby's huckster drive could only be launched through the curtailment of free thought among the medical profession itself. This million-dollar propaganda campaign struck first at the freedom of countless independent-minded doctors—the legion of those who do not accept supinely the canned and stagnant economic and political views of the AMA hierarchy. Our doctors were never asked whether they approved of such a campaign. Our doctors were never asked whether they want to contribute millions to play politics with health, whether they wanted to aline with and assess themselves $25 a year for such a low purpose. Our doctors were never permitted to say whether or not they would prefer to devote this money to furthering medical research, to the discovery of new drugs to ameliorate human suffering, or to the development of new programs to bring the miracles of modern medicine within the reach of every family.

No; our doctors were never asked what they thought of such a compulsory assessment to finance this huckstering campaign of misrepresentation against the spirit of liberalism itself. They were never asked because their disapproval would prevent such a campaign. Proof of that statement can be seen in the fact that in 1949, when the medical lobby first conceived of these $25 political-assessment dues, but on a so-called voluntary basis, more than one out of every three physicians did not pay up. And this refusal came in the face of tremendous pressures which a few leaders of the medical hierarchy can and did direct against the average hard-working, "nonpoliticking" doctor.

AMA PERMITS NO OPPOSITION

These independent-minded doctors never had a chance to assert their views about the monstrosity of being compelled to contribute to a corruption fund of more than $3,000,000 per year out of which $1,110,000 was to be spent in 2 weeks of October alone to promote a false and malicious huckstering campaign. The medical body arrogantly thrust aside such a plea from physicians that they be allowed to express their views through a secret poll. Instead, the medical lobby declared that any AMA member who did not pay the assessment would face the most stringent disciplinary action—loss of AMA membership. For many doctors this would amount to professional blacklisting, loss of hospital connections and perhaps the loss of most of their private practice. For the patients, for us who might count that doctor our family physician, it might mean that we could longer have his services.

SEEKS LOBBYING ALLIES

So with the independent-minded doctors bottled up, the medical lobby in a few short weeks shall soon launch its assault and thereby endanger freedom of though for all independent Americans. For the medical lobby is seeking to enlist millions of other dollars in tie-in advertisements and canned material. It is turning for support to many of the scarlet groups which always have money to spend to block liberal measures intended to meet human needs and to advance progress. The medical lobby is seeking out all the groups which support reactionaries—the backers of the Committee for Constitutional Government, the private utility lobbies. With their allies, they hope for tie-in advertisements which may reach the staggering cost of $19,000,000.

Think of that—a total of $20,000,000; over a million dollars from AMA campaign funds, and probably $19,000,000 tie-in advertisements; spent not for medical research, not to bring cancer or diseases of the heart, or arthritis or rheumatism, or cerebral palsy, under control. Twenty million dollars not spent for any of the other diseases that plague and cripple or kill so many millions, but spent for crass political attacks on health insurance, which as a part of the of the social-security system is intended to help the American people.

Thus, a $20,000,000 saturation campaign shall sweep through the United States shortly to form and manipulate mass opinion against its own self-interest.

Do not think for yourself, says the medical lobby insistently, from the paid columns of your daily and weekly paper: Insurance is socialism and communism. The President's plan for national health insurance is socialized medicine. Everything we do not like is socialism and communism.

What if we do not have enough doctors or hospitals? The medical lobby dismisses that as unimportant. Under the heading of socialism and communism they dismiss vitally important plans to help our medical schools out of their financial troubles. They ignore the pleas for Federal aid which would enable qualified young men and women to get medical training. Also ignored by the AMA are the desperate rural needs for doctors and their services.

To conceal its moral bankruptcy, the medical lobby is seeking to overwhelm every source of public expression, to shout louder and longer than all the forces of truth, to cry down all facts and saturate our eyes, ears, and our very minds with its all-pervasive cry of reaction.

And therein lies the grave threat to our independence of mind and advancement. Here we see propaganda's millons of dollars ranged against the pennies of truth in a death struggle. For days on end, there will be no escape from that raging fever of falsehood—on the air and in the press. By dint of repetition, the medical lobby hopes to corrupt all thought, stamp out all reflection, deliver us into the hands of hucksters.

If this campaign succeeds, then we shall witness the begining of a new and evil mechanism on the American scene—the unparalleled use of money to dominate and control all thought. Money—and money in staggering amounts—will be the open sesame to all future contests, for with enough money, selfish interests will feel able to mold public opinion as they will without fear of truth.

I do not think this evil day is yet upon us. It do not think that this raging fever of falsehood, injected by the medical lobby into the American body politic, can withstand the serum of truth. That is why I sound this warning and urge all forces of liberalism in this country to mobilize against the coming attack of the medical lobby.

I call upon our forces in the Democratic Party, upon all liberal-thinking Americans, upon the leaders of our free-trade unions, and upon our independent-minded physicians to help spread the truth to counterattack the lies of the medical lobby. We must not abandon the field to the forces of reaction. We must stand and fight.

For against the medical lobby's millions there is the antidote of truth. And that antidote can and must be spread by al of us who are dedicated to the welfare of our people, the progress and the satisfaction of their needs.

The article on the AMA campaign was published in the August 26, 1950, issue of Editor and Publisher.

Why Are American Soldiers Fighting in Korea?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, the question, Why are American soldiers fighting in Korea? supplying this statement with its title, has been propounded to me in letters received daily since the beginning of the fighting in the peninsula of Korea. It is a fair question. Every American citizen should have it answered fairly and to his or her satisfaction. The unprovoked invasion of South Korea is the latest Communist outrage against the United Nations and the freedom-loving peoples of the world, and should be recognized for what it really is. It is a flagrant act of aggression such as the United Nations is authorized, constituted, and pledged to resist, suppress, and punish, no matter when, where, or by what nation committed. It is an act of crass opportunism, not to mention a violation of the precepts that the Communists themselves had agreed to observe. It is well to review briefly the historical record. This shows that Russia—whose approval of the aggression is clearly indicated—has lost no opportunity to further its nefarious purposes by the same kind of opportunism.

The story of Korea cannot be related in a few words. Events leading up to the present situation in that unhappy country cover a long period of years, but for the purpose of this statement we will begin with the Japanese surrender in 1945.

Russia did not enter into the war against Japan until August 8, 1945, just 2 days before the Japanese announced their intention to surrender. In its declaration of war against Japan the Russian Government positively endorsed and reaffirmed the declaration made some time before at Cairo and restated at Potsdam that "the Japanese will be driven out of Korea and that country" (not part of it, but all of it) "will be made a free, sovereign, and independent nation."

Immediately following her declaration of war against Japan, Russia sent her forces sweeping down through Manchuria. By the time Japan was ready to surrender the Russian Army was in south Manchuria poised on the northern border of Korea, apparently ready to continue her sweep down across the entire Korean Peninsula. At this time, with the Japanese ready and willing to surrender at once their great army and all its equipment then in Korea, the United States had no troops in Korea to accept the surrender, in fact, none nearer than the Philippines. To solve the problem of accepting the Japanese surrender quickly and efficiently, the allies agreed—at the highest level—that Russia could take the surrender in Korea down to the thirty-eighth parallel of latitude, and that as soon as the United States could get her forces into Korea they would accept the surrender up to the line determined upon. The line was never intended to divide Korea, nor to have any political significance whatever.

The Russian forces moved immediately after making this agreement. They moved into Korea on August 12, 1945, but instead of stopping at the thirty-eighth parallel, they continued southward. The United States did not get her forces from the Philippines into Korea until September 8, 1945, nearly 1 month after the Russians moved in. Our forces, with great difficulty, forced the Russians to move back to the thirty-eighth parallel line. When they did move back, they at once clamped down the iron curtain exactly on the thirty-eighth parallel. And since that time, no American, official or civilian, no commission nor commissioner, no representative of the United Nations, no representative or citizen of any free country in the world, has been permitted to cross that line.

After the Russians accepted the surrender of the Japanese forces in Korea down to the thirty-eighth parallel, and closed down their curtain, the question of organizing and establishing a government for Korea came to the front. After a continuous but fruitless effort by the United States to work out with Russia a basis for unifying the country, the matter was taken up with the United Nations, and that organization agreed that all of Korea should have a representative self-government of its own choosing. This was approved by the United States. A commission was appointed by the United Nations and sent to Korea to assist in establishing a free government and to observe and see that free elections were held. The United States also sent a commission. The Russian Government established a similar commission, but that commission declined to function in respect to what is now South Korea. The Russians set up a Communist government in North Korea. This North Korean Government refused not only to take any part in the South Korean elections, but refused to let either the United Nations Commission, the United States Commission, anybody connected with either, or any representative of any outside nation or organization—other than communistic—enter North Korea.

There was, therefore, nothing left for the United Nations to do but to direct and supervise a free election for the establishment of a free, independent, democratic government in South Korea. This was done. The Republic of Korea came into being and was recognized by the United States and 26 other countries.

Under Russian direction, a North Korean Army, estimated to number 100,000, was organized, trained by Russian military experts and equipped, not only with arms and munitions taken over upon the surrender of the Japanese Army, but also with modern Russian tanks and other improved instrumentalities of war. Evidently believing this army to be strong enough to invade and take over South Korea, Russia withdrew her troops from North Korea.

In South Korea, the United States military mission had undertaken the task of training a security force sufficient to preserve internal stability and resist successfully sporadic raids from across the border. The force was not designed to resist a full-dress aggressor invasion such as occurred.

On the 25th day of June 1950, without any declaration of war, without notice or warning, a North Korean army of over 100,000 men, spear-headed by Russian-built tanks, swept across the famous thirty-eighth parallel into South Korea with the obvious intention of laying the country waste, destroying its government and forcing its people to accept the domination of communistic rule. The raid was patterned after that of Pearl Harbor, marked by similar elements of betrayal, surprise, and duplicity. Its initial success was, of course, costly to the cause of freedom the world over. It was a direct challenge, not only to the United Nations, but also to all free nations holding a membership in that body. Its final success would mean the collapse of the United Nations and would imperil every free nation throughout the world.

This treacherous attack presented the free world with two alternatives: The United Nations and its members, including the United States, must either lie down and tamely submit to Soviet domination, with the consequent loss of freedom and of our status as independent nations, or all must join with the United Nations in its fight to preserve a world in which men can be free. Under authority granted by its Charter, the United Nations called upon all of its member nations to join in the fight. The United States and other members have responded to the call.

Therefore, one important fact that should be known to every citizen of the United States, is that our country is not fighting in Korea alone. The war is that of the United Nations, and the flag of the United Nations flies above our troops by the side of the Stars and Stripes. Fifty-three nations of the world are our allies, and a number of these, including Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, France, and the Netherlands, have already sent contingents of troops, naval vessels, and air units to join us in the combat. Others have offered to send troops, while still others have offered important supplies. Altogether, 30 nations have offered assistance in various forms to the United Nations.

It has been said, and truly, that this is a fight for our very lives. We are fighting for our freedom and that of our families. We are fighting for the security of our Nation and of our homes. We are fighting for and with the United Nations—the world's one and last hope for peace. We are fighting for all freedom-loving peoples the world over. We are fighting for liberty against tyranny. We are fighting a battle against the most deadly enemy the free peoples of the world have ever faced, a battle we must not lose, a battle that, with our own might, the aid of our allies, and the help of the God of our fathers, we must win.

Coast Guard Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT C. BONNER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following transcripts of proceedings of the Chamber of Commerce of Washington, N. C.

COAST GUARD DAY

WASHINGTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, "THE ORIGINAL WASHINGTON," WASHINGTON, N. C., AUGUST 4, 1950, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY, COAST GUARD DAY

CLYDE HARRISON. We want to thank the people of North Carolina, of Beaufort County, Mr. A. B. Futrell, of the Washington Daily News, Mr. Jonathan Daniels, of the Raleigh News and Observer, radio station WRRF, and radio station WHED, to every single person in North Carolina who contributed some small part, we thank you very much; also to the Washington Park Garden Club for taking care of all concessions here in Washington Park today.

It is now a great pleasure of mine to introduce to you the honorable mayor of Washington, N. C, Dr. L. H. Swindell.

Dr. SWINDELL. Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, we are happy to have as our guests members of the Coast Guard. We are also happy to have with us today a man who has been always interested in the Coast Guard. He has done everything in his power to give the Coast Guard that to which they are justly entitled, and the Coast Guard loves him. He is not only interested in the Coast Guard but he is interested in the district which he represents, and he has served this district with honor and credit, not only to himself but to the State and Nation—our own HERBERT BONNER. We should be and we are very proud of the Coast Guard. They play an important part on the coast of North Carolina, more than we possibly realize. Therefore, it is a pleasure on behalf of the city of Washington and Beaufort County to welcome to Washington the members of the Coast Guard and distinguished guests who have come from near and far to celebrate the one hundred and sixtieth anniversary of the Coast Guard and make it one of the best in its history. I thank you.

CLYDE HARRISON. Thank you, Mayor Swindell. At this time we would like to recognize some of our distinguished officials sitting on this stand:

Maj. Gen. L. E. Woods, United States Marine Corps, commanding, Aircraft Fleet Marine Force, Atlantic, based at Cherry Point,

N. C. He is also commander of the Second Marine Corps Air Wing. Major General Woods.

Capt. L. H. Baker, United States Coast Guard, Commander Fifth Coast Guard District, Norfolk, Va. Captain Baker.

Capt. A. L. Ford, United States Coast Guard, Operations Division, Fifth Coast Guard District. Captain Ford.

Capt. S. C. Linholm, United States Coast Guard, Commanding Officer of the Elizabeth City Coast Guard Air Station. Captain Linholm.

Twenty-one years ago there was a man sitting on this stage who was chairman of such a celebration in our town—Mr. E. L. Roebuck. Today, 21 years later, we have his son, J. Max Roebuck, who is small in stature but big in civic and community affairs and who is the over-all chairman for Coast Guard day in Washington, N. C. Mr. Roebuck.

We also have with us today a man also small in stature but very large in community affairs and in his work. He has worked diligently with all of the committees to stage this big occasion. I now present to you the president of the Washington Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Jarl E. Bowers.

JARL BOWERS. Thank you, Clyde.

Friends, neighbors and guests, it is indeed a pleasure to welcome you to the original Washington and Washington Park on behalf of the Washington Chamber of Commerce and the good people of Washington Park for the one hundred and sixtieth anniversary of that great organization, the United States Coast Guard. We are very fortunate in having the Fifth Coast Guard District to celebrate their one hundred and sixtieth anniversary in our city. I consider the one man most responsible for having the Coast Guard bestow this honor upon us is our devoted friend and most capable Representative from the First Congressional District of North Carolina, the Honorable HERBERT C. BONNER. One of his many duties in the United States Congress is ranking member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. He is also chairman of the subcommittee on Coast Guard, and at this time I would like to turn the mike over to none other than our good friend, HERBERT BONNER.

HERBERT BONNER. Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, members of the United States Coast Guard and my friends: It is indeed a great honor that my home town has been selected as the site of this occasion. I would like to congratulate the town of Washington, and in particular the chamber of commerce, for their splendid work in making this day a great success. I am sure that a great deal of energy and effort has been put forth in preparation for the event. To all who have lent a hand we owe a debt of gratitude.

We today are gathered here to celebrate the one hundred and sixtieth anniversary of a great arm of our national defense; a service whose history reaches back to the beginning of these United States. During the 160 years of the Coast Guard's life it has grown from a tiny service created primarily to chase smugglers from our coast to an organization which perhaps has as wide a range of duties and responsibilities as any in our Armed Forces. In times of peace its men are called upon to police our shores and the navigable waters and to enforce the law on the high seas. To them the task also follows of manning the lifeboat stations, ships and air stations and be ever ready and diligent to answer any call of distress, whatsoever it may be A big part of their job is to keep accidents and disaster from occurring. One way it does this is by maintaining aids to navigation, such as lighthouses, lightships, land stations, radio beacons, buoy spot signals and guides to conduct ships safely into port through the darkness. In time of war, in addition to carrying on their peacetime functions, the men of the Coast Guard are called upon to guard the sea lanes for convoys, to man the landing craft that spearhead the invasion, and to man the troop transports that carry our men to the foreign shore. Throughout these years this noble service has written its record high in the annals of naval history. It has truly been a record of courage, sacrifice, valor, and honorable service. Perhaps it is fitting as we stand here today celebrating the birthday of this organization whose life parallels the growth and progress of our Nation that we reexamine the principles upon which this great Nation was founded. The men and women who settled this land from foreign shores sought a new kind of life. They sought a life of liberty. They sought a life that offered an opportunity to all men, regardless of race or creed. They sought a life which offered no fear of oppression from ruler or dictator. The story of America is indeed the story of the achievement of this new way of life. Today we, the American people, are faced with the most critical crisis in our history. I sometimes believe in my own heart that God Almighty destined the free American people to guard and protect the freedom of the other men and women throughout the length and breadth of the world. All of the institutions which are engrained in our heritage are being treated as they never have before. The immediate future is one of extreme sacrifice. We must call forth all our energies and resources to prepare for what threatens to be our greatest challenge. It is indeed a time of courage on our part. Many of our precious liberties will be suspended. Our men will be once again called to the defense of our country and the defense of other people who enjoy and desire both freedom and privileges that we are blessed with. Price control, wage control, and rationing are eminent. There is no place for selfishness and greed in this period. Hoarding and profiteering will not be tolerated. I repeat, hoarding and profiteering will not be tolerated. The men that stand in Korea today are not profiteering. The men that defend freedom in Korea today are not profiteering. They are offering their all that you might gather here as free men and women and that others around the face of the earth might have the privilege that you so enjoy. I sometimes feel that the great hope of the American adventure is that one day it will bring the sacrament of freedom to the people of the earth.

It is now my privilege to introduce a distinguished American. He is a native of the great State of Ohio. He attended the United States Coast Guard Academy at New London and began his career after receiving a commission as an ensign in 1921. Since that time he has served many a term both at sea and on shore. He early demonstrated his ability as an executive and an administrator and in the late twenties served as commandant of cadets at the Coast Guard Academy at New London. And let me pause here to say that in our midst today there are second-year classmen from New London—young men who will soon be the leaders of this great service—and to you, my friends and my home people, I ask that you be particularly hospitable to these young men today. The present speaker, after serving as commanding officer of several destroyers, was detached and transferred to Coast Guard Headquarters at Washington in 1937, where he served as technical adviser and was later sent as a delegate to the International Conference in England. During World War II he served as commanding officer of an attack transport and participated in amphibious operations in north Africa, Sicily, the Gilbert Islands, and the Marshall Islands. For his meritorious service during these assignments he was awarded the Legion of Merit and the Navy Unit of Commendation. Shortly after the war he was appointed Assistant Commandant of the United States Coast Guard and on October 12, 1949, he was nominated by President Truman to become Commandant. He took his office as Commandant on January 1, 1950. It is a high honor, a great privilege, therefore, to have here within our midst, and to me a personal pleasure, to introduce to you such an outstanding American, and a great defender of our national freedom. I present Vice Adm. Merlin O'Neal, Commandant of the United States Coast Guard.

Vice Adm. MERLIN O'NEAL. Thank you, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. Mayor, guests, fellow Coast Guard men, active and retired. Friends, to be with you today is not only a privilege but my pleasure. I have a particular reason for emphasizing this fact. All of us, of course, have birthdays. As we grow older many of us prefer to observe our anniversary more and more quietly in the faint hope that others will permit us to forget that passage of time, but today on this 4th of August we are celebrating one birthday with pride and acclaim—the one hundred and sixtieth anniversary of the beginning of the United States Coast Guard. Today, in fact, we mark the completion of another decade of its service to mankind and in any event, whether it is celebrated or merely observed, birthdays were intended to be spent impartially with those who wish us well. I count myself fortunate on this memorable occasion to be among friends of the Coast Guard. Congressman BONNER, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Coast Guard Affairs, is and always has been a stanch supporter of our service. He and Mrs. Bonner have shown their friendship by their gracious invitation to Mrs. O'Neal and to me to attend this celebration. There is something heartwarming about being invited home to meet the folks. The many courtesies that have been extended to us since our arrival here in Washington are greatly appreciated. There also has been a strong and close relationship between the Coast Guard and the State of North Carolina, particularly in the eastern part, in the tidewater part and the Outer Banks. It is the natural kinship that follows among men who love the sea and its traditions. I am reminded of several well-known families of North Carolina who have made the Coast Guard a career. Grandfathers, fathers, sons, uncles, brothers, nephews—even entire families have joined the service—a degree of participation of which no other State can boast.

CLYDE HARRISON. Thank you, Admiral O'Neal, for a very timely message. At this time we want to recognize Don Pierce, program director of Station WRRF, who will aid in the commentary on the events stated by the United States Coast Guard.

We are very fortunate today in having Lt. David Oliver, who has the reputation of being the crack helicopter pilot of the United States Coast Guard and who will explain to you the different events which are about to take place. It is a great pleasure to introduce Lt. David Oliver, of the Elizabeth City Coast Guard Air Station, Lieutenant Oliver.

Lt. DAVID OLIVER. Harrison's choice of articles was a little bit exaggerated—articles and also adjectives. However, I thank you for it. I am glad to be here. My job today is to explain to you and to keep you up with the events and give you a short glimpse of the Coast Guard equipment. Due to the river here being a far distance inland, we were unable to bring the Coast Guard cutter this close. That is one of the principal pieces of the Coast Guard equipment. However, we will mention them, and I am sure you are familiar with the Coast Guard cutters which do so many jobs on the high seas. Today, however, we will give you a glimpse of the work of the Coast Guard inshore and in these waters and areas around Washington. You have already seen some of the equipment on display, such as the Coast Guard vehicles, the Coast Guard dollies for handling boats, the line-throwing cannon north of the area here, the breeches buoy equipment which is mounted and strung from the trees to the west of us; also the amphibious vehicles, termed a "duck"—aptly so, although the spelling of it is "dukw"; "duck" fits very well for its pronunciation, and then the fine event of the day will be the boat race for the Josephus Daniels trophy, to be performed by the pulling, self-bailing lifeboats, which are now beached at the edge of the crowd. These boats in themselves weigh about 1,800 pounds, and with their occupants well over a ton, yet these sturdy oarsmen make these boats fly through the water at a speed of 7 knots—sometimes better. Today they will pull these boats through the water for 1 mile, capsize, and cross the finish line. May the best crew win. Also as a part of the Coast Guard equipment and a part of the event to be demonstrated is the aviation equipment and aircraft, which will be on the scene very shortly following distress signals as indicated from the Coast Guard boat a few yards off shore. To give you a sequence of the events—Mr. Pierce, would you like to follow through on that or shall I continue? Is Mr. Pierce around? Mr Pierce is unable to get up at present, so I will go ahead and give you a brief résumé. In just a few moments the cue to begin the event will be a distress signal indicated by a flare from the Coast Guard boat directly behind the reviewing stand. As soon as this flare goes off a PT 1-G four-engine search plane from Elizabeth City will come in and answer the call of distress.

We are now listening to the United States Marine Corps Band from Cherry Point, N. C.

Ladies and gentlemen, that is the Coast Guard marching song.

Unfair Draft Law Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. WILSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, my State of Oklahoma is being treated unfairly in the application of the draft-quota system under the Selective Service Act because of the refusal or failure of those in charge to grant my State full credit for men already called into service now, instead of some future date.

Mobilization of the Oklahoma National Guard and the Oklahoma Air National Guard, together with numerous Organized Reserve units of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, during the last few weeks has resulted in Oklahoma being required to send such a large number of her men into service at this time that my State has provided far above her fair share of the armed services manpower for the present moment.

In spite of these heavy calls, involving many thousands of men, the Selective Service System has announced Oklahoma draft quotas for as far ahead as next November without having granted Oklahoma any credit for this unusually high number of men already called.

I have joined in a demand that Selective Service withdraw these quota calls until these credits due my State are used up. My colleague, the Honorable TOM STEED, of Oklahoma, likewise is making a similar demand. The following editorial from the Daily Oklahoman, of Oklahoma City, titled "Steed Is Right" clearly presents the case for Oklahoma:

STEED IS RIGHT

Congressman TOM STEED insists that the War Department give Oklahoma credit for the thousands of Oklahoma National Guard men that are already in uniform. He suggests that no Oklahoma boys be drafted until the States which have no National Guard men in the service shall have supplied as many men in proportion to population as Oklahoma already has in the service.

According to the Shawnee Congressman's estimate Oklahoma will be required to supply five times as many men as other States of equal population whose National Guard men have not been called. Manifestly this would be unfair. Why should Oklahoma send five times as many of her sons to the service as the State which is not sufficiently alert to maintain an efficient National Guard?

For this suggestion STEED has been criticized sharply by the candidate who is opposing him in the November election. He charges that STEED is impeding the Government's effort to win the war speedily. We cannot see it that way. The Government could very easily increase the quota of the States which has sent no National Guard men into the service. And that would not be treating the other States unfairly. It would merely require the other States to do as much as Oklahoma has done already.

What if the Government should rely entirely upon the National Guard in the war that is now under way and draft nobody else at all? In that event Oklahoma and a few other alert States would have to do all the fighting and make all the sacrifices for the entire United States, and who could say that such a system as that would be fair?

Address of Hon. Frances P. Bolton, of Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. DAWSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks I include in the Appendix to the RECORD an address by the distinguished and beloved Member of this body, the gentlewoman from Ohio, the Honorable FRANCES P. BOLTON, before the sixtieth graduating class of Provident Hospital School of Nursing in Chicago, Ill., on September 7, 1950, in the First Congressional District of Illinois, which I am honored to represent:

Madam President, members of the board of trustees and faculty of Provident Hospital School of Nursing, honored guests, and you, the members of the sixtieth graduating class, it is indeed a signal honor which has come to me—that I should be invited to participate in these sixtieth commencement exercises of the Provident Hospital School of Nursing. * * *

Your invitation was an irresistible temptation, for not only has nursing and all that pertains to it long been one of my chief interests, but this particular school has been one whose work stands out—whose graduates are carrying the responsibility of leadership wherever they have gone. May I thank you once again for giving me the deep pleasure of coming to you on this commencement day.

I need not tell this distinguished gathering that Provident Hospital and Training School is unique, with its long service to the community at large and the high standards of its professional training. It stands alone in its position of prestige as a voluntary general hospital, maintained by the community- the first and still the largest Negro-staffed hospital in the United States.

How proud you must be that four out of every five Negro physicians in the United States who have been certified by specialty boards were trained right here at Provident. How proud—that the graduates of this school of nursing are in such demand from coast to coast!

I do congratulate you with all my heart.

In the early days the apprentice-trained nurse served the old-fashioned family doctor well—but the modern scientifically trained physician requires a much more technically trained person to work with him in the broader areas of the care of the sick, the prevention of disease and the wonder field of health.

Provident Hospital has kept pace with the need for more scientific training in magnificent fashion.

The quality of your officers and board members assures a continuance of the courageous recognition of the constantly increasing responsibility resting upon professional leaders in the field of health. The inspiration of your courage and that of your professional staffs reaches out much farther than you know.

May I thank you for being what you are!

It has been a very thrilling part of my life experience to have had a small share in the efforts that have brought the training of young women for nursing careers from the apprentice method to educational procedure.

Until 10 years ago when I was elected to represent the great Twenty-second District of Ohio in the Congress of the United States, nursing was my primary interest outside my home.

It began many years ago when Miss Mathilda Johnson, superintendent of the Cleveland Visiting Nurse Association, piloted a group of girls through our first experiences as volunteers in the districts. It continued during years of service on the board of trustees of old Lakeside Hospital (now part of the University Hospitals of Cleveland). Then, when World War I overtook us I was privileged to work very closely with Miss Annie Goodrich in establishing the Army School of Nursing. In World War II it was my bill that set up the United States Cadet Nurse Corps and made possible graduate and refresher courses to many nurses who came back into service when the need grew great.

I don't remember how many years ago it was that I first met Estelle Riddle, but I count it one of my great good fortunes to have done so. She is a woman of high courage who has achieved fine things not only for herself but for all Negro nurses. It was through her that I became associated with the National Association of Colored Graduate Nurses. Let me take this opportunity to congratulate the membership of this splendid association for the wise choice of leaders that gave you as your presidents Mrs. Riddle, Mrs. Staupers, Mrs. Vessells (now Mrs. Johns).

To these women and to the calm dignity and perseverance of the members of this association is largely due the integration of Negro nurses in the American Nurses Association. The doors have opened in all but a very few States. These will soon yield to wisdom, to understanding, and to an ultimate desire to be part of a great whole—that is inevitable. This has brought to me, as to you, a deep joy.

But I have not come here to speak only of my own interest in nursing. Rather have I come from Washington to talk with the members of this fine graduating class—a little about the profession they have chosen, and a little about the world in which they will find themselves as they step across this threshold of accomplishment.

Nursing has become a profession—and it offers a very wide field of opportunity, not just to the white nurse, but to the colored nurse as well. Little by little those who have preceded you have proven that Negro girls, given the necessary opportunity, can measure up to the ever increasingly high standards of today's nursing requirements. This marks a new era in which you younger women have the very real responsibility of maintaining the high standards that have been achieved.

You could not come through your years here as Provident, exposed to the fine quality of your teachers and of the professional men and women with whom you have been associated, without having absorbed something of their superior attitudes and capacities. You in your turn will carry the ideals of this institution and of your own dreams of service to ever wider horizons.

You are graduating at a moment when qualified nurses are needed as never before. Most of the barriers have been broken down and an integration not dreamed of even 10 years ago has become a reality. New fields hitherto closed are awaiting you as they are awaiting all nurses

In today's world, nursing training provides a woman with the tools for a career where new doors of opportunity are constantly opening, where the supply is so far less than all anticipated demand that jobs should be no problem for many years to come. This will mean better pay as well as higher standards of work. The ever increasing recognition by both the medical profession and the laity that the nurse has become in very truth the doctor's assistant. More and more hospitals in the building, more and more public health fields being developed, bring more and more demand for highly skilled, qualified professional personnel.

You young women, graduating today, step across the threshold of the Provident School of Nursing with great and grave resonsibilities, for you have had of the best—and privileges bring with them responsibilities.

First and foremost let me say that you must be and must continue to be tops as nurses, selfless in your work, ever more and more meticulous in your techniques. But to be real nurses you must be, first of all, real women—true to the highest ideals of womanhood Service must be your watchword; patience, tolerance, and understanding must be your guideposts on this way of your choice.

I am sure I need not remind you that you, who have received the highest standard of nursing training, have more than one contribution to make. With the traditions of this great hospital a part of your very bloodstream, you young women can play a splendid role in the growth of tolerance and of understanding. I feel certain that you will carry yourselves in all your life's contacts with a dignity that will of itself open wide such doors as may yet be only ajar. Using your woman's understanding you will go quietly out into a constantly more friendly world.

My privilege of service on the board of both Tuskegee and Meharry, as well as my contacts with all phases of nursing in this country and abroad, has given me the sense of the almost limitless need for you.

Let me mention some of the fields of opportunity that lie before you: Institutional nursing in ever broader fields as one State after another opens its doors to you.

The Indian Service is a fascinating Government service that needs women of high standards, qualified in all branches of nursing.

Veterans' Hospitals, too—and the Public Health Service—and nursing in the armed services.

Here let me pay tribute to that fine group of Negro nurses I had the privilege of reviewing in England as they were about to take over the nursing of one of our hospitals. They were pioneers; to them is largely due the affirmative answer of the question "Should there be Negro nurses in the Army?"

Nor can I refrain from taking this opportunity of expressing appreciation of the brilliant performance of the nurses who went out from this country under the command of Maj. Mary Mills, this group established a record which has won the wide attention in medical circles, to such a degree have they reduced the maternal death rate and the incidence of malaria. This is such a splendid evidence that the American nurse is doing outstanding work wherever she goes. With such a training as yours, and with the experience you can have in this country in public health work, in administration, in teaching, you will find yourselves needed in ever increasing numbers everywhere.

To this end I would urge you to take every opportunity to learn wherever you can, broadening your knowledge, perfecting your techniques, so that when a larger opportunity for service knocks you may be equipped and ready to open the door.

City and State hospitals in many sections of the country are opening their doors to Negro nurses and doctors. Privately financed hospitals and nursing schools are no longer closing their doors to adequately prepared young people.

Yes—the world is opening before you, its privileges, its obligations and its responsibilities are falling more and more upon your shoulders. So be sure those shoulders are elastic and strong, be sure your hearts are pure, your souls anchored in the Almighty God, for it is His work you are called upon to do in these days when the powers of darkness are reaching out ruthless hands to destroy those who believe in Him.

For a few minutes I want to talk to each of you apart from your companions, from your faculty, apart from this great gathering of your friends and the friends of Provident Hospital. I want to address myself to each of you, in the innermost recesses of mind and heart into which I cannot see, yet where the real you lives.

What I want to say is to each of you as Americans with the peculiar responsibility that rests upon you because of this fact. As a Member of the United States Congress and a fellow American I would speak earnestly to you in this hour.

This America of ours is a young and wonderful country- no where in all the world has so much opportunity been made possible to so many people. Oh, we have a long way to go yet if we are to realize the dreams of those who came to these shores centuries ago in search of freedom. But we have already come far—so far that the free world looks to us not only for the material things that we have learned to produce in such abundance, but most of all perhaps for leadership. Only a united people can give the leadership the world so sorely needs. To move forward together, knowing that we are one people with many different kinds of contributions to make to what will someday be the country, the Nation where there remains no person without opportunity, without the chance to be born with a healthy body and a clear mind, to live where the sun can shine, where children can grow up in decent surroundings, to have such education as each can absorb, to be able to work to one's full capacity for only in work is there joy and satisfaction. Then in addition to have a chance to laugh, to weep, to sit in the sun, and to be grateful to God.

That is my dream for America—that is the goal toward which my life is aimed. Isn't it yours?

This is a moment of great opportunity—of great responsibility for us all. You girls have chosen a life of service to humanity. The profession you are entering is, of all professions, the most suited to a woman. What you do as a member of that profession will give relief and help to many. But it is what you do as human beings as citizens of this, our beloved country, that matters most of all. Your training and experience in this great hospital sets you apart for the responsibilities of leadership. In your profession there is no place for selfishness. You are consecrated to service by constant giving, to a continuation of learning by doing, a never-ceasing outpouring of your own need to help the suffering, to teach ways of life that mean health and happiness.

In your life as an American citizen you have even greater responsibilities, for there it is what you are that matters.

Professionally you will join and work with the groups which do most to promote that profession. You must build your own advancement by continuing study, by research, by practice, adding to your capacity for service through each new experience.

As Americans you cannot escape the responsibility of protecting the principles of freedom which are American—principles which will bring opportunity in proportion to our use of them

May I tell you from my heart what I believe is the most fundamental challenge before us all? We must get away from thinking and acting from a racial point of view. I say to you as I say to myself daily, and would like to say to every man and woman in this country: Whatever your race, your creed, your sex, think as an American. Act as an American. Be an American.

You, who are of the Negro Americans, have so much of which you can be proud. It is for you to live so that you in your turn will build respect for yourselves and for your race through efficiency in your own field of endeavor. Those who have gone before you, hewing a path through the wilderness, have built a broad highway for you. Be worthy of their agonies—be proud of such heritage.

But remember that roads must be kept in good condition. The road ahead for this country of ours and for God's world is through dark and dangerous country. We shall need all our vision, all our wisdom, all our capacities combined, to get out beyond the darkness.

Negro Americans have taken their place in the field of science, of law, of medicines, of nursing, in sports, in teaching, in the arts. And while I speak of the arts let me say that while it is a disappointment to me as I know it is to everyone here that Etta Moten is not here to sing to us, we do join in congratulating her and that splendid American, who is her husband—Claude Barnett, head of the Associated Negro Press—in recognition she has had from the Theater Guild.

And as I think of her I think of Katharine Dunham and her contributions to the dance, of Zelma George and her truly wonderful work in The Medium, of a lad at Karamu House whose every motion is beauty. Oh—of many more of whom America is justly proud.

Yes—recognition has come to Negroes in every field of human endeavor.

You are part and parcel of the most wonderful country in all the world—America.

Very little more than the foundations have been built yet—the walls are only just coming up above ground. Part of those walls are for you to build—and the material must be strong, the work must be well done. Only teamwork will make the building hold together—teamwork and a flaming faith in the principles of true freedom under law—not under man, that is America's destiny.

I have been in a good many countries before World War II, during World War II and after it, including Russia in 1945. Never anywhere have I seen the kind of freedom we have in America. Yes, we have injustice here still, we have poverty here still. But we are doing something about it. And we believe that the individual has importance, that he has rights and that his Government must uphold those rights.

The discrimination and the segregation that has existed all too long in America, in fast disappearing, not because of laws but because we who are all Americans are learning a new respect for each other. We are discovering that only a true unity will give us the strength we must have to survive in the great struggle that has begun between those who believe that all men and women are God's children, precious in His sight, and those who have made the power of the state their God and consider the individual only as a tool of that power.

The history of man on earth and his efforts to govern himself has proven that power in the hands of the few is and always has spelled death to freedom. This great Nation of ours is founded upon knowledge of that fact and the consequent principle that the people can govern themselves. For this end a government was formed in which power is divided into three parts so that no one of them can grow too strong. We must keep it so.

These principles are our security as free people. It is our responsibility to preserve them, to build their strength.

It is our responsibility, also, to build what some call a new social order, but which I believe to be the goal set for us by those who gave us our Constitution and Bill of Rights, within the broad framework of this Constitution.

Promises won't give it to us. And what beautiful promises we hear every day and all night, on television, over the air, in the moving pictures and the newspapers, and out of the mouths of many. Why should we trade the record of achievement we have made under our Constitution in these one-hundred-and-seventy-odd years for any promises? Personally I do not believe any thoughtful American would, once he looks at the facts. I believe that what has been called progressive thinking and doing is more possible under our representative Government than under any other government on earth. Evidence of this is on every hand.

I have learned something of the dangers that lie in diverting one's energies away from one's work by joining this group or that group. If I have any advice for you it is to keep yourselves free. Don't be known as a joiner—be yourself. Don't let yourself be a fanatic on any subject—keep a balance so that you will be known as a woman of sound judgment and common sense. You will, of course, want to be part of certain professional organizations. You will want to associate yourself with one of the two great political parties—for through this competitive method we have the best means of protecting our governmental machinery from being taken over too permanently by any one group. Most of all you will want to make yourself and your particular segment of the many people of which our Union of States consists, self-sufficient so that you walk with your heads high as truly free people walk. May joy be yours in the doing.

It is now my very pleasant privilege to congratulate you upon your attainment and to wish you deep inner satisfaction in the career of nursing that you have chosen. To me there is no finer professional path for women to tread. Not only does it offer you a career of practically limitless opportunity, but it provides an outlet for all that is essentially womanly in your nature.

What a curiously passionate desire there is in every woman's heart to relieve pain and ease suffering. What a deep inner urge we have, we women, to create and recreate God's children.

Let me say again that to me there is no field so filled with opportunity for a woman as in nursing. To me there has never been a better preparation for living than that which makes possible a career of nursing. In our modern world of science and scientific method training in the nursing field opens up whole new vistas of woman's service to mankind.

As a long-time worker in the fields of public health, of nursing education, of wartime needs, and as a woman just a few years ahead of you in the great adventure of life and living, I take great pride in you and congratulate you upon your success as students in this great school of nursing. Your diplomas have been won through effort and self-discipline. You alone know at what cost. May they be to you always the symbol of an attainment of which you can be very proud. May they stand for all that is best in your womanhood. May they be as a crown upon you as you assume the privileges and the responsibilities that are now yours.

Your country needs the service you are prepared to give. She needs your loyalty—she needs each one of you in these days of world confusion, of world problems.

I would say to you at this rather breathless moment when you step out into that world in which we as individuals and as a nation must build our own security this is a time when we must unite that we may be strong against the power of men who have denied the Infinite God, setting up the state in His place, using the individual as tools to build a ruthless central power. Our strong defense is our passionate belief in the wonderful certainty that we are all children of Almighty God and the determination to unite under His banner, praying that we may prove ourselves as individuals and as a free nation worthy to do His work.

May He bless and keep you in the life of service you have chosen.

We Have What It Takes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, September 10, 1950, at Asbury Park, N. J., contestants from all over the United States competed for the title of Mrs. America. Honey-haired Betty Eileen McAllister of Johnstown, Pa., was the unanimous choice for Mrs. America of 1950. This was the first beauty contest Mrs. McAllister had ever entered. The holder of the title Mrs. America of 1950, is 25 years of age and the mother of two fine, lovely children, Marvel Lee McAllister, age 5, and William P. McAllister, age 3.

It is a matter of importance for all concerned that this vivacious mother was selected not alone for her pulchritude, but for her ability as a housewife. To demonstrate her housekeeping ability, Mrs. America broiled meat along with other finalists as the judges and some 8,000 spectators looked on. The judges smacked their lips and after tasting of her Johnstown cooking unanimously awarded her the trophy.

Mrs. McAllister, in commenting upon her being awarded the title of Mrs. America of 1950, stated that "a thing like this makes me feel as dizzy as the day I was married." She remarked that her victory "will be perfect only if my husband does not get jealous." There is no doubt in anyone's mind that Mr. McAllister will not get jealous, as it was his idea for his wife to enter the contest.

While Mrs. America of 1950 has created a great deal of furore among the people of the Nation, the residents of Johnstown do not understand why all this undue fuss and furore, because it has always been obvious to Johnstowners that the best looking, best cooking, best all-around wives in America come from that city. Furthermore, I defy the husbands anywhere in the United States to challenge that statement. The mere fact that the rest of the country is not able to understand this fact is because there are many unenlightened people who have not had the privilege of living in Johnstown.

I extend my congratulations to Mrs. Betty Eileen McAllister for showing to America that Johnstown does have superior wives, who are superior in every respect.

Power in the Pacific Northwest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOWELL STOCKMAN
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Speaker, with this country again becoming involved in an emergency situation, I believe it is time to reexamine our power potentials in order to determine the adequacy of our power situation if a full emergency comes upon us—if we are again engaged in a major conflict of nations. During World War II the production of this country attained heights never before thought possible, and it has been said, with complete truth, that the war was won by production. This is not intended to deprecate the valiant service of our fighting men but, without the materials for war, the victory would have been impossible.

One of the major producing areas of critical materials during the last war was the Pacific Northwest and, since I am from that region, I am particularly desirous of reviewing our present situation from a power standpoint.

When the actual emergency came upon us, precipitated suddenly by the attack upon Pearl Harbor, it was found that vast new sources of power were needed in order to meet the requirements of all-out war production. Certainly a tremendous increase in power consumption occurred. World War II began in 1939, and this country became involved in December of 1941. It was over in 1945. During that period, total power production increased 75 percent. A substantial amount of that increase was for war production. In the Pacific Northwest, consumption of electric power between 1940 and 1945 more than doubled, the peak consumption actually being reached in 1944, at which time power consumption in the Pacific Northwest was 240 percent of the 1940 usage.

The impetus of the war period produced a continuing expansion of power needs, so that by 1949 the annual energy consumption was approximately 3½ times the usage in 1940. This upward trend in power requirements is expected to continue and, based on a normal peacetime expansion of regional economy, it is anticipated that power requirements in 1958 will be double the requirement of 1949. I must emphasize again that this is based on a peacetime expansion. Furthermore, I would like to point out that these requirements will only be met by the initiation of new power projects in the Pacific Northwest as outlined in what is termed schedule S, a schedule of dam construction and generator installations that has been agreed upon between the Bonneville Power Administration, the Corps of Engineers, and the Bureau of Reclamation. The Bonneville Power Administration has informed me that, based on this schedule of generator installations, it will still be 1958 before reasonable reserve of firm power will be available to the Pacific Northwest, again based on a peacetime economy.

The dates for completion of projects in this schedule are later dates than were formerly contemplated in previous schedules. These dates have had to be moved up because of lack of funds and authorizations to initiate construction in accordance with these former schedules. That is one of the basic reasons why we now have a severe power shortage in the Pacific Northwest that is going to continue under the most optimum conditions until at least 1958.

Now what are the prospects for schedule S being followed so that we can have some reasonable assurance that in 1958, again on a peacetime basis, we will have ample power. In this schedule there are some 22 projects. In addition, one dam is entirely completed and in full operation. I would like to review the status of some of the major projects in this schedule.

The one dam that is completed and operating is the Bonneville Dam. It has been operating at peak capacity for a number of years. Grand Coulee Dam has also been producing power since 1941, but it is not completed. At the present time 14 generators—incidentally, the largest hydroelectric generators in the world—are installed, the fourteenth having been installed in July of this year. The fifteenth generator is scheduled for installation in October of this year, with the three remaining generators to be installed during 1951. Hungry Horse Dam in northwestern Montana is under construction, with the first generator scheduled to be operating in 1952 and to be completed in 1953. This is a most important project to the Bonneville system. Installed capacity will be 285,000 kilowatts but, more important than the generation from this plant, is the water storage that will firm up some 400,000 additional kilowatts at plants on the main stem of the Columbia River.

Another important project is the Albeni Falls project in northern Idaho, for which this body approved funds to initiate construction in the supplemental appropriation bill passed a few days ago. By initiating construction this year, the first benefits from this project will be available in 1952. This project is somewhat similar to the Hungry Horse project, in that its water storage for firming of power downstream is the most important part. Installed capacity will be 42,600 kilowatts, to be available by 1955. However, the water storage will firm power to the extent of some 140,000 kilowatts at downstream plants when they are in operation. Another plant now under construction and of the utmost importance is the McNary dam, scheduled to begin operations in December of 1953 and to be fully completed in December of 1957. Installed capacity of this plant will be 980,000 kilowatts when it is finally completed in 1957, and it will be a most important addition to the power supply of the region. Another smaller project is also under construction on the Willamette River in Oregon. This project is the Detroit Dam, and it is scheduled for completion in 1953, with installed capacity being 100,000 kilowatts. One more dam of major importance is under construction. This is the Chief Joseph project, to be located downstream from Grand Coulee on the Columbia River. However, first generation from this project will not be available until December of 1956, and it will not be completed until April of 1961. Installed capacity of this plant will be approximately 1,000,000 kilowatts.

All of these plants, taken together, represent a sizable addition to the power supplies of the region but, as presently scheduled, they will be insufficient to completely solve the power problem in this area, as all of the firm power from these projects will be absorbed as rapidly as it is brought into production and will still leave a major deficit.

What of the other projects contained in this schedule? There is presently authorized for construction, four projects on the Lower Snake River, known as Ice Harbor, Lower Monumental, Little Goose, and Lower Granite. Three of these projects are contained in this schedule, Ice Harbor being scheduled to begin production in August of 1955, Lower Monumental in December of 1956, and Little Goose in December of 1957. However, to meet these dates, funds must be made immediately available to begin construction of Ice Harbor. Lower Monumental must be started by July of 1952, and Little Goose by July of 1953. It appears at this moment as though these schedules will not be maintained inasmuch as this body denied funds for the start of Ice Harbor, which request was contained in the supplemental appropriation passed a few days ago. These plants, particularly the Ice Harbor Dam, are extremely important because their geographic location is such as to support power needs near the southern end of the Bonneville system and in the center of the Pacific Northwest region. If these projects do not come into operation as scheduled, it is going to mean continued power shortage, as well as additional expenditures for transmission facilities to transmit power from other projects into this general area.

Another most important project in this schedule is the Hells Canyon plant, which would be located on the Oregon-Idaho border, making it doubly important to my district. This plant is contained in schedule S and is scheduled to begin operation in 1957 and to be completed in 1960 but, to meet this schedule, it should be started this year, whereas the project is not even authorized for construction. Other projects in this schedule, such as the Upper and Lower Scriver plants, Libby Dam, Garden Valley and Palisades, are also required since they will all play their part in providing adequate power supplies in order that we may overcome by 1958 the power deficit now existing. However, several of these plants are not even authorized, which makes it appear at this time as if these schedules will not be met, thus continuing the power shortage in the Pacific Northwest.

There are other plants authorized for construction in this area, which plants were authorized in the rivers and harbors bill passed by this Congress a few months ago. Some of these plants are John Day and The Dalles on the lower Columbia River and Cougar, Green Peter and White Bridge plants in the Willamette Valley. No particular proposed schedules have been set up for construction of these projects. However, they can become important power producers in this region.

I have pointed out that the present schedules for hydroelectric projects are based on a normal economy. If, however, full mobilization of production for national defense becomes necessary, our power needs will expand much beyond normal requirements. If we take the experience of the last war we can determine that several million kilowatts of installed capacity will be needed over and above those presently scheduled. For this reason, work on plants already under construction should be expedited, where possible, and new plants should be started immediately in the Pacific Northwest in order to be assured that sufficient power will be available for whatever needs may arise. The schedules that I have given you can be expedited. It has been estimated that over and above present schedules, an additional two to three million kilowatts can be brought into operation in the Pacific Northwest by 1955 if authorizations and funds become immediately available. I think that these steps should be taken. We do not know what faces us, but we cannot afford to depend on having time available in which to expand our production machinery after the emergency is upon us. During World War II such time was available to us before it became necessary to make an all-out fighting effort.

We may not have that much time available the next time and such plans as are needed to insure our complete security should be made and implemented at once.

Some of the Nation's most important defense industries are located in the Pacific Northwest. One of our atomic energy plants is there, and nearly half of the aluminum producing capacity, which metal is badly needed in time of war. Other electrometallurgical process plants, such as magnesium plants and ferro-silicon plants, are also located there, and in the event of an emergency, requirements of these critical materials will greatly expand and the power must be available to permit this expansion.

Another important consideration in the Pacific Northwest is the transmission lines needed to carry this power to load centers. At the present time there is absolutely no reserve of transmission capacity. New lines will be started during this fiscal year, but these lines will be barely enough to transmit the power that will be brought into operation. During the past year we have had several severe system break-ups, resulting in power failures all over the Northwest because there was not sufficient transmission reserve to overcome normal operating hazards. Operating conditions that require transmission lines to carry as much as twice their rated capacity is a definite hazard and must be eliminated as early as possible. Loss of an important grid line through either normal operating hazards, sabotage or enemy action, could have very serious consequences if conditions as presently exist are allowed to continue in a time of national emergency. Such conditions should not be permitted at any time.

It is further indicated, if we are thinking in terms of insuring the national security, that present schedules for construction of transmission lines and substations must be accelerated. The southwest Oregon loop line, for which funds were appropriated during this fiscal year, is intended not only to increase power supply to the southwest Oregon area but is intended to integrate the power resources of that area with the rest of those in the Pacific Northwest in order to make more firm power available. This line is presently scheduled for completion in December of 1953, but definite advantages to the region and to the Nation can be gained by bringing this line into operation at an earlier date. I believe that this should be done if it proves feasible. I supported the request for appropriations for this line because of my realization of the great need for additional power supplies in the southwest Oregon area and, further, by the fact that the people of this part of our State have yet to achieve any of the benefits accruing from low cost Federal power which are available to other parts of the Pacific Northwest. These benefits should be brought to these people at the earliest possible date, and I intend to do everything possible to bring about this result.

I must also say a few words about another important facet of this power situation in the area. This has to do with funds provided for operating and maintaining a system as large and as far-flung as this one is. Additional transmission lines are a dire necessity, but funds to maintain existing transmission lines are equally important. In past years the Bonneville Power Administration has not had sufficient funds to properly maintain and operate this system, and these conditions must be changed before any emergency is upon us. When one realizes the many hazards to service that can exist from incomplete maintenance and undermanning of operating staff, it becomes inexplicable that such funds are so restricted. At the present time there are substations operating on this system completely unattended where an operator should normally be present. Many major substations are undermanned by from one to four people. Under such conditions, maintenance of reliable service is very difficult and the length of outages is prolonged.

Maintenance schedules must be accelerated. Control equipment must be checked at very frequent intervals. Improper operation of a single relay can upset the entire northwest power pool, and the only way to insure adequate operation of control equipment is by adequate maintenance and test of this equipment at frequent intervals. Line patrols must be maintained constantly, and sufficient funds must be available for this purpose. Danger trees must be removed from rights-of way; adequate weed-abatement programs must be maintained at all times in order to avoid weed infestation of agricultural areas.

The Bonneville Power Administration has done a marvelous job within the funds available to them, but at the present time there is a seriously great backlog of such work that must be reduced at the earliest possible time, making it mandatory that adequate funds be made available for this purpose.

I am told that the Atomic Energy Commission is very much concerned over certain conditions existing on the Bonneville system resulting from a lack of operation and maintenance funds. They are very much concerned over the recent outages that have occurred, some of which at least could have been prevented if stricter operation and maintenance schedules could have been maintained.

Yes, there are many aspects to national security. Power is the very lifeblood of national security, and without it national defense would be an impossibility. We think normally in terms of power supplies available. Obviously this is a primary consideration but, unless this power can be transmitted to the location of manufacturing plants, it would be of no value. Therefore, security requires equal consideration of adequate transmission facilities and adequate maintenance of those facilities. I think that a large part of the reason why Bonneville has been able to get by with as little difficulty as they have is because this system is new, thus requiring less actual maintenance than required when the system becomes older. Much of the system is now over 10 years old, and this in itself means that a greater degree of maintenance activity is required. We cannot continue to maintain an aging system on a new-system basis, and these conditions definitely cannot be carried into an emergency period.

I would like to mention one further aspect of this entire situation which is very important. During the last war, this Government spent billions of dollars in loans, grants, and subsidies to obtain critical materials as needed. Much of this expenditure was not recoverable. We can avoid such expenditures in the future by planning ahead, and the investments required for the power producers and transmission lines that I have outlined herein will not be in the nonrecoverable category. Even without a national emergency, all of the power that we can bring into being within a reasonable time will be absorbed by normal domestic expansion if the ultimate war emergency does not come upon us. All of the projects that I have outlined are completely feasible from a financial standpoint, and the experience to date indicates that all investments of the Federal Government in such plant will be returned to the Federal Treasury and with interest. Not a dollar will be wasted if plans are made now to provide these power supplies. We thus not only insure that adequate facilities are available to take care of whatever defense needs exist, but we also insure adequate power supply to support the domestic economy of one of the most rapidly growing regions of this country.

Power development in the Pacific Northwest must not be a war casualty, for any conceivable war effort that may be necessary for the preservation of this country, hydroelectric power is indispensable in meeting the challenge. It is just as vital as tanks, planes, and guns, and much more time is required to make it available. Planning for wartime emergency must of necessity include, expand, and give priority to power dams on the Columbia and its tributaries, the Nation's greatest potential source of hydroelectric power.

Marshall Will Take Orders From Acheson—More Appeasement Is in Order

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I am including a broadcast by Mr. Fulton Lewis, Jr., which was presented over radio station WEAM on September 13. Mr. Lewis has correctly analyzed the situation in the resignation of Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson and the appointment of George Marshall to be the new Secretary of Defense. I commend this radio talk to all Members of this body:

In Washington, the sudden resignation of Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson in favor of Gen. George Marshall has proved to be something of a bombshell and congressional quarters generally are still stunned and dazed. The White House, apparently hoping to push the necessary legislation for the nomination through as quickly as possible before any major opposition can crystallize, had letters waiting at both Armed Services Committees this morning requesting immediate legislation to exempt General Marshall from the provision written into the Defense Unification Act of 1947, forbidding any person who has been in the Armed Services within the past 10 years from holding the job of Defense Secretary.

With the letters went drafts of the proposed special legislation and before noon the Senate Armed Services Committee, under the ever-cooperative Senator MILLARD TYDINGS, of Maryland, had approved the bill by a vote of 10 to 2. The two opposing votes came from the only two members of the Armed Services Committee who served actively in the last world war, during which General Marshall was Chief of Staff, Senator HARRY CAIN, of Washington State, and Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND, of California, both Republicans. They explained that they had nothing against General Marshall personally, but, said Senator CAIN—I cannot conceive of any emergency in fact or in prospect that justifies the waiving of this provision adopted under cool deliberation at the time the Unification Act was passed.

He said that to have inserted such a proviso and then the first time an appointment is made to cast it aside, makes no sense. If it was a wise precaution then, he said, and we all agreed that it was, then it is a wise precaution now.

Senator KNOWLAND said that it is preposterous to say that out of 150,000,000 American people the only person who can hold the job as Secretary of Defense is General Marshall. The requirement that the Defense Department be under a civilian head, he said, is a fundamental part of American philosophy.

Actually the talk about the 10-year provision was not the real concern when you got behind the scene. The real issue, although few Members of Congress have yet screwed up the courage as of this afternoon to bring it into the open, is the fact that General Marshall is in the vest pocket, so to speak, of Secretary of State Dean Acheson, so far as far eastern policy is concerned, and for him to go in as head of the Defense Establishment means that Mr. Acheson will have in the future complete and unchallenged authority over the far eastern policy, military as well as diplomatic, and the far eastern defenses of the United States will be dictated not by the military but by the State Department. In short, Mr. Acheson, with his long-time carefully planned program of appeasement of the Chinese Communists, will have at the head of the Department of Defense a 100-percent cooperative partner.

Remember, it was Mr. Dean Acheson, who, as Under Secretary of State, coached and instructed General Marshall on his ambassadorial mission to China at the close of the war, on which occasion General Marshall tried to force Chiang Kai-shek to accept the Communists into the Nationalist Government despite the rapid-fire series of object lessons in Europe as to what happened every time that was done. In no time flat the Communists had seized the entire government.

And it was Dean Acheson in the same position as Under Secretary of State who constantly shuttled back and forth to the White House all the time that Secretary of State James F. Byrnes was in Paris, and during the course of that shuttling succeeded in undermining Secretary Byrnes with President Truman to the extent that Byrnes got home to find himself out, and General Marshall took his place.

While the general was Secretary of State, Acheson remained on long enough to make sure that his position in favor of the Chinese Communists would not weaken, indeed that the general's attitude would strengthen, then returned to his law practice with the firm for which he had okayed as Secretary, a $90,000,000 loan to Communist Poland for the purpose of arming the Communist police force and for which the law firm got a fee of $50,000,. Then when General Marshall resigned as Secretary of State he recommended to the President that Acheson be recalled from private life and made Secretary.

That's the array of facts which was causing the real worry in Congress today, those plus the lesser background on the picture, the testimony on record, that back in the early 1940's Dean Acheson was listed as the head of the pro-Communist clique in the State Department. He had with him his protegé, Alger Hiss, and around them, or reporting to them from the field, were Owen Lattimore, John Carter Vincent, John Stuart Service, and John P. Davies, the latter two of whom Pat Hurley sent home from China because of their pro-China affiliations.

The whole crowd of those who were propagandizing in favor of Communist China, including the Amerasia magazine crowd in New York on whom were cause some 1,800 secret and confidential State Department documents. It was the crowd that worked its way into such a position in the State Department that they constituted the line of information and advisors on China policy, and when Marshall came in as Secretary of State and obviously had to depend on existing channels of information, they were the ones who were there to supply it to him.

And those facts, those are facts which disagree seriously with the State Department's present commitment to remove naval forces from the protection of Formosa, as soon as the Korean difficulties are settled. Louis Johnson, leaning on the advice and counsel of General MacArthur, took issue with Mr. Acheson and the high councils of the administration, and has been taking issue with him for some months past. The normal expectation under the new set-up is that General Marshall will go along with Mr. Acheson and that General MacArthur's military advice is in the discard. All of which means, of course, inevitably, that Formosa is destined to fall to the Chinese Communists, particularly if they refrain from rocking the boat and agree and follow out the agreement to keep out of the Korean dispute

One of the few people who brought the matter into the open today was Senator JOE MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin. He says that unless he is convinced that General Marshall has learned the facts of life about the Chinese Communists, which he plainly did not know at the time of his disastrous mission to China after the war, when he went there loaded with secret instructions from Acheson that he, Senator MCCARTHY, will oppose the nomination. He said that as a diplomat General Marshall did as much to lose the war in the Far East as he had done as an outstanding general to win it.

So there it stands. The little clique that began at Yalta to sell out China to the Communists, Alger Hiss personally being the one who was the chief instrument in writing and selling that agreement to the ill President Roosevelt, the little clique that opposed military aid to Nationalist China and controlled the State Department when that aid was being delayed and delayed by the State Department until it was too late. They seem to have won the battle tonight and to have clear sailing in the future. Not that there is the slightest question as to the integrity or patriotism or honor or good intentions of General Marshall as a man or as an American. But the record is there. He did participate in the evolution of the policy, he was one of the cogs in the evolutionary machinery, he has played hand-in-glove with Secretary Acheson all the way through, and, if the truth were known, it was Secretary Acheson who was responsible for his appointment this time—not the retiring Secretary Johnson. That's the record—take it or leave it.

What Is There to Hide?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to direct the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives to an article which appeared in the American Federationist of September 1950. It is entitled "What Is There to Hide?":

WHAT IS THERE TO HIDE?

(By FRANK BUCHANAN, United States Representative from Pennsylvania; chairman, Committee Investigating Lobbying)

Most Americans think of lobbyists—if they think of them at all—as bag men tempting Members of Congress with offers of bribes, seeking to "buy" passage of certain legislation or defeat of other legislation.

This concept of lobbyists is completely out of date. It might have been true, and probably was true, 50 years or so ago when Members of Congress were very poorly paid and when the people back home had only the remotest idea of the day-to-day legislative battles in Washington

Today a Member of Congress operates most of the time in a white glare of publicity and public attention. His recorded votes on important issues and even his secret votes in closed committee meetings are flashed back home by the press and radio. Furthermore, the people back home take a direct and personal interest in almost everything that their Congressman does. They are interested because these things affect them all personally, and particularly in their pocketbooks.

Bribing a Member of Congress, therefore, to vote against his convictions or against the best interests of his constituents is not only illegal—as it always was, of course—but is also impractical and virtually impossible.

Nevertheless, this old concept of sinister lobbyists "buying" the votes or support of Members of Congress has persisted down through the years That has made the work of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities much more difficult than it should have been.

If lobbyists are not as a general rule sinister and corrupt characters seeking to subvert American democracy for the benefit of special interests, why is a committee of Congress—the committee which I direct—so interested and concerned about lobbying and lobbyists?

To answer that question I will have to explain just how lobbying works, 1950 style, what the lobbyists do and how they do it, and also why they do it that way.

The lobbyists you read about in Washington, the men who seem to wield mysterious powers in persuading Congressmen to vote for certain bills or against other bills, are slick professional persuaders. They are men—and there are some women among them—who know the technical side of their work thoroughly.

If they represent railroads they know the railroading industry inside and out. If their field is oil they know the merchandising end and the refining end and the producing end, and they may even know the geology of the business they represent.

If they represent labor unions, as many of them do, they know the labor field inside and outside and probably rose up themselves through the ranks of labor. That is particularly true among legislative agents in Washington of the American Federation of Labor unions.

Now what do these people do? They watch the Congress of the United States and the executive agencies—the administrative agencies downtown—like hawks. They study the bills that are introduced. They analyze those bills in terms of what the proposed legislation would do to the business or industry or interest they represent. Once they make an analysis they get the word back to their organizations and to the members of their organizations.

If the bill looks good from their point of view the lobbyists work out the strategy for supporting it. If it looks bad—if it looks as if it will hurt their profits, in the case of a business, or their wages and working conditions and negotiating strength, in the case of a union, or it might hurt their cause, in the case of a "cause" lobby—they line up the strategy of opposition.

No matter which side of the street they work—whether on the reactionary side or the liberal side, industry or labor—they generally get down to business in much the same manner.

They see members of the committees handling the legislation in Congress. They contact officials of the agency which would administer the law. They get their people back home to write, wire, telephone, or visit their Congressman. They make speeches. They get material in the newspapers and magazines and on the radio. They try to interest political leaders who, in turn, are urged to put pressure on Congressmen with whom they have influence.

In other words, the lobbyists make their cause as important to as many Members of Congress and to as many voters as they possibly can, often of much more importance than the matter deserves. Instead of buying the support of Members of Congress as the old-style, corrupt lobbyists of 50 years ago used to do, today's lobbyists try to sweep Congressmen off their feet with a deluge of arguments to prove their cause is a good one and in the public interest. If he doesn't support them in this cause, the Member of Congress is reasonably certain that he will have their vigorous opposition the next time he runs for office.

Well, what's wrong with that? There is absolutely nothing wrong with that. That is democracy in action, and I'm for it. Nevertheless, Congress does have a big problem where lobbyists and lobbying are concerned.

The more direct a role the Government plays in the daily lives of our people and in the health of our economy, and the more the world shrinks in size through advances in communications, transportation, and military science, the more important it is that the legislation we pass in Washington be honestly prepared and honestly discussed and fully understood. Similarly, the activities of lobbyists become of more direct significance to every voter and to every citizen.

For years Congress talked about putting lobbyists under some sort of control. The Constitution guaranties the right of petition, and lobbying is a form of the exercise of that right, so regulating lobbyists or restricting them in any way would be difficult if not impossible under our Constitution. Besides, it would not be a good thing, in my opinion.

But it is important—vitally important—that we in Congress and the people who vote for us and the men and women affected by the legislation we pass should know who those lobbyists are, whom they work for, what they are paid, and for what they spend money in connection with their work. We also have a right to know where the money is coming from that pays the lobbyists' salaries and expenses.

In the case of a business, a labor union, a trade association, or any organization of that caliber which is established for broad purposes, we know pretty well who they are and whom they represent and where the money comes from. But a good deal of the lobbying that goes on today is through high-sounding committees or foundations which profess to be operating in the public interest but which actually may be grinding axes for special interests.

Congress in 1946 passed a law to require lobbyists and lobbying organizations to come clean with Congress and the public by letting us know what the interests are behind them, where the money is coming from to carry on this work, how it is spent and how much is spent. That is all that the Lobbying Act requires.

In principle that act is a good one. In operation, however, it has not been as effective as it should be. There are still a lot of phony fronts which mask their true purposes behind a high-sounding name and don't report to Congress on what they are doing. When we pin them down, as we have done in the current investigation, they have often tried to wiggle out from under on the grounds that the precise language of the act does not apply to them. It is true, unfortunately, that the Lobbying Act has a lot of loopholes in it. And it has not been fully tested in the courts.

My committee is trying to devise ways of closing those loopholes and making the act airtight and completely effective.

To do that job, we have to know how lobbying operates 1950 style. Like women's fashions, styles in lobbying are always changing. The act we have on the books now would probably have been fine for 30 years ago, but we aren't meeting the lobbying challenge of 1950 in this statute.

There has been a lot of discussion lately about the powers and the methods of Congressional investigating committees. Some committees have abused their privileges and brought discredit to the congressional investigative technique. I was determined that my committee, when I was honored by the Speaker of the House in being selected as chairman of the lobbying investigation, would not fall into the traps which had caught other congressional investigations and ruined their effectiveness.

I was determined that we would conduct a fair and objective investigation, that we would look for the facts and show those facts, whatever they reflected. But I have found that no matter how far one may lean over backward to be fair, there are some vigorous, well-financed, and unscrupulous groups in this country which are determined to discredit representative government, government in the public interest, and to fasten un-American ideas into the fabric of American government.

The Communists, of course, are known for that technique. But they are not alone in it. Some of our big business executives, I am sorry to say, are suckers for the same kind of un-American propaganda of the right, of extreme reaction, as are some of our foolish people for the propaganda of the Communists on the lunatic fringe of the left.

Big money—and I mean really big money—is being poured into the coffers of pressure groups and phony patriotic organizations seeking to kill off the liberal-labor movement in America. We have gone after some of these organizations and they have screamed like stuck pigs. But we have been getting the goods on them.

We are exposing their failure to tell the Congress of the United States, under the Lobbying Act, where their money is coming from. We are exposing their failure to report to Congress, under the Lobbying Act, what expenditures they make. And in the process of showing these things, we have been exposing their techniques for masquerading as something that they are not.

We are doing those things because a proper and complete investigation of lobbying demands that we do just that. We have avoided smear tactics, however. But that hasn't stopped some elements from smearing us. That's the price we must pay for trying to do our job objectively. It was these smears, I gather, which prompted the American Federationist to ask me for this article to counteract the unfair and perverted reports which have been circulated about our investigation.

Actually, the lobbying investigation proceeded calmly and quietly until we ran into the head-on refusal of the Committee for Constitutional Government, antilabor, anti-Fair Deal propaganda mill for reaction in this country, to provide us with the identical sort of information we had already obtained without difficulty from a wide variety of lobbying organizations. We wanted their list of big contributors. The Lobbying Act requires that this information be made public automatically every 3 months, but the Committee for Constitutional Government had fashioned what it thought was a device for avoiding this disclosure.

Besides refusing us the information and brazenly daring our committee to cite him for contempt of Congress, Edward A. Rumely, the executive secretary of the organization, flooded the newspapers of the country with denunciations of the committee for allegedly violating the Constitution. And, of course, one segment of the extremist press picked up the hue and cry.

Even some otherwise intelligent publications were taken in by this distorted attack and carried editorials condemning us as being out to "get" anti-administration groups and business generally. That, of course, was nonsense.

Because the Committee for Constitutional Government and one or two other lobbying organizations had refused to turn over to us the facts on their financial operations, we turned to other sources to find those facts. From information we already had, we knew that many business concerns in this country were financing all sorts of organizations engaging in political and economic propaganda work. It was quite simple to ask those business concerns for a list of the contributions they had made during the period since the Lobbying Act has been in effect.

We addressed questionnaires to about 175 concerns, and we received full and complete replies from nearly all of them. Most of them had no hesitation whatsoever, for they felt they had nothing to hide.

And so we learned where much of the money has been coming from to finance some of the hidden lobbies. And it is my hope that we can close any loopholes in the Lobbying Act which might permit this information to remain secret in the future.

No American who believes in a cause should have any hesitation about contributing to a movement designed to advance that cause unless the cause itself is one to be ashamed of.

There should be no stigma of any sort attached to the act of contributing that money or of hiring lobbyists with it, unless, again, the cause is un-American.

Our whole approach has been to show the public and Congress that lobbyists and lobbying organizations, by and large, are very useful and very necessary parts of the legislative process in a real democracy.

But as long as some lobbyists and some lobbying outfits operate in secret, in the dark, masking their purposes by failing to disclose the names of their contributors, lobbying will remain suspect. That is what the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, in its investigation, is seeking to correct.

Hiawatha Is Subversive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I include herein a news item appearing in the New York Times of Wednesday, September 13, and an editorial from the same paper of Thursday, September 14.

No comment is needed.

[From the New York Times of September 13, 1950]

HIAWATHA MAY AID REDS, SAYS STUDIO—INDIAN CHIEF IMMORTALIZED BY LONGFELLOW SOUGHT PEACE, SO MONOGRAM SHELVES FILM

HOLLYWOOD, CALIF., September 12.—Fear that a motion picture dealing with the life and exploits of Hiawatha, Onondaga Indian chief of the fifteenth century, of whom Longfellow wrote in his classic poem, might in the present temper of the country be regarded as Communist propaganda has caused Monogram Studio to shelve such a project, it was learned today.

Put in preparation 6 months ago, a script, written by Arthur Strawn was ready for filming with Walter Mirisch producing, and an announcement concerning it was to have been made at Monogram's annual sales meeting which ended here after a 3-day session on September 7. The picture, however, was withdrawn from the production schedule shortly before the convention began.

It was Hiawatha's efforts as a peacemaker among the warring Indian tribes of his day which brought about the confederation of the Five Nations that gave Monogram particular concern, according to a studio spokesman. These, it was decided, might cause the picture to be regarded as a message for peace and therefore helpful to present Communist designs.

[From the New York Times of September 14, 1950]

HIAWATHA IS UN-AMERICAN

"By the shore of the Pacific,
By the shining Big-Sea-Water,
At a small wigwam in Hollywood,
They have learned that Hiawatha
Wears the peace-paint of a Red-man."

So might a surprised Longfellow have been forced to revise The Song of Hiawatha after discovering that a proposed movie on the Indian chief was considered un-American at this time and therefore would not be made. A west coast studio has discovered, somewhat belatedly, that Hiawatha "smoked the calumet, the peace pipe, as a signal to the nations."

One more movie, more or less, that is announced and then not made will not shake the entertainment foundations of the country. But there is a principle involved, even if only a small one. It is that a point of ridiculousness can be reached and passed in unreasoned hysteria. Such is the case here with the suppression by the movies of a schoolboy's poem. Such, too, is the case with the recent radio censorship by privately appointed vigilantes.

Hiawatha apparently was suppressed because it would be regarded as a message for peace and therefore would aid Communist designs. But the important thing to remember is that peace is not Communist property; that it must be stressed here and abroad that peace guides our policies; that we act peace as well as talk it. In the war of words and ideas, we must not allow ourselves to be taken "on a long and distant journey, to the portals of the sunset."

Busts of Chippewa Indian Chiefs and Paintings of Indian Life by Seth Eastman in the United States Capitol

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, in my home State of Minnesota we have the greatest number of Chippewa Indians, as well as the largest number of Chippewa Reservations. These native Americans reside on the Red Lake, White Earth, Greater Leech Lake, Bois Fort or Nett Lake, Mille Lac, Fond du Lac, Grand Portage, and Vermillion Lake Reservations. The first two named—Red Lake and White Earth—are the largest and are wholly within my congressional district.

It is a high honor and privilege to represent these fine native Americans in the Congress of the United States. It has even been my privilege and great honor to have been adopted as an honorary member of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians under the authority of a resolution adopted by the General Council of the Red Lake Band on June 13, 1948, in general session and concurred by all other organized and unorganized groups of Red Lake Indians. I was presented with a beautiful "certificate of adoption" by Paul H. Beaulieu, ceremonial representative in charge, witnessed and approved by Bazil Lawrence, chairman, General Council, and Peter Graves, secretary, General Council, on July 10, 1948. My Indian name is "Gigi go we ne ne" or "The Spokesman." I am truly appreciative of this honor and cherish my "certificate of adoption" as one of my most valuable possessions.

I have many times admired the two beautiful marble busts of Be-sheek-kee and Aysh-ke-bah-ke-ko-zhay in the Senate wing of the Capitol and the bronze bust of Be-sheek-kee off the Houses Chamber on the west side of the Capitol. The Chippewa Indians are very proud of the fact that two of their great chiefs represent the American Indian in bronze and marble in our Nation's Capitol, their tribe being the only one represented in bronze and marble among the many tribes of native Americans.

I have long been a student of the history and art of the American Indians and in order to get some authentic record as to how these fine art objects were placed in the Capitol, I appealed to Mr. David Lynn, Architect of the Capitol, and under leave to revise and extend my remarks I include the following letter and material so graciously furnished me by Mr. Lynn:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL,
Washington, D. C., August 5, 1950.

Hon. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAGEN: In response to your letter of July 25, 1950, I enclose a statement regarding the busts of the Chippewa Indians, Be-sheek-kee and Aysh-ke-bah-ke-ko-zhay, which I hope will be of interest to you.

As there is a reference in the article to Capt. Seth Eastman, I include some facts regarding the work of this well-known painter of Indian life.

Our records do not disclose all the details you mention, such as the name of sponsors, and the dates on which the busts were placed in the Capitol. Vincenti was employed for a considerable length of time on a per diem basis at the rate of $6 per day, and Lassalle received fixed compensation in his capacity as foreman of the bronze shop. Whether these men received any additional compensation for the work we are considering is questionable. I doubt very much if there were any formal unveilings or other ceremonies.

Yours very truly,

DAVID LYNN,
Architect of the Capitol.

BUSTS OF NATIVE AMERICANS—BE-SHEEK-KEE AND AYSH-KE-BAH-KE-KO-ZHAY

In a group of miscellaneous works of art located in the east gallery floor corridor of the Senate wing there are marble busts of two Indians by Francis Vincenti, a sculptor of Italian birth. Mr. Vincenti was employed in the Capitol for a period of from 1853 to 1858 and was responsible for much of the carving in connection with Thomas Crawford's sculptural group in the Senate pediment. The busts are those of the Chippewa Chief Aysh-ke-bah-ke-ko-zhay or "Flat-Mouth," and of Be-sheek-kee or "The Buffalo." It is believed that these Indians came to Washington as members of delegations for the negotiation of a treaty between the Government and the Chippewas, and that it was Capt. Seth Eastman who suggested to Capt. M. C. Meigs, superintendent of the Capitol extension, that the Indians be induced to pose for their portraits in marble. Captain Eastman, a Regular Army officer, who later attained the brevet rank of brigadier general, is well-known for his paintings of scenes of Indian life

Nine of these works now hang in the Public Lands Committee room in the New House Office Building, and 17 painting of Civil War forts by Eastman may be seen in the corridor walls of the ground floor of the Capitol, central section. The records show that Be-sheek-kee received from the Government the sum of $5 for "having taken his bust in 3 days."

The following is quoted from Art and Artists of the Capital of the United States of America by Charles E. Fairman (Government Printing Office, 1927):

"Several years ago the Architect's office was advised that there was a marble bust of an Indian in one of the committee rooms in the Senate wing of the Capitol. It was not known at that time whom this bust was intended to represent. Inquiry in th office where it was then placed resulted in the information being given that it was a bust of Tecumseh, but subsequent investigation revealed the fact that there was no valid grounds upon which to make the claim that it was the bust of this celebrated warrior. For many years this bust had been carried upon the records of the Senate wing of the Capitol as being private property and that the owner was unknown. As a matter of decoration it was considered of enough importance so that it had found a place in one of the committee rooms.

"It was felt that possibly some information might be secured through the Bureau of Ethnology, and accordingly an expert from that bureau called and examined the bust and gave it as his opinion that it could not possibly be a bust of Tecumseh and that it belonged to some of the Indians whose tribal homes were in the northern part of the Middle Western States. In the quest for information a photograph of the bust was published in several papers, with the result that an elderly man, who had been a Senate page at the time when the Senate met in the present Supreme Court room, came and identified this bust as one that had formerly been in the Senate lobby and that it had been called by one of the Senators "Billy Bowlegs" a famous Seminole chief This identification seemed to be of value, and the Bureau of Ethnology was again called upon for an opinion. Notwithstanding this seemingly positive identification, the Bureau of Ethnology stated that "Billy Bowlegs" had never been in Washington and that the cranial development of the bust was not that of a Seminole.

"At about this time Lot Flannery, a local sculptor, who was an apprentice sculptor at the Capitol in the fifties, came and identified the bust as the work of Francis Vincenti and stated that he had seen Vincenti modeling in clay from the Indian whose bust had been reproduced in marble. Mr. Flannery, however, was unable to give the name of the Indian or his tribal relation. It seemed at this time almost a hopeless quest to determine the name of the Indian who served as the model for this bust, and at last an attempt was made through the Indian Office to devise some means by which this work might be identified. Acting upon the suggestion of the Indian Office, several photographs of the bust were supplied and the office assumed the task of sending a photograph around to different Indian agents occupying the territory indicated by the Bureau of Ethnology as the probable location of the home of the tribe of Indians to which this Indian belonged. One identification was made, but it did not seem either to the Architect's office or to the Bureau of Ethnology sufficient to warrant the belief that the bust had been properly identified. A second identification from another source on information produced through the Indian agents identified this bust as that of "Flat-mouth," known by the Indian name of Aysh-ke-bah-ke-ko-zhay, a Chippewa chief who was known to have been in Washington at the period to which the letter from Captain Eastman refers. This has been corroborated by the Bureau of Ethnology upon a comparison of the records of the treaty Indians in Washington at the time referred to. It was then considered that the identification was complete, and the proof that the clay model had been made by Francis Vincenti and that it had been reproduced in marble by the same sculptor settled the question of ownership and showed conclusively that it was the property of the Government.

"For this reason it was considered best to remove this bust from the committee room, where it had been for many years, and place it on the gallery floor of the Senate in the east corridor. At the time that the bust was removed it happened that Senator Clapp, of Minnesota, occupied the room in which the bust was located. He showed much interest and was very anxious to find out who the Indian might be who had posed for this bust, and upon being informed that it was 'Flat-mouth,' or Aysh-ke-bah-ke-ko-zhay, looked at it steadily for a moment and said: 'I knew him. It is a good portrait.' He then requested to be given all the facts concerning the identification, and after going over all the papers in the case expressed himself as well satisfied with the proof of identification. A record was, therefore, made in the case of the examination of papers by Senator Clapp and his agreement upon the completeness of the identification. This was done not so much for the satisfaction of those who at this time were in possession of these facts, but for those who might ask for this information in later years. While not a part of the art history of the Capitol, it may be that some have become interested in 'Flat-mouth' and will find further interest in having it brought to their attention that 'Flat-mouth' was made one of the chief characters of a story, Gentlemen of the North, by Hugh Pendexter, who has not only used this Indian as one of his characters, but has shown in the development of his book a large amount of research in the records of the Indian tribes of the period prior to 1860."

The bronze bust of Be-sheck-kee located west of the House Chamber on the principal floor of the Capitol is a reproduction of the marble bust by Vincenti on the Senate Gallery floor. When the Senate and House wings were added to the original Capitol a bronze foundry was established either in the building or on the grounds. During the years 1857 to 1860 a bronze founder and artist in bronze by the name of Joseph Lassalle was employed in the capacity of foreman. Under his supervision much of the decorative bronze used in the construction of the Senate and House wings was cast. Lassalle also cast the bronze fountain now in the office of the Architect of the Capitol from the model of the distinguished American sculptor, William H. Rinehart.

Joseph Lassalle

A bronze founder and artist in bronze who was employed in the bronze shops at the Capitol in the capacity of a foreman during the years 1857-60. In the files of the Architect of the Capitol are several letters written during the above period containing information relating to the work of the bronze shops during that time. From other papers in the Office of the Architect it is learned that this artist was a brother of Charles Lassalle, the proprietor of Des Etas Unis, whose political support had been valuable in the last election. In an appeal for reinstatement to his former position from which he had been suspended pending the investigation of charges, the artist gave a list of the works in bronze executed by him. In addition to the list given below, it appears that much of the decorative bronze work of the Capitol was executed under his supervision

Brig. Gen. Seth Eastman

(From Art and Artists of the Capitol of the United States of America, by Charles E. Fairman)

During a discussion in Congress upon the merits of different painters and the advisability of securing their services in the decoration of the Capitol, a very strong endorsement was made in favor of Seth Eastman, who has been referred to before as assisting Captain Meigs in securing some Indian models for the sculptors at the Capitol to model in clay. It was Captain Eastman who secured for the sculptor Vincenti, Aysh-ke-bah-ke-ko-zahy (Flat-mouth) as a model for the bust which was referred to during the period of its execution. Interest in Captain Eastman, who had since become Brevet Brig. Gen. Seth Eastman, United States Army, retired, has not lessened, and on March 26, 1867, in the House of Representatives, Mr. Schenck made the following remarks:

"Mr. Schenck. I ask unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution agreed to unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs of the last Congress, but which was objected to when we endeavored to get it in by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Boyer] who since then has become satisfied that it ought to pass. If there be no objection I will make a brief explanation.

"There was no objection.

"The Clerk then read a resolution authorizing the employment of Brevet Brig. Gen. Seth Eastman of the United States Army, now on the retired list, to duty so as to entitle him to the full pay, emoluments, and allowances of his lineal rank, that it shall be competent to have such duty consist in the employment of the said officer in the execution under the supervision of the Architect of the Capitol, of paintings from his own designs for the decorations of the rooms of the Committee on Indian Affairs and on Military Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives, and other parts of the Capitol; and no additional compensation for such service is to be paid to said Eastman beyond his pay, allowances, and emoluments as aforesaid.

"Mr. Cullom. I believe I was one of the persons who objected to that resolution when it was up before. I have since learned it is important; it should pass, and I withdraw any objection on my part.

"Mr. Schenck. We have been paying for decorations, some displaying good taste and others of a tawdry character, a great deal of money to Italian artists and others, while we have American talent much more competent for the work. Among others possessing native talent is General Eastman, who is now a lieutenant colonel in the Regular Army and a brevet brigadier general. He is more of an artist, in all that relates to the Indians, except possibly Catlin and Stanley than anyone we have had in the country. He is disabled from doing full duty now and is on the retired list suffering from rheumatism occasioned by exposure in the field on active duty.

"The General of the Army is perfectly willing to have Congress, if it thinks proper, provide for detailing General Eastman for the duty of executing for the Capitol some of his magnificent paintings. It is not military duty and it is thought better the General should be authorized to assign him to this duty. If assigned to this duty, General Eastman will draw his full pay as lieutenant colonel instead of as on the retired list, making a difference of about $1,200 or $1,500 a year. For at the most $1,500 a year we will secure services for which we have been paying tens of thousands of dollars to foreign artists and we will get better work done. I think under the circumstances a gallant American officer, who has taste and artistic ability, should be permitted to be assigned to this duty. I invite Members to look at a book I have here of engravings from his paintings, which display everything that is elegant and tasteful in art.

"The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

"Mr. Schenck moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

"The latter motion was agreed to." (Congressional Globe, 40th Cong., 1st sess., proceedings for March 26, 1867, pp. 361, 362.)

Under Special Order 427, Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant General's Office, Washington, D. C., August 28, 1867, Lieutenant Colonel Eastman was placed upon the active list and assigned to duty under the Secretary of the Interior. At this time the Capitol Building was under the Interior Department, and the assignment to the Interior Department really meant assignment to the Capitol for the purpose of decorative work therein. It seems that the Architect of the Capitol was not certain that it would be permissible for him to pay to General Eastman commutation of fuel and quarters to which he was entitled as a lieutenant colonel upon the active list. On October 5, 1867, Captain Eastman requested of the Interior Department that instruction be given to the Architect of the Capitol to govern his action in this particular case. In accordance with the request of General Eastman the following communication was sent to the Architect of the Capitol:

"EDWARD CLARK, Esquire,
"Architect of the Capitol Extension

"SIR: Brevet Brig. Gen. Seth Eastman, lieutenant colonel, United States Army (retired), was by direction of the President detailed by special orders of the War Department No. 427, dated August 28, 1867, for duty in this Department. He is and has been on duty in the Department, in connection with the Capitol extension, and is entitled to commutation of fuel and quarters, agreeably to Army regulations from the 1st September 1857—(1867).

"I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

"W. T. OTTO,
"Acting Secretary."

Under the commission as outlined above Lieutenant Colonel Eastman executed nine paintings of Indian life. There may be some misconception connected with the idea of decorations which may lead many to conclude that they are painted upon the walls of the rooms for which they were executed. On the contrary, these paintings are upon canvas, properly framed, and hang about the walls of the rooms of the House Committee on Indian Affairs. As works of art they are creditable examples of the best of that period, but their art value is overshadowed by their historical value, as they admirably illustrate various incidents of Indian life. These examples could not be obtained at this time, as the present mode of savage life is far removed from the conditions which Colonel Eastman has so well portrayed. In addition to these nine paintings illustrating Indian life, Colonel Eastman painted 17 pictures of United States forts for the rooms of the House Committee on Military Affairs. It is learned from the correspondence relating to the work of Colonel Eastman that on June 23, 1870, the Architect of the Capitol advised the Secretary of the Interior that the artist proposed to proceed with the pictures for the decoration of the rooms of the House Committee on Military Affairs at a compensation of $100 per month in addition to his pay as a retired officer of the Army. It also appears from correspondence in relation to this work that Colonel Eastman had discussed the matter with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Hon. J. A. Logan, and that as a result of this conference the plan of decoration was approved provided that it only included views of the principal forts and West Point, but there was no inclination on the part of Mr. Logan to have battle scenes used as subjects for the decoration of this room.

The paintings representing the 17 forts of the United States are probably more valuable as examples of historical accuracy and as illustrations of the conditions of the fortifications existing at that period than for purely decorative purposes. The Committee on Military Affairs, however, is not supposed to be a committee particularly solicitous in art direction. It was important that knowledge concerning the fortifications of the Government should be easily accessible, and these medium-size framed pictures contain desired information and also relieve acceptably what might otherwise be blank spaces upon an uninteresting wall. The acquaintance of the artist with military life as well as with Indian life was the natural result of his long-time service in the Army, much of which had been spent upon the then frontier of the country in close contact with Indian tribes. Colonel Eastman was born in Brunswick, Maine, January 24, 1808. He was the eldest child of Robert and Sarah (Lee) Eastman. He was of pure New England stock and was of the sixth generation from Roger, the first of the name in this country, who settled in Salisbury, Mass., soon after landing in Salem in 1638. He graduated at the Military Academy at West Point in 1831, passed through the several grades from second lieutenant to lieutenant colonel of infantry, and was placed on the retired list December 3, 1863. He was brevetted brigadier general August 9, 1866. Lieutenant Eastman was teacher of drawing at the Military Academy 1833 to 1840. He published a treatise on topographical drawings in 1837, and soon after 1850 a history of Indian tribes. He was stationed with part of his regiment for several years at Fort Snelling, Minn., and there became greatly interested in the history and customs of the Sioux and Chippewa Indians. During that period he made many drawings and paintings of the Indians and their various tribal ceremonials. His death occurred in Washington, D. C., August 31, 1875. (From pp. 235-240 of Art and Artists of the Capitol of the United States.)

It will be remembered that it was the intent of the Government to decorate the committee rooms of the House Committee on Military Affairs and the House Committee on Indian Affairs with paintings in oil by Seth Eastman. At the time of the employment of Brigadier General Eastman both committee rooms were in the Capitol Building, but with the erection of the House Office Building the House Committee on Military Affairs was given a committee room in this new building, and consequently the paintings (framed pictures of medium size) were taken to the committee room in its new location. It seems unfortunate that these very excellent works—17 paintings of United States forts—should be in a place where so few have an opportunity of inspecting them. The work was seriously done and the paintings are meritorious, and although hidden in a committee room it is not possible to determine where, if taken from this room, they could be hung so that the general public might have an opportunity of seeing them. As historical records they are valuable, as well as being fine examples of the work of a prominent painter of his period. (From p. 476 of Art and Artists of the Capitol of the United States. (NOTE.—These paintings are now located in the corridor of the basement floor, west front, of the Capitol Building.)

The following is a list of the 17 paintings of United States forts: Fort Knox, Maine; Fort Tyler, Fla; Fort Snelling, Minn.; Fort Scamel and Fort George, Maine; Fort Defiance, N. H.; Fort Sumter, S. C. (before the war); Fort Sumter, S. C. (after the war); Fort Sumter, S. C. (after the bombardment); Fort Mackinac, Mich.; Fort Mifflin, Pa; Fort Lafayette, N. Y.; Fort Tompkins and Fort Wadsworth, N. Y.; West Point, N. Y.; Fort Delaware, Del; Fort Jefferson, Fla.; Fort Trumbull, Conn.; Fort Rice, N. Dak.

Six Hundred and Twenty-eighth Heavy Tank Battalion, Twenty-eighth Division, Pennsylvania National Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, September 10, 1950, the Six Hundred and Twenty-eighth Heavy Tank Battalion of the Twenty-eighth Division, Pennsylvania National Guard left Johnstown, Pa., aboard a special troop train for Camp Atterbury, Ind., for combat training.

The city of Johnstown turned out en masse and lined the streets for over 4 miles as the soldiers marched from their armory to the train. They were accompanied to the station by three bands and marching delegations from the twelve groups associated with the veterans council of greater Johnstown.

It was the most dramatic sendoff ever witnessed in that city. Not even during World War II did such a large number of men leave the city bound for active duty in a single day, and probably never before was enacted the sight at the Pennsylvania Railroad station waiting room. Waving goodbys with one hand, brushing away tears with the other, the wives, sweethearts, and children left only room for a single file of men from the main entrance of the station to the doors at the ramp leading to the track platform. Many saw their loved ones leaving for a second time within a decade for the grim emergency of war—all of the friends and relatives of the soldiers trying to catch a last glimpse of their loved ones before boarding the train.

This departure of the Six Hundred and Twenty-eighth Tank Battalion brings the fighting in far-off Korea closer to Johnstown and directly links that area with the involved pattern of the Nation's foreign policy.

The Twenty-eighth Division, of which the Six Hundred and Twenty-eighth Tank Battalion is a part, has a long and distinguished record in America's wars. It will maintain its traditions this time, if the Nation requires fighting men in large numbers again. In World War I it was known as the Iron Division and dubbed the Bloody Bucket in World War II because of its red keystone shoulder patch.

Thousands of men have been summoned from their peaceful pursuits to take an active part in the national defense. Most of them, like our Johnstown men, have had preliminary training. We did not anticipate, however, that when the tank and aviation engineer units were formed in Johnstown last year, that they would be called into active service so soon, or at all. But that training has demonstrated its value.

We are in an era when real peace, secure peace, is not probable for quite some time. In the meantime, even an uneasy peace can be preserved only if the warmakers are assured that those who really want peace will not pay the price the U. S. S. R. demands for it Since the power of America is to be mobilized, the men who left from the Twenty-sixth Congressional District are forming a notable part of it.

As I remarked, at the sendoff to the National Guard members, it is my sincere hope that speedily as possible the world situation may be corrected so that American families will again be reunited so that we can truly live in a world of justice, tolerance, and freedom for all mankind. The men and women of the Johnstown area, and the whole country, owe a real debt of gratitude to the men of the Six Hundred and Twenty-eighth Heavy Tank Battalion.

Where Do Our Rights Become Infringed?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Denver Post, September 3, 1950, entitled "Where Do Our Rights Become Infringed?":

WHERE DO OUR RIGHTS BECOME INFRINGED?

Citation by the House of Representatives of the executive secretary of the Committee for Constitutional Government brings up some ticklish legal points, and while we are not at all sure that Congress has the right to go as far as it has in invading private rights in its lobbying investigation, we are sympathetic to the House action in citing this man.

He is Dr. Edward Rumely. In 1944 he was indicted by a District of Columbia grand jury for "willful default" in refusing to submit documents requested by a congressional committee investigating campaign expenditures.

Dr. Rumely and his friends in this right-wing lobbying organization claim again that Congress has no right to make certain demands. This time it is in connection with a lobbying investigation. This time they refuse to tell the congressional committee headed by Representative BUCHANAN, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, the names of bulk buyers of the literature the organization puts out.

Dr. Rumely claims that this demand infringes on his rights as an American citizen. He has pleaded, in rapid succession, that this is an abuse of power, and that it violates the freedom-of-the-press amendment to the Constitution, punishing him because the Committee for Constitutional Government would not reveal the names of purchasers of books and literature in excess of $500.

The committee, however, is not a publisher, primarily. Its purpose is not to sell books for a profit. Its purpose is to print and sell propaganda to persuade people to a set of political ideas. Its purpose is to lobby for what it wants from the Federal Government, and to exert as much pressure as it can in as many ways as it can.

Besides, this sale of propaganda in large lots is a dodge. The committee does not accept contributions of more than $499, for the lobbying laws of our country state that such contributions are subject to registration. It gets around this provision by selling literature in excess of that amount.

The cry, "freedom of the press," when exercised by the Committee for Constitutional Government, then, threatens to give the legitimate press a bad name.

Dr. Rumely has been cited by Congress for refusing to answer questions about lobbying. We believe his citation is just in the light of events, just as were the citations of members of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee for refusing to produce their financial records.

If Dr. Rumely's organization were not primarily a lobbying organization, the case might be different. In questions such as this the shadings of right and legality are fine. But the doctor's organization is a pressure group, which spends great quantities of money sending great quantities of material to newspapers and other public-information media. It is a lobbying organization, and as such should not be allowed to hide behind other skirts in trying to evade answers to legitimate questions.

The Committee for Constitutional Government has every right to publish what it will, subject to the laws of libel. But the American people have a right to know who is behind the committee so they can tell why it publishes what it does.

We should like to see the case taken to the courts for decision, though, because in that case the judiciary might give us some indication as to just how far the lobbying investigators can go. We remember that they have made some inordinate demands of corporations, and some high-handed and foolish demands, too.

Throughout this question it must be the aim of the American people to preserve the right of inquiry of Congress, which it must have in order to pass sane legislation, and which it must be able to back up by punishment of those who refuse to aid its legislative inquiries.

At the same time we must protect the rights of Americans against that terrible monster—government.

In this case we believe the citation of Edward Rumely can be carried out legally and properly without infringing on the basic rights of Americans.

Resolution of Hartford County (Conn.) Chapter of Catholic War Veterans, Inc.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, in today's mail I received a copy of a very interesting resolution passed at the regular meeting of the Hartford County Chapter of the Catholic War Veterans, Inc. Transmitted by Commander Lucian J. Kragiel, it demands action by the Secretary of Treasury to prohibit entrance into United States of products made by forced or slave labor under the Tariff Act of 1930 having reference to such items. I am in fullest accord with this resolution and have pending House Concurrent Resolution 207 expressing the sense of the Congress that the President should rescind foreign-trade agreements with Communist-controlled countries. I am continuing my fullest efforts to have this resolution favorably considered. Its passage will attain a like desirable objective sought by the CWV; and, under leave to extend my remarks, I include their resolution.

Whereas the United States of America together with other free countries of the world is engaged in a war with communism; and

Whereas the United States of America is importing goods manufactured in the Soviet Union and its satellites; and

Whereas the money acquired by the Soviet Union and its satellites for these goods is being used to secure and manufacture arms and munitions to be used against the armed forces of the United States of America and other free countries; and

Whereas these goods are manufactured by slave labor and sold in this country at a price so low that American-made goods cannot compete with these imports, thereby causing American manufacturers to curtail production which in turn throws American workmen out of work: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Hartford County Chapter does hereby demand that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America place an embargo on any and all imports manufactured or otherwise prepared for consumption in Soviet Russia or any of its satellites.

Love of God and Home and Native Land

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the men who follow the line of battle tell us that in the dying hour the soldier unclasps his weapons and reaches for the inner pocket to touch some faded letter, some little keepsake of wife or mother. This pathetic fact teaches us that our boys are not fighting because of the abstract rights of man alone. It is love of God and home and native land that enter into our soldiers and makes their arms invincible. No stronger or more convincing evidence of the truth of this than the letter from Pfc. John J. McCormick to his two lovely little daughters, Rose Marie and Joannie. Under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting as a part of my remarks an article which appeared in the Washington Evening Star, Friday, September 15, 1950:

DADDY ON WAY TO DIE IN KOREA WRITES GIRLS LETTER TO CHERISH—ALWAYS DO WHAT CONSCIENCE TELLS IS RIGHT, HE URGES

COLLINGDALE, PA., September 15.—A young soldier in Korea took a piece of notepaper from his helmet and wrote a letter to his two small daughters back home.

That letter was delivered yesterday to the home of 6-year-old Rose Marie McCormick and her sister, Joan, 3.

Three days ago, their mother was notified that Pfc. John J. McCormick, 28, paratrooper veteran of World War II and infantryman in Korea, had been killed in action

This is what Private McCormick wrote to "Dear Joannie and Rose Marie":

"This is daddy. I want you to listen and pay attention while Mommie reads this to you. Just try and make believe I was there, talking to you.

"Joannie, I don't think you'll remember me because you were a little baby when I had to go away, but I used to sit and hold you a lot, and when you were a bad little girl, I used to make you sit in a chair until you were good, but I always loved you a lot and I was very proud of you.

"Rose Marie, you should remember me because I used to take you out with me a lot, and I used to buy you a lot of candy and sodas, and I used to feel so good when people used to say you had eyes like mine. Remember the little puppy I bought you? Your Mummy used to tie a little pink ribbon around its neck and you used to carry it in your arms. You looked awfully cute.

"I want you both to know that I'd be with you if I could, but there are a lot of bad men in the world, and if they were allowed to do what they wanted to do, little girls like you wouldn't be allowed to go to church on Sunday or be able to go to the school you wanted to.

"So I have to help fight these men and keep them from coming where you and Mummie live. It might take a long while, and maybe Daddy will have to go and help God in heaven, and if I do, I always want you both to be good for Mummie, because she is the best Mummie in the whole wide world.

"She has always taken care of you while I have been away. You see, kids, I happened to be caught in two wars inside 10 years, and the reason I am where I am today is because I am fighting for what I think is right.

"That's one thing I always want both of you to remember. If your conscience tells you something is right, always stand up for it. You might be ridiculed for doing so, but in the long run you'll find out that people respect you more for doing so.

"When you grow up to be young ladies, don't ever forget all that Mummie has done for you. She has often gone without clothes for herself so that both of you could have nice things. I want you to do as she says; go to church on Sundays and you can always pray for Daddy.

"So remember, kids, when you grow up, save this letter in case I'm not there to talk to you, and try and remember all I am saying, for it's for your good, and because I love you and Mummie so much.

"I'll be in a hole, fighting, in a few days, in a place called Korea. I carry your picture, and Mummie's next to my heart, and if I have to go help God, you'll know that the last thought I had on this earth was for the two of you and Mummie. All my love and kisses. Be good and God bless you.

"DADDY."

Freedom To Lobby

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article which appeared in the Boston Herald under date of September 2, 1950:

FREEDOM TO LOBBY

The House of Representatives has raised a tempest by its decision to cite Dr. Edward A. Rumely for contempt of Congress. Unlike most others who have been cited recently, Dr. Rumely has powerful supporters in the Congress and among leaders of business and the press.

Yet, considering the precedents which have recently been set in the congressional-contempt cases, it is difficult to see how the House could have acted differently.

Dr. Rumely is executive secretary of the Committee for Constitutional Government and his current citation results from his refusal to turn over to the House Committee on Lobbying Activities the names of purchasers of CCG publications. The doctor contends that this information is irrelevant to anything the congressional group is entitled to investigate and that the demand for it violates the free press and searches and seizures clauses of the Bill of Rights.

The Lobbying Committee, on the other hand, argues that the CCG is a registered lobby, that it is supported in large part by the quantity orders for its propaganda publications from financial angels, and that the identity of these angels is something the committee has a right to know. The investigators deny that any constitutional question is involved.

Admitting that opening the subscription lists of publications, or groups sponsoring publications, might be abused in such a way as to place a burden on the freedom of the press, there is no clear evidence that such an abuse exists here. If the CCG's right-wing anti-Fair Deal bias has made it a special target for the probe committee, it is noteworthy that the left-wing Civil Rights Congress was cited at the same time.

Moreover, the congressional group does not ask for a complete list of subscribers. That would, of course, be indefensible. It asks only for the names of those from whom $1,000 or more has been received either through book purchases or other means.

We see no valid reason why lobbying organizations, even though they operate chiefly through the press, should not be required to disclose their sponsorship or financial backing. Newspapers which are corporations have long been required to make such facts public, and the requirement has not noticeably restricted their freedom of expression. Dr. Rumely's group should not consider itself more privileged, certainly, and there is no question of restricting its right to lobby.

In CCG's case there is, to be sure, a sharp difference of opinion as to whether the organization is in fact supported by quantity orders and whether, therefore, the list of purchasers is relevant. But the Congressmen feel that they must examine the list in order to determine the answer and this, too, seems reasonable.

If, as Dr. Rumely contends in one of his publications, CCG has 90 percent of the press on its side in this fight, we must reluctantly number ourselves with the skeptical 10 percent until a better case is made.

Inflation Threatens Our Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, on September 5, 1950, wholesale commodity prices reached the highest level in the last 25 years.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports the index on all commodities at wholesale for September 5, at 167.5 of the 1926 average.

The Dow-Jones spot commodity index, computed on the average prices for 1924, 1925, and 1926 equal to 100, on September 11, 1950, was reported at 199.18. On May 1 it was hovering around 160.

The rise of approximately 25 percent in spot commodity prices during the past 4½ months means the purchasing power of the dollar has been decreased by 20 percent.

It takes $5 to buy now what $4 would have bought in late April and early May of this year.

In previous times I have referred to the "high crime of inflation" as evidenced by the rising cost of the family food basket from week to week.

We now are about to witness a further devaluation in the purchasing power of the dollar stimulated by Government deficit spending to finance the new programs for national defense, mutual aid assistance to European nations, and general aid and assistance to countries all over the world, all of which spending has been authorized by this Congress.

Government costs at Federal, State, and local levels, according to minimum estimates will exceed $81,000,000,000, in the calendar year 1951.

To raise this almost unbelievable amount the taxes which will of necessity have to be levied will take approximately every third dollar of national income.

The consequences of such a punitive program have not been either fully or satisfactorily explained to the American businessman, the American farmer, or the American workingman.

PUBLIC DEBT HELD BY PEOPLE

Many people think that our public debt of more than $257,000,000,000 is held by the banks and big corporations of the Nation. This is a delusion.

As of July 1, 1950, the commercial banks of the Nation held but $65,000,000,000 in United States Government securities and the balance was owned by savings banks, building and loan associations, insurance companies, and the individual purchasers who purchased these securities from their personal earnings and savings as part of their plans for security and comfort in their declining years.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PUBLIC DEBT

As of June 30, 1949, the public debt, then at $250,800,000,000, was held as follows:

By commercial banks	$63,000,000,000
By Federal Reserve banks	19,300,000,000
By individuals	68,000,000,000
By insurance companies	20,900,000,000
By State, local, and Territorial governments	8,000,000,000
By mutual-savings banks	11,600,000,000
By corporations and associations	21,600,000,000
By the United States Government as investments securing trust funds such as civil-service retirement fund, Federal old-age and survivors insurance trust fund, railroad retirement account, unemployment trust fund	38,400,000,000
Total held	250,800,000,000

Mr. Speaker, every dollar held by the United States Government in these trust funds has already been spent and the security for this money consists of Government IOU's. With the dollar value collapsing from month to month, the beneficiaries of these trust funds will be paid off in devalued dollars, a system of skillful robbery achieved by inflation accelerated by deficit financing for the past 20 years.

DEFICITS IN 18 OF THE LAST 20 YEARS

Mr. Speaker, we have been going down the road to disaster and inflation in 18 of the last 20 years. We have built up the public debt by deficit spending by over $200,000,000,000. And all of this has been done with an irredeemable paper currency as the basis for our fiscal policies.

And this deficit spending has occurred during a period in which we collected more taxes by two hundred and two billion than the total cost of our Government from the beginning of the Republic down to the inauguration of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1933.

The tables which follow show the trend in Federal spending, a large part of which can be charged to waste, mismanagement, and downright incapacity on the part of the New Deal-Fair Deal administrators of our Government to measure up to the responsibilities of their jobs.

A RECORD OF DEFICIT SPENDING

In 18 out of the past 20 fiscal years the Federal Government has operated at a deficit. In 2 years, 1947 and 1948, the surpluses amounted to $9,173,257,504.

The public debt which was $16,185,308,299, or $131.38 per capital at the close of the fiscal year 1930, has risen to $257,357,352,351 or $1,704.50 per capita.

The details of the deficits by years are shown in the table following:

TABLE 1.—Surplus or deficits of the Federal Government by fiscal years 1931 through 1950

[Compiled from official Treasury statements]

	Budgetary surplus or deficit (−)
1931	−$461,677,080

1948	8,419,469,844
1949	−1,811,440,047
1950	−3,122,102,357
Gross deficit	−244,423,233,802
Less 1947–48 surplus	9,173,257,504
Net deficit (20 years)	−235,248,976,298

During the 20 fiscal years from 1931 through 1950, the Treasury Department collected revenues in the total amount of $342,292,461,609.

The Treasury receipts, other than borrowings, are shown by years in table 2, which follows:

TABLE 2.—Budgetary receipts of the U. S. Treasury by fiscal years from 1930 through 1950

1931	$3,189,638,632
1932	2,005,725,437
1933	2,079,696,742
1934	3,115,554,050
1935	3,800,467,202
1936	4,115,956,615
1937	5,028,840,237

1946	43,037,798,808
1947	43,258,833,189
1948	44,745,542,077
1949	38,245,667,810
1950	37,044,733,557
Total receipts (20 years)	342,292,461,609

The total receipts for the 20-year period, plus the accumulated deficits, indicate that the total expended by the Federal Government during the period was $577,541,437,902, or an average of about $28,877,071,895 per year.

Of the money spent during this 20-year period, approximately $110,000,000,000 was spent during and since the beginning of World War II. This foreign aid is expected to continue for many years.

One important factor generally overlooked by those who claim our economy is on a sound basis is the inflation brought about by Government deficit spending, and the depreciated purchasing power of the dollar. We Americans are in fact living in a land of make-believe. Making ourselves believe the more we spend and the more we go in debt the more prosperous we can become, and the higher we can raise our standard of living. Time will awaken the people from this trance. It is a fact that in 1931 the dollar was worth 96.6 cents in the market place. In 1932 it was worth 108.1 cents and the person who had saved a dollar drew some small comfort out of the fact that he had been thrifty. Today the dollar is worth only 58.1 cents and every person who saved in the days between 1929 and 1939 now finds that he has been robbed of the purchasing power of his savings by the deficit spending of the Federal Government, which has inflated prices in the markets. Borrowed money competing for goods drives up the price, and will continue to do so until deficit spending ends.

The irony of the situation is that while the Truman administration is aggressively campaigning to save democracies all over the world, and at the same time campaigning for comprehensive and more liberal social-security programs here at home, at the very same time by this deficit spending all over the world, it is undermining the very programs they offer the people, by devaluing the purchasing power of the dollar by deficit financing.

The dollar of 1935–39 is worth less than 50 cents today, and surely will go lower unless the Congress itself acts to place our economy and our money on a sound basis.

Fifty-five million men and women with savings accounts, the millions with investments in building and loan associations, and insurance policies are being systematically robbed of their savings. Additional billions of dollars saved by the working men and women of the Nation have gone into the stocks and bonds of the industries of our country. These savers too will be robbed of the fruits of thrift, by a punitive excess-profits tax if the New Dealers and the Fair Dealers have their way and succeed in setting up the hand-out or authoritarian state.

Some of you will remember that not more than 30 years ago, a so-called leader of the people set out to better the conditions in his country by promising he would institute a program to:

Decentralize the executive power; free the judiciary from executive influence; pay the public debt by increased levies on the wealthy classes; limit the Government's activities to civic and political affairs; and work for peace and disarmament.

This was the promise of Benito Mussolini when he marched with his "black shirts" on Rome. He took over the Government of Italy and established the most corrupt, the most licentious, and the most hated dictatorship in Europe. His promises went for naught, and his dictatorship wound up in war, defeat, and bankruptcy for the Italian people.

Here in America we still have time, but very little to put our house in order, restore the purchasing power of the dollar by rigid governmental economy and the abandonment of plans for the socialistic state.

Lobbying—Buchanan Answers Times-Herald Editorial of September 1, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, very few of the Members sitting in this House today have not at one time or another during their public careers been subjected to ugly, vicious, and thoroughly unwarranted attacks by certain segments of the Nation's press. We often chafe under these attacks, but we recognize that they are unavoidable. We recognize further that though these attacks may be intemperate to the extreme, they are at the same time reminders of the genuine freedom which the press enjoys in these United States.

Every Member of this House is aware of the attacks which have been directed against me and against the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, of which I have the honor to be chairman.

These attacks have come from the press of both the extreme left and the extreme right, and this has actually been a heartening sign to us that we were doing an honest and objective job in our investigation. For it is the extreme left and the extreme right which have most to fear from full disclosure of their lobbying activities. Their outraged cries of injured innocence have shown us that we have struck pay dirt without playing favorites.

Mr. Speaker, we have suffered these attacks with what I believe has been great forbearance. I like to remember that Lincoln once said:

If I were to read, much less answer, all the attacks made on me, the shop might as well be closed for any other business. I do the very best I know how, the very best I can, and I mean to keep doing so until the end.

But there is a point, Mr. Speaker, beyond which forbearance is impossible. This point was reached and passed by the Washington Times-Herald when it published on September 1, 1950, an editorial entitled "License for 'Burocrats,' No Rights for Others."

Many Members are undoubtedly familiar with this editorial. It featured a picture of myself, flanked by pictures of Joseph Goebbels on the right and Jacob Malik on the left—the inference clearly being that we were three men cut from the same cloth.

If this were the only objectionable feature of the editorial, I would be inclined to dismiss it as cheap innuendo of the usual heavy-handed Times-Herald type. But the editorial continued with what purported to be an analysis of the forthcoming report of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities. I can honestly say, Mr. Speaker, that this alleged analysis is the most thoroughly reprehensible piece of yellow journalism that I have seen during my tenure in this House. It is to reveal this vicious so-called analysis for what it is that I speak this afternoon.

In the very first place, the document on which the editorial was based was not the report of the Select Committee on Lobbying Activities at all. It was the first unrevised draft of such a report which was circulated confidentially among members of the committee for their objections, additions, and comments. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this draft was circulated in confidence among the members of the committee. Furthermore, at the very time that this first draft was given to the Times-Herald a second substantially revised draft had already been completed and placed in the committee's hands. Since that time, still a third draft of our report has been written.

These facts alone are enough to show the complete irresponsibility of the Times-Herald editorial. Even if the report had not been substantially revised, however, this editorial would have been a gross and willful distortion of the document which the Times-Herald had in its possession. Let me point out just a few of the many instances where the Times-Herald blandly ignores or twists the facts. The editorial states:

The report assumes that the Constitution is outmoded, that the executive departments should be freed of all restraints while the rights of citizens to petition for redress of grievances should be reduced, and that the criminal penalties applying to Federal officers who misuse public appropriations in order to influence legislation should be reduced to a dead letter.

Mr. Speaker, our report assumes nothing of the kind, and the Times-Herald knows it. We are charged with assuming that the executive departments should be freed of all restraints, but nothing could be further from the truth. We vigorously investigated every charge of misused appropriations which came to our attention. Not only did we investigate, but we also initiated investigations by the Comptroller General of the United States, an officer whose impartiality few would question. Furthermore, the draft report clearly and specifically spells out the dangers of executive participation in legislative policymaking. Could any fair-minded person say that this sounds like freedom from all restraints?

As to the charge that we would reduce the right of citizens to petition for redress of grievance, this is so much brazen nonsense. The draft specifically states on page 28xs:

This committee is convinced that a great deal can be done without in any way curbing these rights or making their exercise more difficult. We reject at this time any suggestion that the lawful means of lobbying should be restricted.

Does this sound like reducing the right of petition?

The charge that we would reduce the law restricting the use of public moneys for influencing legislation to a dead letter is equally phony. What the draft report actually says is:

There are five related questions involved in a proper evaluation of lobbying activities by executive agencies * * * (3) Is this statutory prohibition realistic or enforceable? Or have conditions so changed since its enactment in 1919 that it is and must be a dead letter?

The Times-Herald knows very well that the draft report comes to no conclusions whatsoever on this question.

The editorial continues by saying that in the draft report all citizens and groups of citizens opposing executive policy are dismissed as pernicious pressure groups. This statement is utterly and completely false. The report has never at any time called any citizen or group pernicious, nor has it so implied. Indeed, the draft states, as I myself have stated many times, that lobbying is both necessary and healthy in a democracy. I find such a statement on the very first page of my copy of the draft. Perhaps the Times-Herald's editorial writer suffers myopia whenever he reads something which does not conform to his preconceived notions. Whatever the cause, the result is nothing less than a bald and ugly lie.

These, Mr. Speaker, are only a few of the outright untruths contained in this extraordinary editorial. There is no possible excuse for such dishonest journalism. Even more glaring, however, is the ingenious way in which this editorial twists, distorts, and wrenches phrases out of their normal context. For example, the draft report is quoted as saying, which it did:

We do not believe in passive government.

To which the Times-Herald adds its own interpretation:

Therefore, all "burocrats" are to be relieved of criminal responsibility.

Now it is perfectly apparent that no committee of Congress in command of its senses would say anything which any reasonable person could construe as the Times-Herald did. And, of course, our draft report neither said nor implied anything which could remotely support the Times-Herald comment. What the Times-Herald failed to tell its readers was that the draft actually said:

We do not believe in passive government. We believe that there are interests in this Nation other than those which can be mobilized along group lines, and we believe that it is the responsibility of government—both morally and politically—to defend them. We believe, in sum, that government must lead as well as follow.

Does this sound like relieving "burocrats" of criminal responsibility? Could it be that the Times-Herald withheld the full paragraph because it states facts which even the Times-Herald cannot explain away? Or could it be that the Times-Herald is singing the same theme song of stalemate and confusion that it has been singing for years. It is quite a song, Mr. Speaker. If government does act to meet a crisis, then it is totalitarian. If it does not act, then it is timid and confused. With papers like the Times-Herald, you are damned if you do and you are damned if you do not. This may seem like clever journalism to some Members of this House, but to me it represents a cynical and degrading conception of editorial responsibility. The Times-Herald is well aware that the great bulk of its readers will never have the chance to read our committee's report, so it presumes that it can play fast and loose with the facts without anyone ever being any the wiser.

Mr. Speaker, this editorial was written with a strange inner logic all its own. It proceeds first from a series of deliberate falsehoods to a series of deliberate distortions. These then become the basis for a series of hysterically ugly conclusions. Our views, said the Times-Herald, would, if sustained, "destroy republican government, would reduce Congress to a chorus responsive to the baton of a dictator, and would cast the Constitution and the statutes upon the ash heap."

Perhaps I should feel flattered, Mr. Speaker, that the Times-Herald thinks our committee has the power to do all these things. But I am not flattered. I am outraged and this entire House should be outraged, for what the Times-Herald is saying is that a lawfully constituted committee of this House, acting within the proper purview of its investigative authority, is bent on subverting the American constitutional system. This is not only an affront to the intelligence of the American public; it is a deliberate and calculated attack on my integrity, on the integrity of the other members of my committee, and on the integrity of this entire House.

The charge that we are subverting the Constitution would be preposterous if it were not so ugly. I yield to no one in my deep attachment to constitutional principles. But this is not the issue, Mr. Speaker. The Times-Herald is not interested in protecting these principles, but in protecting those groups which fear a full investigation and disclosure of their lobbying activities. This is the issue, Mr. Speaker, and we should not let it be beclouded by the efforts of these groups and their kept defenders to keep the truth from the people. The Times-Herald says that we "allegedly" investigated lobbying. We didn't "allegedly" investigate, we did investigate, and this is precisely what the Times-Herald is upset about.

The final paragraphs of this editorial, Mr. Speaker, are on the same level as the first. I quote:

As a contribution to the literature of totalitarian dictatorship, the mouthings of the Buchanan New Dealers deserve a place along with the edicts of Joseph Goebbels, Hitler's minister of propaganda and national enlightenment, and the orations of Mr. Malik and the outgivings of the Soviet-controlled press.

What does one say in reply to this kind of language? That it is simply untrue? That it smacks of the gutter? Or should one point out that the Times-Herald is itself reading from the largest page of the dictator's propaganda book? Lenin, Stalin, and Hitler have all shown us the power of the great lie. The greater the lie, the better. Repeat it loudly, repeat it endlessly, and eventually it will be believed. So it is with the Times-Herald attack on our committee. It is the same old pattern of falsehood, distortion, name-calling, and low innuendo—all so that the truth can be kept from the people. The Times-Herald has learned its lessons from masters.

But, Mr. Speaker, we will speak the truth. Our report will set forth the facts about lobbying as we found them. The Times-Herald and its ilk may call us dictators. They may call us Goebbels and Maliks. They may spread the great lie that we are subverting the Constitution. But still the truth will be told, and it will dispel all the murky logic and hysterical slander of a hundred Times-Heralds. For unlike the Times-Herald, I have faith in the intelligence and judgment of the American people when they are armed with the facts. We will arm them with the facts, Mr. Speaker, and they will judge.

Rustling of Iron Curtain Portends New Aggression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, the article in the Washington Sunday Star of September 17 by Constantine Brown entitled "Rustling of Iron Curtain Portends New Aggression."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RUSTLING OF IRON CURTAIN PORTENDS NEW AGGRESSION—SOVIETS REPORTED READYING SATELLITES FOR EARLY PUSH AGAINST WEST GERMANY

(By Constantine Brown)

For the last 12 months an almost impenetrable curtain has been lowered around the Soviet-controlled areas of the Baltic Sea, extending from Tallinn, the capital of what used to be the republic of Estonia, to Wismar, near the frontier of the British occupation zone in western Germany.

It is in this area that the Soviet is making the most formidable preparations for aggression against the west. The few natives who have been allowed to remain in their old homesteads no longer are permitted to leave. Even a 5-mile trip is subjected to the most rigid control by Soviet and east German secret police.

The natives are branded like cattle so there can be no doubt that they belong to these provinces and no outsider has a chance to enter the prohibited zones without quick detection.

Finnish, Swedish, and Danish ships which occasionally have to put into the many ports of this area must follow strict regulations. They are allowed only to enter harbors and can have no contact with people ashore.

There have been some persons—but very few—who have escaped recently from the top secret zone, particularly Russian officers who have had enough of the Communist paradise. They have surrendered to western Allied guards and under friendly and skillful interrogation revealed a few of the secret preparations Moscow is making there.

They spoke about the new improved guided missile platforms, the strength and intensive training of the new German Army, whose officer corps is composed largely of Nazi elite corps officers, and of many other matters which are being kept secret by their interrogators.

All this information and more, obtained at great risks, shows clearly that the Kremlin has speeded up the tempo of preparedness of the satellite forces in eastern Germany. They also show that Moscow is ready to give full support to these troops when they are ordered to overrun western Germany.

APPRAISALS FAULTY

These revelations have prompted many military men of the west to conclude that we may be faced with an aggression of the Korean type in Europe sometime in the next few months and not later than the summer of 1951.

The requests from France and from the Bonn government that more American troops be made available for the defense of western Europe have sprung from the belief among the nations which are most directly menaced by Russia that a show-down is inevitable, regardless of how optimistic the diplomats at Lake Success and Washington may be.

These officials have been wrong in their appraisals of the international situation since the end of World War II. They have failed to heed the storm warnings in Korea. There is no reason to believe now that they are right about conditions in Europe. The news from the east is factual; the hopes of the diplomats are based on wishful thinking.

The request for more help from the United States, in the form of five more American divisions, has fallen on friendly ears in Washington. President Truman has replied that we would not shirk our responsibilities, but insisted that our efforts be matched by those of the defenders of western Europe.

The fact is that at the present time we do not have even one division available for the European theater. It is also a fact that the members of the Atlantic Pact do not have the necessary manpower to organize a force to meet a Soviet-backed attack within the next 12 months. And here we come face to face with the madness of allowing sentimental and emotional factors to outweigh dire military necessity.

For more than a year military men in America, Britain, and France have quietly urged their Governments to bring into the European defense system all the nations which are willing to offer full cooperation against the Russian threat. While some of the British and French made certain definite restrictions in regard to Germany, they all agreed that Spain, which has never been a threat to western Europe, even in the days when Hitler was conquering Europe and offered General Franco Gibraltar and a large slice of the French African colonial empire, should be accepted as a full-fledged partner.

ALLIES WORN OUT

Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery came to Washington last winter. He urged openly that Spain be associated with the common western defense. He told officials in Washington that he had pleaded with Foreign Minister Bevin to bury the ideological hatchet and made the same plea here. The blunt fact is that without the inclusion of western German and Spanish manpower in the western defense system the chances of saving Europe are, to say the least, extremely limited.

The Atlantic Pact nations, with the exception of America, are worn-out, war-weary countries which cannot be expected to make any large contribution of manpower. This is not said in a critical spirit. France has been bled white in two world wars and has on its hands a colonial war in Indochina, to which she has committed the bulk of her best troops.

Italy, also, is tired out and incapable even of defending her own borders, to say nothing of sending troops for the defense of other countries of the western coalition. Belgium, Holland, Denmark, and Luxembourg are small nations with no military potential. Norway may be able to resist a Soviet onslaught for a few months, if she is properly supported by American and British air and naval forces.

Britain is about as tired militarily as France, although she is expected to make another real effort if war comes and her Government decides to join the fray with everything it has in its power. Portugal, a small country in the extremity of southwestern Europe, cannot be considered a military power, and has been made a member of the Atlantic alliance only out of courtesy. She has some strategically important islands, such as the Azores, which are essential to the American and British Air Forces.

In addition to these material conditions there is a political factor which must not be overlooked. There are strong Communist movements in most of the continental European countries, particularly in France and Italy. While the Communist Parties have been losing ground for 2 years, they still have several million active members and a large number of associates.

SPAIN'S POTENTIAL VALUE

The Communists have been carrying on tremendous propaganda against the warmongering United States and its puppets, the Paris and Rome governments. The peoples of France and Italy are so war-weary that nobody should be surprised if a large portion of the non-Communist population agreed that it would be better to accept honorable neutrality to the devastations of another war.

Thus, from the viewpoint of available manpower and from the psychological point of view, it is doubtful that the European countries which are the pillars of the Atlantic Pact will be willing to fight when the showdown comes, unless they are strongly supported by other armies.

We are engaged in a bitter campaign in the Far East. It will be essential for some time that we send across the Pacific whatever troops are available to us at the present rate of mobilization of our Armed Forces.

How then can we fulfill our commitments to western Europe in the near future?

If it is true that manpower alone does not make armies these days, it is equally true that military equipment alone is not sufficient unless you have men behind the guns and in the tanks. And only few men are available among the members of the present coalition in western Europe.

After a good deal of bickering the powers which occupy western Germany have agreed to permit the recruiting of 60,000 Germans for service in a police force armed with tanks and all the other paraphernalia of modern warfare. It is hoped that this decision will be put into effect at the earliest possible moment and that the necessary equipment for such German troops can be found readily.

But it is Spain which can be of utmost importance to the defense of the West. There are today some 450,000 men under arms in the country. Another 500,000 trained reserves are immediately available. The Spaniards have not fought a foreign nation, except the United States, since the days of Napoleon and then their role was limited to the old-type guerrilla warfare. The civil war fought between 1936 and 1939 does not give any indication of the ability of the Spanish forces.

JOINT CHIEFS PUZZLED

Of all the countries of western Europe, however, Spain is not contaminated in the least with Communist ideology. Quite the contrary. The Spaniards are all determined anti-Communists, regardless of whether they are Falangists, Royalists, Socialists, or Anarchists.

The present world conflict is, among other things, an ideological conflict. Russian propaganda has succeeded to a remarkable degree in camouflaging its aims of world conquest with an ideology which has sucked in millions of dreamers or power-hungry demagogues. There is no doubt in the minds of those who have looked into conditions in Spain that the country would be of utmost importance as an ally against the Russian steamroller.

Yet, in Washington everything is being done to prevent Spain from fulfilling its role in the struggle against the evil forces of Moscow. The State Department and the White House, which alone oppose any steps to include the whole Iberian Peninsula in the forthcoming struggle for survival, have placed every conceivable barrier in the way of Spain's participation.

The stated reason is that General Franco is a dictator. But so is Tito, and a Communist to boot. That, however, does not impress our foreign-policy makers. They do not admit that the policy of expediency as it is applied to Tito should also be applied to the Communist-hating Spaniards.

President Truman has gone to greater lengths than any of his predecessors in thwarting the efforts of those who realize that Spain's military support is essential to the defense of Europe.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff, who are reliably reported to have urged in the National Security Council that Spain be included in the defense of western Europe, are puzzled. Their views are being ignored because the State Department insists that such a move would offend the Socialists in Britain and France.

Advantages of Our Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, there is an awareness today, I believe, among our citizens of the benefits conferred by the Constitution of the United States that is most gratifying because of the attacks which are being made upon the very rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution.

It was my privilege to speak on Saturday, September 16, 1950, before the joint Constitution Day banquet sponsored by the Delaware State Societies of the Sons of the American Revolution and the Daughters of the American Revolution, outstanding groups of patriotic citizens. These organizations have been conducting an educational campaign on the subject of the Constitution, which was given special emphasis last week by a campaign in the schools of Delaware which culminated in the combined banquet on Saturday evening.

Anything that can be done to bring before our people the advantages of our Constitution serves a definite purpose in these critical days. I therefore ask unanimous consent that my address before the Delaware societies be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Delaware, of all States of our Union, has the undoubted right to point proudly toward the Constitution of the United States.

Delaware has every right to acclaim its title as "First State" by reason of having been the first of the Original Thirteen Colonies to ratify, on December 7, 1787, the historic, but then unique, Constitution of this great land of free men.

On Constitution Day, it is fitting that all our citizens should pause and consider what our United States Constitution means to them and should give heartfelt thanks that they are fortunate enough to live under its protection. We are inclined to take our Constitution somewhat for granted. Yet, without it, most of the things that all of us hold most dear and precious would be denied us.

It is particularly in order that we shou'd do so at this time, when memories of the greatest war in history are still fresh in our minds, and when turmoil and strife again are threatening the peace and security of the entire world.

Basic in our Constitution is the thought that government exists for the benefit of the governed; that those who govern are the servants and not the masters of the people. Basic also is the thought that freedom and justice and liberty must be preserved to every individual and safeguarded against the assaults of opportunism, against the expediency of the passing hour, against encroachments that would eventually destroy the entire structure of our system.

These principles lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions—they are deeply rooted in our history and traditions. Many men have fought and bled and died that they might be preserved. The Constitution serves as a constant bar against all branches of our Government to prevent their destruction, to the end that freedom of the individual, under law, may forever continue in this country.

Our enemies now threatening these American institutions would destroy these precious freedoms. To them, the individual has no rights save those which the government chooses to accord him. It would be inconceivable in a totalitarian form of dictatorship for an individual citizen to claim protection against governmental action, and to be able to appeal to the courts to protect him against such action on the ground that it is forbidden to the government to take it. Here, each and all of us may do so.

In any evaluation of America's contribution to the art of orderly living in the world, our constitutional form of government must be placed at the head of the list. The system of life achieved and guaranteed by that imperishable document has weathered the storms of 163 years, in a world where progress during this long span has been noted chiefly for the changes of its various forms of government.

Since the American Constitution first was adopted, practically every other nation in the world has seen great changes, in many cases a succession of changes, in its form of government. Thrones have tumbled, dynasties have fallen, new empires, new republics, dictatorships have come into existence. Yet today, the United States of America, thanks to the foresight of our ancestors, is living and preparing for the solution of the vast problems ahead, under essentially the same instrument of government adopted in 1787.

If America has, indeed, made any lasting contribution—anything that deserves preserving, no matter what the cost—it is this immortal document, representing as it does a permanent endowment to the science of government and orderly living of men among men.

In this reference to the adoption and the maintenance of our great Constitution, may I be permitted to mention briefly, but with deep satisfaction, the part played by a distinguished son of Maryland, Luther Martin, in its framing and adoption, and the memorable defense of its integrity by another famous Marylander, Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney, of the Supreme Court.

One explanation, possibly the basic one, why our constitutional form of government has managed to survive throughout a period that witnessed the decay and overthrow of countless other systems is the coordination of the separate agencies of Government.

Never has there been a time when this coordination has been more necessary, when the best thought and wisest counsel have been so much needed, as at present. Thousands of American young men again are fighting in a foreign land, to defend our national and constitutional rights. They fight, furthermore, not by choice, but from necessity.

Uppermost in the minds of all our people during these trying years is the responsibility of preserving inviolate in our own land the essential, the fundamental liberties for which this war is being fought.

All of you know what those liberties are Liberty of speech and press, of peaceful assembly, of religious worship; freedom from condemnation except after fair and impartial trial—all of those basic rights which are included within our concept of due process of law—rights which we regard as so precious, so fundamental that, in the words of Justice Cardozo, they are "of the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty."

They lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions, "rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people."

Today those rights again are threatened with destruction—with replacement by a cold and brutal philosophy which would accord no liberties to the individual and make of him a slave to government by despots.

We are at war to preserve those rights for all mankind.

But we have a right to feel that the liberties which we regard as basic are qualified and not unlimited—that they cannot be pushed to the extent of endangering the existence of the government that protects them.

Justice Holmes once laid down the rule—repeatedly approved in recent decisions—that such liberties as freedom of speech and press, fundamental as they are, may yet not be carried to the point where their exercise constitutes a clear and present danger of causing substantive evils to result. Such a rule presents no easy standards to apply. For we know that danger may be great and all about us, and yet not clear to see. To apply that rule the courts, in the final analysis, must determine what constitutes a danger that is clear and present. They must strike a balance between the preservation of basic freedom, on the one hand, and of public safety, on the other. The future preservation of both will depend upon how that balance is struck.

When our Constitution was adopted it was generally regarded as a compromise—it satisfied neither those who favored a strong National Government nor those who felt keenly about maintaining the independence of the States. It was not written to make the Federal Government powerful. It set up a Union of States and provided that those powers not granted to the Federal Government are reserved to the States. The founding fathers had the wisdom to see that free speech, a free press, and freedom of assembly are not the only conditions necessary to maintain the democratic way of life. They set up a governmental structure which would give free play to the principles of diversity.

Today we are confronted by the vastly increased growth of governmental power. We must revitalize the traditional American doctrine which aimed to check the growth of the executive Government and bring about a revival of federalism, with its diffusion of governmental powers.

We should think once more in terms of a three-level system of government—Federal, State, and local, in order to strengthen our democracy. The importance of this three-level system lies in the fact that no one level can solve any of our major problems, whether it be housing, social security or the like. We must gear together all levels of government, the different public revenue systems, and the tax bases of the detailed conditions to which the law is to apply.

The most urgent message that can be given to the American people in connection with a Constitution Day observance, I am firmly convinced, is the necessity of our doing two things which are of prime importance to the preservation of constitutional guaranties and freedoms.

Our Nation must vigorously prosecute the fight to stop communism. Korea is merely a "local action" in what may well prove to be a continuing series of attacks on the world. At home here the effort to control subversives, both alien and American, is but another phase of that great world struggle.

Of equal importance, however, I am convinced, is the necessity of the utmost alertness and caution to preserve the economic soundness and stability of our Nation. Communism has proved itself thoroughly adept at taking advantage of national troubles and the one development in America to which they are looking forward expectantly and with full confidence is that our country will overspend itself to its own destruction.

We must rid ourselves of the false notion that the United States is rich enough to ignore the ordinary teachings of experience and common sense. The very fact that the Federal Government shoulders an increasing bonded . debtedness should be a warning flashing in every corner of the land to warn not only legislators but every thoughtful American citizen of the dangers that confront our country and the world.

In line with this conviction I tried, through appeals to the Congress and to the President himself to have $400,000,000 worth of nondefense projects eliminated or at least deferred because of the tremendous new spending which the Korean attack has shown to be necessary for our safety. Unless there is far greater appreciation of the dangers of unwise and unnecessary spending, we will not only find it more difficult to stem communism but we will weaken our internal strength which is what the enemies of our economic system fervently desire.

World events of the past decade have served to emphasize, as nothing else has ever done in the lifetime of most of us, the singular benefits and unmatched advantages which we, as American citizens, enjoy under our great Constitution. In the long and generally prosperous period between the Civil War and World War I, these constitutional safeguards of our liberties, priceless as we now know them to be, were taken more or less for granted. Our people enjoyed them, but because there was no apparent danger of losing them, the occasion for proper evaluation of their worth was lacking.

Today, however, as we look about us in the world, there is the tragic spectacle of hundreds of millions of our fellow human beings in abject bondage, toiling under brutal masters, despoiled not only of their earthly goods but of their every precious individual right. The comparison between our own privileged state and their condition is too pronounced to be ignored. It is as if the people of America were living in a world apart, a world far removed from the miseries of those once-free millions whose weakness or lack of alertness made possible their subjugation by communism's ruthless forces.

There is cause for heartfelt satisfaction that, in God's mercy, we have escaped the evils which have befallen other lands and other peoples. But there is cause also for renewed appreciation of the constitutional rights which are ours, and for the utmost vigilance in defense of those rights. Else the fate of so many other nations may well be ours, rich and powerful though we may be.

Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GUY M. GILLETTE
OF IOWA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement which I have prepared dealing with the development of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As all my farmer constituents know, I have been extremely interested in all movements that contribute toward world peace and toward a reasonable share of world prosperity for those who are engaged in agriculture. For several years I have been watching the development of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and I have been particularly impressed with the practical farmer approach adopted by its Director General, Mr. N. E. Dodd.

The FAO was set up in Hot Springs during the wartime period with the hope that it would become a real force in getting farmers to cooperate in the solution of their mutual problems. Its principal objectives were (1) to promote good relations between all nations, thereby promoting world peace, (2) to exchange the results of scientific research, and (3) to see that the farmers receive their fair share of the national income, providing of course that the consumers are supplied with good quality products at reasonable prices and that the farmers increase the fertility of the soil for future generations.

At this particular stage of world affairs, when everyone's eyes are turned toward the hopeful goal of peace rather than war, I want to stop for a minute and commend the real progress the FAO is making. Director General Dodd, though his intelligent administration and leadership, has made this progress possible. He has traveled widely among the less fortunate nations and has done everything he can to give them hope for a better standard of living. This is a proper and effective approach in our fight against communism, and I, for one, feel certain that all my associates join me in hoping that he will continue in the FAO, which he has managed in such a forthright and vigorous manner.

Letter From Hon. Alexander Wiley, of Wisconsin, to Pure Food and Drug Administration Regarding Enforcement of Oleomargarine Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have written a letter to Director Dunbar of the Pure Food and Drug Administration regarding enforcement of the oleomargarine law requiring restaurant identification of the artificial product. I ask unanimous consent that the text of my letter be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
September 15, 1950.

Mr. PAUL B. DUNBAR,
Commissioner, Pure Food and Drug Administration, Federal Security Agency, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I understand that a recent order of the Pure Food and Drug Administration prohibited the use of yellow coloring materials for various salad dressings. This was done on the ground that consumers might be deceived as to the amount of egg yolk contained in the dressing. It seems most peculiar to us of the dairy region that the Pure Food and Drug Administration should prohibit such yellow coloring in salad dressings but that the present National Administration as a whole doesn't seem to mind the equally unfair practice of yellow coloring of artificial oleo as a disguise for butter. Indeed, the present Administration killed the Gillette-Wiley amendment which was designed to prevent such disguising.

Your own agency stated that the yellow color in salad dressing which was imparted by various types of spices made the dressing appear to contain more egg yolk than it actually did. However, as recently pointed out by Mr. John Brandt, president of the Land O'Lakes Creameries, "Not only are there greater possibilities of deceiving the public in the substitution of a yellow-colored product for butter, but the economic effect to a great industry is far more serious than that which exists with respect to deception in the use of salad dressing."

Mr. Brandt went on to say that the possibility of oleo deception is even more important from the standpoint of the health and well-being of American families, especially children. I think, of course, that Mr. Brandt hit the nail right on the head.

It has been most disconcerting to me, therefore, that your Administration has not been given what I feel to be adequate funds to enable you to enforce the present unfortunate oleomargarine law. If you had been given sufficient funds, the harmful effect of that law might have been reduced, because you might have been better able to police those restaurants which might want to slip over oleo as butter.

I realize that the Pure Food and Drug Administration does not have as its major concern the welfare of American dairying, but rather the enforcement of those laws involving food and drugs. May I respectfully point out, however, as background, that the prices received by Wisconsin's farmers for milk sold in July 1950, averaged only around $3 per 100 pounds for all uses. It was only $2.90 for milk used in cheese and $3.05 for milk used in butter. This is an incredibly low return for a hundredweight of milk when one considers the prices paid by consumers at the retail level. While dairy products represent a perfect buy for the consumer because they are so vitamin-rich, it is a fact that the farmer does not get enough or a proportionate share of the money the consumer pays. I get around 6 cents per quart for milk sold on my farm; but the consumer pays 22 cents or so for that same milk.

In 1949, my State of Wisconsin produced 168,000,000 pounds of butter, which was an increase of 68,000,000 over 1948. Butter is now and has always been the balance wheel of the dairy industry.

The effects of the inadequate new oleo law are only beginning to be felt and the consequences throughout the Wisconsin economy will be very bad, indeed, as you can appreciate.

I was wondering, therefore, if you would be so kind as to send to me a statement as to how much you expect to accomplish with the funds which have been granted for enforcement of the present oleo law. Moreover, what do you think we in the Congress can now do to help you educate the American people so that they secure compliance with the law requiring restaurant identification of oleo? What can the dairy industry do to try to be of help in this regard?

I am sorry that the United States Bureau of the Budget, an agency of the Chief Executive, did not request sufficient funds for your enforcement duties, and am sorry, too, that the Congress failed even to provide the amounts which the Bureau had requested.

We of the dairy industry who have prided ourselves on constantly improving the nutritional standards of our national products want to be of maximum assistance to the Pure Food and Drug Administration. However, we have a right to ask the Administration be just as zealous in protecting the natural yellow color of butter as it seems to be in trying to prevent the unfair practice of disguising the amount of egg yolk in salad dressing.

I would very much appreciate hearing from you as soon as possible on this issue.

With all good wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

The Fight Against Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN L. McCLELLAN
OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, a few weeks ago I received from one of my constituents, Mrs. Inez M. Johnson, of Little Rock, Ark., a letter which deeply impressed me. I believe that the views and sentiments which she expresses are characteristic of and represent the profound thought of all informed, patriotic Americans.

I believe that every Member of Congress should read this letter. It is worthy of publication in the RECORD, and I have obtained her consent that it may be. I ask unanimous consent that the letter from this fine American citizen be placed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., July 18, 1950.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: May I add my voice to the many who are thinking about America's future?

You, who have made such an outstanding contribution to the clear-thinking statesmanship in these times, are probably deeply concerned over our grave crisis, because of your inside knowledge, that my small words are just so many more added to the daily grist.

I do believe, though, that the majority of the American people are aware of the seriousness of the situation. I believe that most Americans would prefer the gird for an all-out fight now with communism instead of dribbling away our resources as time runs out and we grow callous and weaker. Those of us who have recognized communism as a threat to our way of life, for more than two decades, and have suffered derision at the hands of the scoffers and apologists, are not going to join the silly ranks of "I told you so-ers," but are ready to do without if it means we can wipe out communism here before it completely takes over.

We have gone a long way in adopting many Communist objectives, and we as a people have grown soft in the mad scramble for something for nothing, while our resources have been drained. The home front will be chaotic, with many misguided wanting to tar everyone who will not swallow every idea proposed, as a Communist, with many others smeared because they won't fall into the propaganda booby traps prepared in Moscow. It will not be easy to recognize the fifth and sixth columns, for they can be your neighbor and mine, your friend and mine.

Never in our history has there been offered such an opportunity to rededicate ourselves as Americans, as now; never in our times has there been such a need for the whole of us to reaffirm our belief in America; never has there been a greater need for the Voice of America to be turned inward, to retell to our own citizens, the never-tiring miracle of America.

The people will not accept a business as usual, or a politics as usual attitude. And if we delay, accept official whitewashes of scandals in high places, we can expect the home-grown traitors to become bolder, while those who owe first allegiance to Moscow will not hestitate to carry on their plans for the overthrow of the United States and the establishment of the United States of Soviet America. It is customary for the public to wait until a terrible crime is committed, then round up the known suspects. Must we wait until a terrible tragedy happens before we round up the known suspects, the agents who are known to the FBI as trained saboteurs, acting under orders from Moscow?

The Communists have long recognized that the strongest force in America is the Congress of the United States, and that is why their smear artists have never failed to attack Members of Congress as objects of ridicule, derision, and scorn. And why the home-grown Communists and their supporters have always worked to reduce not only the power of Congress but to subtract, wherever possible, these powers. The only hope of the American people and their survival lies with the Congress.

The American people are deeply grateful to congressional committees, even though some of these have been springboards to personal political ambitions for some. The people need the protection of the Congress, for it is the only branch of Government that directly represents all the people. This fact seems to me, is so important, that the Congress should devise some way to set up a program to inform the people of their rights and responsibilities. And let it not be done with comic books.

Thank you, not only for Arkansas, but for the whole Nation, in your forthright and vigorous stand on so many vital public problems. Your many supporters and admirers throughout America look to you for wise leadership in these grave months and possibly years ahead.

Sincerely,

MRS. INEZ M. JOHNSON.

The Movement of Troops by the Railroads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a letter which I have received from Mr. Edwin W. Estep, a former serviceman, in regard to the movement of troops by the railroads. I believe that undoubtedly there were many abuses, particularly in the early days of World War II, and it seems to me that today, when many troops are again being moved, the responsible officials of America's railroads might well give consideration to the thoughtful suggestions of this former serviceman.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KOPPERSTON, W. VA., September 15, 1950.

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: It is not my intention to harshly criticize the movement of troops in the United States, but I think you should know exactly how one of your supporters feel about the subject.

I was in the military service from January 17, 1941, until October 4, 1945, and during that time I served in Camp Shelby, Miss.;

Canal Zone; Fort Benning; Camp Pickett; Camp Jackson, S. C.; Fort Meade, Md.; Camp Shanks; and Camp Miles Standish, Mass. You can see that in all those movements, that I should have some idea about how troops travel. In this respect, I unhesitatingly state that the United States Army, coupled with the American railroads, have no idea as to how troops feel about the way they are transported. The recent affair at the little town in Ohio where 33 men died, in my opinion, is still more of the same principle whereby men are moved such as cattle. The Army or the railroads are at fault. I have yet to see any troops given the common decency of providing them with the same travel that civilians use except when they reserve their own seat and pay for it.

When I was at Camp Shelby, Miss., I noted with disgust that furloughs were granted en masse and several troops got to go home at the same time. Accordingly, the Southern Railroad Co. evidently was notified that the furloughs were granted and they promptly got two or three cattle-car type of coaches which had cinders a quarter of an inch thick in them. The windows were all raised which you know is a far cry from the modern air-conditioned coaches. At the beginning of the regular train cars, the doors were locked so that the "dog faces" could not mingle with the better class of travelers. The same thing happened at Camp Picket, Va. The N. & W. Railroad picked up a car or two extra and at Blackstone, Va., the main train was locked so the GI's could not get anywhere except in the cattle-car section. And on down the line. Well, so much for the furlough type.

Now take official traveling. When I was transferred with several other men from Camp Jackson to Fort Meade, the QM ordered so many cars and we got exactly the same type of cars as probably blew out the air hoses in Ohio Going from Meade to Shanks, the same thing again. It was so cold men wore their overcoats in the cars which were also dilapidated type. This was credited to the N. Y., N. H. & H. Railroad.

In another instance, I was sent from Fort Benning, Ga., to Camp Pickett, Va., and I was informed that I would ride coach to Atlanta, thence pullman to Burkeville, Va., which is the southern connecting point on the Norfolk and Western. After I got to Atlanta I was informed that I had no priority and must ride coach. I talked to some of the authorities at Fort Oglethorpe and all I got from them was to see the chaplain. Now we know that the railroad got the pullman fare and I rode to Burkeville, Va., in the cattle-car type of cars. However, due to the war effort, everyone seemed to let things ride and cause as little confusion as possible, but every single GI knew he had been on a cattle train. When he got off, he was supposed to look like a soldier, but you should have seen those GI's as they unloaded with train cinders and soot all over their clothes. Now, one shouldn't criticize unless he can offer a solution. I propose:

1. That United States troops be moved on the finest equipment available on the railroads. This would eliminate a casualty list before they get to the front. After all, why shouldn't they get the best. After all, they are only putting their life on the line.

2. That American railroads give first priority to traveling troops so that they arrive at their destination without being sick of days and days on the rails.

3. That American troops be fed on trains the same as other first-class travel. No more of this lining up in the cars such as has been the practice in previous years. Have enough tables that the customary chow line vanishes from the rails. Even if it takes four diners on the rails.

4. In the case of small detachments moving, instead of troop trains, that they be given a reserved seat on the regular trains, and that they be allowed to eat and sign the bill instead of having to pay the porter or waiter extra for first-class service that he so richly deserves. Remember, he is laying his life on the line at the end of his trip. In the last war, tickets to the diner were issued and the waiters had a set cheap menu already picked out for him unless you tickled his hand with some "green."

If the above things are considered, it will certainly make a soldier feel like his country is behind him. It will not solve the problem but it is bound to help. When troops are traveling, they need all the help they can get.

Please allow me to share your views on this and other subjects relative to troop travel. Certainly we don't want another of the Spirit of St. Louis affairs. We cannot stand that type of casualty lists. I'm probably sounding bad and prejudiced against the rails but as good as the United States Government is to them during an emergency or normal times for that matter, troop consideration would be a small price to pay back.

Your very respectfully,

EDWIN W. ESTLP.

Address at Democratic Rally, Belleville, Ill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the Democratic rally, Fairgrounds, Belleville, Ill., Sunday, August 27, 1950:

As we assemble here this afternoon let us as Democrats review the achievements of our party. We Democrats have the satisfaction of knowing that our party has accomplished much for our Nation and our State during the past 17 years. Our party reestablished the people's confidence in their Government which was left prostrate back in the 1930's, after 12 years of Republican incompetence and misrule. Our party has made a great record of achievement by applying Democratic principles and ideals to the solutions of the people's problems.

The record of the Democratic Party from Grover Cleveland to Harry Truman is replete with legislation that recognizes the welfare of the individual. Individual prosperity means a more happy and patriotic American family life.

During the last 17 years the Democratic Party enacted a procession of legislation for the benefit of the individual which never has been equaled by any nation in world history.

The basis for a free democracy is a contented, prosperous, and wholesome family life. History has taught us that when the family disintegrates, government crumbles. No organization in the world has recognized the family as an essential unit in preserving free government more than the Democratic Party. A prosperous, contented family, free from want and fear, with reasonable security for the future, will never capitulate to communism. I recall some of the Democratic legislation which has built up the American home, both on the farm and in the city.

In 1912, with the aid of a Democratic Congress, Woodrow Wilson established Federal aid for the construction of highways, a workable farm-credit system, the Federal Trade Commission and the Clayton antitrust laws to modernize machinery against monopolistic practices. The Adamson 8-hour-day law and the Democratic Congress aided Wilson in giving labor and agriculture a charter under which they might form associations for their advancement and protection. It was in Woodrow Wilson's administration that the Federal Reserve System was established which gave us the soundest and best banking system in the history of the world. Wilson also established a good neighbor policy with the republics of the Western Hemisphere and did away with dollar diplomacy.

Then came the administrations of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, which period was characterized in the beginning by an era of public corruption and ended with the most devastating depression and unemployment debacle in the history of the Nation. The people, discontented and despondent, turned to the Democratic Party in those dark days of 1932 and 1933.

Once again the Government became interested in the welfare of the individual. The farmer was elevated from near-serfdom to his present high position in the Nation's economy. Democratic farm legislation has placed agriculture on an economic basis equal to industry. Every farmer is thankful for the Agricultural Adjustment Act, soil conservation, rural electrification, farm supports, and legislation bringing about greater markets and greater uses for agricultural products. In 1935 only 12 percent of farm homes enjoyed electricity. Today over 85 percent of our farm homes have rural electrification.

A flood-control program was adopted to protect our rivers and valleys from recurring and devastating floods. We cooperated with agriculture on a comprehensive reclamation program.

A National Labor Relations Act which gave organized labor its first charter of freedom and equality with the employer was made a reality under the Wagner Act. Maximum wages and minimum hours were also provided for the workers of the Nation.

A social security system was initiated providing old-age benefits, old-age assistance, and unemployment compensation. The Democratic Party recognized the duty of society to those who have spent their lives in its service. The Eighty-first Congress has further expanded this system with greater benefits to a greater number of people. Republican reactionary Congressmen called social security socialistic when the original bill was passed in 1938, and also when the present Congress expanded it they repeated the charge.

Confidence in our American banking system was reestablished by the Democratic Party by the national banking guaranty law and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The Eighty-first Congress has increased the protection to the Nation's bank depositors.

Before the people turned to the Democratic Party back in 1932 and 1933 to rescue them from the Republican misrule, bank failures were daily news stories. The creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was one of the very first of the New Deal reforms. In 16 years of operation it has been compelled to go to the aid of only 407 banks, with practically all of the depositors insured against loss. What a contrast to the Republican picture—the 1930–33 period when 3,643 banks failed and total losses to depositors amounted to more than $1,000,000,000. In 12 years of Republican rule, from 1921 to 1933, the number of commercial banks in the United States decreased from approximately 30,600 unit banks to fewer than 14,000 banks. That was Republican free enterprise.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is one Democratic creation that even the most hardshell Republican conservative knows is here to stay because of its manifest benefits.

And there are millions of American home owners who were saved from mortgage foreclosures by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and millions of new home owners who have been aided by the Federal Housing Administration.

Time does not permit reviewing all of the progressive legislation passed under Democratic administrations. The Democratic Party has been successful in five Presidential elections because it does not complacently wait for a problem to solve itself. It takes affirmative action before the problem overwhelms us. For that reason the people of the Nation have supported our party and have rejected the timid and vacillating leadership of the Republican Party. Republican leaders are terrified at progress. They are forever looking fondly backward for safety. They squint timidly at the future, hoping that nothing new will ever have to be done. The elephant never forgets, because he only dreams of the past.

We Illinois Democrats are justly proud of the great statesmen that our party has produced. We proudly boast of the names of Altgeld, Dunne, Horner, Stevenson, J. Hamilton Lewis, Paul Douglas, and Scott Lucas. What a glorious parade of distinguished Democratic leaders, who never committed an act that dimmed the luster of their party or their State.

Why is it that the Republican leaders never mention with pride the names of their former governors and party leaders? They are silent about the names of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, and they wish that Illinois would forever forget the Len Smalls and the Dwight Greens.

After 20 years of defeats, the Republican Party leaders should realize that the American people demand constructive progress and are not interested in gripes, criticism, phony investigations, and slogans. We all remember the slogan of McKinley's day: "The full dinner pail." In the Harding campaign, it was "Back to normalcy," and as a consequence, the Lodges, Pews, and the Jim Wat'ons defeated our entry into the League of Nations and brought on the greatest depression in world history. In 1928, Hoover advocated "two cars in every garage and a chicken in every pot." In 1936, the slogan of Alfred Landon was, "Vote Republican and save the homes, schools, and churches of America," and the only people Alf scared were up in Maine and Vermont. They have had other fine-sounding slogans since, and will have them again this year—a party without a record to which they can point with pride and without a program to offer must have such bait. But they no longer find the American people gullible.

Republican orators claim the United States is on the road to bankruptcy and traveling "The last mile to collectivism." The facts prove them wrong. No nation is on the road to bankruptcy whose people enjoy a national income of $220,000,000,000 dollars per year. No nation is on its way to bankruptcy which in 1 year, produced $250,000,000,000 worth of goods and services—has more than $100,000,000,000 in savings—has over 60,000,000 employed—guarantees deposits of its people—and whose corporations are paying the largest dividends in history.

Just about a year ago when the Republicans were trying to talk up a depression they received little encouragement even from the most conservative financial experts and from their usually supporting national magazines. News Week, for instance, joined others in stating that America could never be visited by another depression as serious as the one in the early thirties. Their reason for that statement was that the progressive legislation, some of which I have already enumerated in this speech, has formed an economic cushion which would, in spite of widespread unemployment, provide buying power and stability which would save our Nation from panic and paralysis.

Yes, my friends, the domestic program of the New Deal has been a success. So much so that the Republicans have ceased their cries to repeal the legislation that has brought so many benefits to the people of America and which has made the Nation's economy stronger as a result. But they have not ceased their back door attempts to sabotage these gains the people have made under Democratic administrations. The workingman will never forget the Republican Eightieth Congress—neither will the farmer.

For 10 years while he was a Member of Congress our Democratic Representative from this district, my former boss, Ed Schaefer, gave his full support to this progressive program and labor and the farmers of this area owe to Mr. Schaefer a lasting debt of gratitude. Since I have been a Member of Congress I have supported a continuation and improvement of these reforms. As a Member of the House of Representatives and as a Member of the United States Senate, SCOTT LUCAS supported the program of the Democratic Party to bring a better way of life to the American people.

The Republicans can't say as much for their candidate for the United States Senate. Labor knows how the Republican candidate voted in opposition to its interest at every opportunity. The farmers of Illinois will not forget Mr. Dirksen's votes against rural electrification and soil conservation, nor his attempt at complete sabotage of the Democratic farm program when as a subcommittee chairman during the Republican Eightieth Congress he sought such drastic cuts in appropriations for rural electrification, Agricultural Adjustment Administration, agricultural research fund, Farmers Home Administration and for construction of forest roads, that these programs would have been stymied.

So much for our domestic problems, which have been and should always be of major importance to us. Our party has certainly held them so—that is the reason it does something about them when it is in power. But today, the first, and without doubt, the most important problem to us—is world peace.

With American soldiers dying in Korea—it isn't easy to keep that goal before us. Yet, we must realize that this Korean war is a war for peace. The United Nations must win that war and forever make clear to totalitarian governments that they will not tolerate aggression. This is the test of the United Nations. If we fail now we will face the infinitely greater danger of a third world war and the catastrophe it will mean for mankind.

And I think it is important to remember that in Korea under the United Nation's flag there are men with white, black, and yellow skin fighting and dying together to uphold the principle that men should be free to govern themselves.

The unanimous support the American people are giving President Truman in his courageous course in Korea—in the President's firm determination that the peaceful will of the United Nations shall prevail in Korea, indicates the sort of unity that is the strength of our democracy. It is the kind of unity that will insure not only our own national security but that of freedom-loving peoples everywhere.

But with a few professional politicians, even in the face of this world crisis, it is politics as usual as they seek to make political hay of this serious international situation. Placing politics above everything else, they seek to confuse the people and make the most reckless charges in an effort to further their own selfish end. The remarkable thing about this is that the very ones who are shouting the loudest are those whose records would not bear close scrutiny—those who believed a balanced budget would bring them more votes than expenditures for adequate military preparations—those who believed they could defeat the Soviet aggressor from the back seat of a Cadillac.

There is plenty of hindsight on the Republican side of the congressional aisle today. All of us are gifted with a bit of hindsight, but I am glad that I can stand here this afternoon and report that I opposed the drastic cut in military appropriations the Republican Eightieth Congress made back in 1947. I charged then that our military strength would suffer from these cuts and in an Armistice day speech at Collinsville in 1947, I said this:

"There is a great deal that we can do to prevent a third world war. We can do what we failed to do between 1914 and 1917, and what we failed to do between 1932, when Hitler came to power, and 1941, when war was forced upon us. We can build our own defenses. We can make sure that when any aggressor nation attacks us, he will find us prepared to defeat his attack, and indeed to take retaliatory action."

That was my warning to the Republican Eightieth Congress in 1947.

I further warned them:

"We cannot enjoy freedom and be weak. If we are strong, freedom becomes our reward and our inheritance. It is for us to choose." But those who today have so much hindsight preferred then to make their political stand on a balanced budget, in itself a worthy objective, if it could be obtained without the sacrifice of world peace.

While the hindsight experts of today were shouting for quick demobilization in 1945, I sounded this warning in a Labor Day speech at Woodriver:

"If at this time we weaken our international position—by quick demobilization—it just means that the United States relegates itself to the status of a second- or third-class power.

"Other nations will be only too glad to do the occupation job for us and to establish world peace in conformity with their thinking and ideologies."

Those statements were made in 1945 and 1947.

So I think I can challenge the hindsight boys today, and I can talk up to them when they attempt to place the blame for the disturbed world situation. I believe that they, more than any other single factor, should be charged with the blame for the North Korean act of aggression because it was the lack of vision shown by such men that gave comfort to potential aggressors.

There is just cause for the people of America to be concerned about our defenses. Because of Korea we are now awakened to the real danger that exists in the world and we are preparing to meet it. Because of Korea we will be united in the effort.

Many have been very much disturbed by the early reverses we suffered at the hands of the Korean Reds. Now the tide is turning and we will ultimately attain complete victory. My concern over our defenses isn't of recent vintage. I have always advocated the maintenance of a strong American Army, Navy, Marines, and Air Force. Upon every occasion I have vigorously advocated the strengthening of our Armed Forces to make them powerful enough to defend America against any enemy. I am proud, as a Democrat, to be able to point to a similar record for Senator LUCAS.

The aggregate amount of military appropriations for the 5 fiscal years of 1946-50 totals $90,000,000,000. It is only natural that thoughtful people should be asking the question, "Where did the money go?"

We have believed—we had been led to believe—that the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force was ready to meet and put down aggression anywhere in the world. We have heard the boast of men in high places of our ability to wage immediate and successful retaliatory counterattack, whenever and wherever aggression occurred.

Why then, these thoughtful people now ask, with such enormous expenditures to make us militarily strong, did the Communist attack in Korea find us so tragically weak? What of our promised retaliatory action? What of our national security? Just how were our defense dollars spent? And what will happen if the next aggression should be against the continental United States?

These are questions thoughtful people have every right to ask. They are all questions of the sort we should expect from people concerned—and properly so—with economy. I think my friends will agree with me that Americans in general are always concerned with economy, and the reduction of taxes.

As a Nation we are unexcelled for patriotism, but our patriotism in war has always been matched by our insistence on economy in time of peace. We long for normalcy, and reduced taxes. Always in war we have made a supreme effort, rallied to the colors, increased our industrial production, made sacrifices—achieved victory. But always in the period of peace that followed war we have demanded economies, reduction of taxes, reduction in the size of the Military Establishment, and a stepping up of our already high standard of living. We have been willing to pay for wars; we have been generous with our veterans, their widows, and their children; but we have never been less than grudging about paying for peace, and providing the sort of Military Establishment that could keep the peace—and provide an adequate national defense.

Since the end of World War II, economy, therefore, has been the order of the day and the American people as a whole approved. Under our democratic form of government, Congress is ever mindful of the wishes of the American people. As a result Congress has made certain economies in government that the present course of events indicates to have been unwise. Up to the time of the Korean War, Congress was considering making additional cuts and imposing further economies on our Military Establishment.

So, in my opinion when we ask "Where did the money go?" we are revealing a preoccupation with the past that bodes ill for our planning for the future. But let's see—where did that $90,000,000,000 appropriated since 1946 go?

Forty-five percent of it—$42,000,000,000—went to pay for the cost of liquidating World War II, including the cost of terminal-leave payments to military personnel who were demobilized, the amounts paid to contractors whose wartime production contracts were terminated, and so on. Terminal-leave payments alone accounted for two and one-quarter billion dollars.

During the postwar years we have incurred heavy costs for maintaining the peace in distant lands. Nearly half of our Army has been overseas in occupied countries in Europe and in Asia. We have had to bear the costs of having substantial portions of our Navy in the Mediterranean in the interest of world peace, and we have had to bear the costs of saving Berlin with the airlift.

Because most of the liquidation costs referred to above were incurred during the fiscal year 1946, that year alone accounted for approximately half of the 5-year total of $50,000,000,000.

During the past 4 years the money needed to pay, feed, and clothe the Armed Forces has cost an average of $5,000,000,000 a year—41 percent of the 4 years' average of approximately $12,000,000,000 annual Armed Forces appropriation.

An average of $3,000,000,000 a year, 26 percent, has gone to meet the cost of operating and maintaining the aircraft, ships, tanks, and military installations that go to make up our military strength.

The purchase of aircraft, ships, tanks, and other weapons has accounted for two and one-quarter billion dollars, 18 percent. And it is worthy of note that the procurement of such equipment has increased from a low of 6 percent in fiscal year 1947 to a high of 19½ percent in the fiscal year that ended last July 1. It is also worthy of note that 60 percent of the President's recently recommended ten-and-one-half-billion-dollar supplemental budget is for such major procurement.

Over the 4-year period research and development on new weapons accounted for approximately 5 percent, or an average of slightly more than one-half billion dollars a year.

The remaining 10½ percent went as follows:

National Guard and Reserve costs, 4 percent;

Service-wide and classified projects, 3 percent;

Retired pay of military personnel, 1½ percent;

Military public works, including housing, 1 percent; and

All other costs, 1 percent.

True—economy, in one form or another, was imposed on the armed services. But even with the reduced funds appropriated the armed services did not wither away. The funds appropriated were not spent wastefully, nor without achieving strength in the Defense Department by establishing a framework ready for quick expansion to develop a combat potential to meet our commitments in the fight to halt aggression. Armchair strategists notwithstanding, I say the armed services have built up their strength tremendously with the funds provided. They have used well what limited sums were allotted to them.

The enemy never attacks where a nation is strong. The enemy always attacks where a nation is weak. The Reds have not attacked the industrial heart of our Nation; they have not attacked our allies in the North Atlantic Defense Pact. They attacked in Korea, where we had no military commitments, no troops, and no pledge of defense. Their attack provided reverses that have led earnest citizens to ask the natural questions about our military expenditures, but the success of Red strategy has not proved our weakness elsewhere, and it has not proved that money appropriated for defense has been misspent.

The money we have spent on long-range strategic bombers has not been wasted. The strategic aircraft that can carry the atom bomb was and still is the blue chip on which we have placed our hope of ultimate victory—it pins Russia down all over the world. It is not yet in action, and unless the Korean situation develops into a global war, it may never be in action. But it exists, and the decision to maintain it—the delivery agent for the atomic bomb—still remains a deterrent to the Red's plans.

It is without apology, therefore, that I say let us stop crying over the past and start working for the future. Let us do whatever needs to be done now to increase our military strength, to support our President, to keep faith with our people, and to insure the victory of the United States and the United Nations in restoring peace in Korea and preserving it elsewhere in the world. The course of events in Korea has now brought us to the point where the military considerations are more important than the fiscal considerations. It is no longer a question of what military establishment the economy of the country can afford, or even of what military establishment we have built with the funds appropriated, but of what military establishment is necessary to win the war, and to prevent it from growing into world war III.

Awakened to the danger by the Korean situation, many Americans have at last recognized the threat posed by communism anywhere in the world. We know that it is not enough to be strong in the continental United States, or in the conquered countries we occupy. We must have the reserve strength to put what we need, in the matter of arms and men, in Korea, or elsewhere, and still maintain our strength at home.

President Truman has been determined in his resistance to the spread of communism wherever it reared its ugly head. Our international program in extending aid to war-stricken democracies, the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, the mutual defense program, the Greek-Turkey aid program, which brought the promulgation of the Truman doctrine, have curtailed the advance of communism in Europe and are building defenses to preserve world peace. In country after country in western Europe where free elections have been held, since the start of the Marshall plan, communism has been rolled back. No wonder Communists hate free elections and fight the Marshall plan.

We who love freedom and hate tyranny face the task not only of maintaining the strength and power of our own country but of giving inspiration and material aid to other countries that also love freedom.

We have learned throughout world history that the fight for liberty and free government never is ended. Only the far-sighted nations that are willing to undergo sacrifice survive.

Every human who believes in God and Christianity throughout the world is trusting America's leadership. Providence has given us freedom, democracy, prosperity, power, and strength. May we have the wisdom and courage to accept our responsibility that future generations can enjoy self-government, freedom, and liberty.

We must not fail our responsibility.

Mrs. Perle Mesta

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement prepared by me dealing with the friendly type of good-will diplomacy practiced by one of our newest and friendliest of ministers, Mrs. Perle Mesta, at Luxemburg.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In these times when good will is so necessary, and so often lacking, in relations with people of other lands, perhaps too little attention is paid at times to the very friendly type of good-will diplomacy which is the stock in trade of one of our newest and friendliest ministers, Mrs. Perle Mesta, at Luxemburg.

I am prompted to make the above observation by receipt of word that has just come to me from that principality concerning the prompt and humane action which Mrs. Mesta took to relieve the woes of a number of young people from the United States, members of the Youth Argosy traveling through Europe, when they were unexpectedly delayed in their return to this country and many of them found themselves entirely without funds.

Certainly the American Legation must have seemed a real haven of refuge to these worried and hungry young people. Mrs. Mesta set up a canteen where all were welcome to meals of baked beans, ham, sandwiches, apple pie, and coffee. Good, homely American fare all of it but, under the circumstances like manna from heaven to the several hundred young travelers.

Every one of these young Americans of the future will long remember the cordial treatment received at the hands of Mrs. Mesta. Likewise the Luxemburgers, who have seen repeated instances of such hospitality, and many of whom have been guests of the Minister at the Legation, will be favorably impressed toward America and all its people by the kindliness and thoughtfulness with which Mrs. Mesta carries all her responsibilities as American representative at Luxemburg.

Address by Hon. J. M. Donaldson, Postmaster General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOM STEED
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include an address delivered by Postmaster General Jesse M. Donaldson at the national convention banquet of the National Association of Postal Supervisors held in Washington on September 13. Since this speech contains a great deal of new information on present conditions and reforms in the postal service, I am sure all Members will find it informative and valuable reading.

The text of the address follows:

It is a pleasure and a privilege to be here tonight, breaking bread and visiting with the postal supervisors of the United States, in this great hotel ballroom located in the Nation's Capital.

Believe me, folks, I am always proud, indeed, to meet and talk with the men and women of this fine organization of postal people, who strive day in and day out to render a good postal service to the public under many adverse conditions.

At the outset I want to express to each and all of you my deep and sincere appreciation for the unstinted and wholehearted cooperation you have given to me and the officials of the Post Office Department during these trying times. During the past several months our road has not been an easy one; neither has yours. The path ahead will contain some thorns and stumbling blocks. I take much consolation in the fact that through all of this we in the Department can be assured that you postal supervisors will be in there pitching. It is reassuring to know success in operating an adequate and economical postal service to the public is not yet regarded as a disgrace in this great country of ours, and that the greatest number of our people are understanding and unselfish.

Most, if not all, of our troubles have been caused by lack of knowledge of the postal service by those who are constantly making misrepresentations and engaging in so much loose talk about a business of which they know so little.

Let us take a brief glance at the problems, over which we have little or no control, that have brought about this almost impossible situation for us.

Since June 30, 1945, the annual cost of operating the postal service has increased by more than $1,000,000,000, while the annual receipts have increased by approximately $250,000,000. This has increased the gap between receipts and expenditures to approximately $750,000,000. Little or nothing has been done to increase the revenues to at least partly close this gap. About $800,000,000 of this additional cost covers well-deserved salary increases for postal people, and approximately $150,000,000 is for additional cost for transportation of the mail by surface and by air. We have no control over either. There have been increased costs to cover rentals on buildings occupied by post offices and stations, trucks, equipment, and supplies.

Had there not been good management and good supervision on the part of you people, we could have ended the last fiscal year with a deficit of $750,000,000. Well, we absorbed about $200,000,000 of the increased cost and ran a deficit of about $550,000,000.

Over the years little attention was paid to the amount of the deficit until it became so large dollarwise. It then began to attract attention notwithstanding the fact that the postal service had grown to become the greatest single business institution of the country and notwithstanding the fact that the deficit during a number of years of operation was greater percentagewise than it is today. In other words, in the fiscal year 1852 the deficit was 37 percent of the revenues; in 1853 the deficit was 52 percent of the revenues; in 1860 the deficit was 125 percent of the revenues; in 1921 the deficit was 34 percent of the revenues; in 1932 it was 34 percent of the revenues; in 1948 it was 22 percent of the revenues, and in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950, the deficit was approximately 33 percent of the revenues.

Because the current deficit is large dollarwise, many statements have been made to the effect that this indicates archaic methods, poor management, and much waste in the operation of the service. This is not a good yardstick and such figures do not reflect good or poor management. If it did, then there must have been some poor management in previous years when the deficit was much larger percentagewise than it is today. However, the deficit is much too great and I have been trying to do something about it for the past two or more years.

There seems to be little or no inclination to increase rates on low-revenue producing mail and many of those who feel that the rates should not be increased frequently make statements to the effect that if the Post Office Department was modernized and streamlined, and a new accounting system was inaugurated, some two hundred and fifty to three hundred million dollars annual savings could be made. They do not realize that annual savings of not more than $25,000,000 could be made if we eliminated entirely all accounting now performed by the postal service. In other words, if we threw all our books and records into the river and maintained no accounts at all, it would be most optimistic to think we could save in excess of $25,000,000 per annum. It does not cost us that much now to perform all of our accounting procedures.

So much propaganda has been used in opposition to increased postage rates on low revenue-producing mail that it tends to minimize factual statements presented by the Department. Misrepresentations will travel across the country twice before truth gets its boots on; this in spite of the fact that there is no power on earth more formidable than the truth. There is no novelty in the statement that we live in a period of stress, and this may be responsible for the inconsistency on the part of those who are prone to make loose statements. This reminds me of a statement made by a distinguished Member of Congress before a recent postal gathering in which he criticized me because of his opposition to the recent reduction in deliveries in residential sections of cities. This gentleman voted for the appropriation which had been reduced below the Department's request and, subsequent to the issuance of my order for readjustment of postal service, he voted for the so-called Taber-Thomas amendment which would have further reduced the amount of money appropriated for the Post Office Department by more than $200,000,000. He signed the discharge petition to bring H. R. 8195 out of the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives, and he voted for this bill to rescind my order of April 17, 1950. While the bill was under discussion a Member of Congress offered an amendment, which I quote:

"There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act."

This amendment was to provide the money to restore the postal services which were curtailed in accordance with my order of April 17. This gentleman who criticizes me voted against the amendment to appropriate the money for the restoration of the services and then within the next few minutes voted for the bill to order me to restore the services. I wonder what he thinks I can use for money. In dealing with this kind of inconsistency, about all we can do is to argue with patience, differ with respect, give honor to sincerity, and seek the truth.

I shall not burden you good people further with our troubles. I prefer to tell you a little about some of the progress we are making in line with the reorganization of the Post Office Department and, in our efforts to improve the service, reduce the cost, and take advantage of any and all kinds of modernization in the way of facilities which are suitable for use in the postal service and which can be adapted to postal needs.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT FINANCIAL CONTROL ACT OF 1950

On August 17, 1950, the President approved Public Law 712, Eighty-first Congress, which is an act to provide improved procedures with respect to the financial control of the Post Office Department.

Under this law, the Postmaster General is authorized to set up a new system that shall conform to accounting principles and standards prescribed by the Comptroller General of the United States which will give to the Department:

1. Adequate accounting and internal control over and accountability for all funds, property, and other assets for which the Department is responsible, including appropriate provisions for internal audit.

2. Assembling of financial information needed for management purposes.

3. Full disclosure of the financial results of the operations of the Department.

This law was passed after many conferences and discussions and much study over a long period by representatives of the Post Office Department, Bureau of the Budget, Treasury Department, and the General Accounting Office. The Comptroller General and I met on a number of occasions to discuss the proposals set forth by all parties concerned. This bill lays a solid foundation for the modernization and improvement of the financial controls of the Department. It is a constructive and cooperative development which the Comptroller General and I have every reason to believe will provide for the Post Office Department a system of accounting, financial reporting, and audit second to none inside or outside the Government. It gives full recognition to the Department's special status as a revenue-producing public service organization.

For a long time, due to other laws enacted many years ago, a great deal of the administrative accounting work of the Post Office Department has been done by the General Accounting Office. Those laws have been repealed by the new act.

Under the existing procedure all of the individual accounts of postmasters with supporting papers and vouchers were transmitted to the Department for administrative examination and then submitted to the General Accounting Office for final audit and settlement.

This law was approved less than a month ago but my representatives and the representatives of the other agencies affected are actively engaged in the preliminary steps necessary for the establishment of the new system.

Congress recognized the enormity of the problem by providing that the President may, by Executive order, postpone the application of any or all of the provisions of this act for a period of not to exceed 2 years if he determines that such postponement is in the public interest and necessary to insure the implementation of this act in an orderly and efficient manner.

In the Post Office Department we have never been satisfied with the arrangement set up many years ago requiring that our accounts and financial transactions be preaudited and finally audited in detail by the General Accounting Office. While we are in agreement with the idea that the Congress should exercise, through the Comptroller General, final audit of all governmentary expenditures, the Comptroller General and I have also agreed, and the Congress has approved of this agreement, that in carrying out that function it is not necessary for the General Accounting Office to keep our books and to carry on the day-to-day accounting procedures for this far-flung organization.

Under the new system that will be set up, it is my purpose to avoid duplication and rehandling of items to the fullest extent possible. The new system will provide for audits and adjustment to be concluded in the field with practically all of the accounting papers to be retained in the field audit units. Adequate controls will be established to protect the public generally and to protect postmasters and other accounting officers. These field units will make frequent reports to the Department where the general ledgers will be maintained and where accounts will be consolidated. The central control unit in the Department will make up all financial statements which are now being prepared in the General Accounting Office and will also supply to me and to the operating officials information for managerial purposes.

In setting up this system, we are going to utilize the most modern machinery that has been or can be developed for accounting purposes. This is a progressive step of major importance and I am quite sure that we will be ready to install many of its features which affect the field service by July 1, 1951.

NEW MONEY ORDER FORM AND PROCEDURE

One of the oldest and most popular and widely used special services operated by the Post Office Department is the money order service. This service was established November 1, 1864, and from the standpoint of convenience, necessity and universal availability, it has without doubt become the Nation's outstanding if not its leading medium for remittances of money in amounts up to $100. This is evident from the volume and value of the money orders issued and paid annually.

During the fiscal year 1949 more than 313,000,000 money orders, aggregating almost $5,000,000,000 in value, were issued. This means the handling or turnover of approximately $10,000,000,000 annually in the issuing and paying of orders. In addition to this vast business, more than 90,000,000 postal notes amounting to $470,000,000 were issued and paid during the fiscal year 1949, making a total of 403,000,000 transactions representing a combined total value of $5,345,000,000.

Unfortunately, the revenue from this great service is not sufficient to pay for its operation. The excess of expenditures over the revenues from the money order service in the fiscal year 1949 was $28,409,699. This condition has prevailed for many years and has been the subject of considerable discussion, in the Department, by Congress, and elsewhere. One of the principal causes of the loss in the handling of the money order business is the unavoidable, involved and complicated accounting procedure in connection with the issuing, payment, and auditing of the business.

Much consideration has been given during the past 5 years to studying and developing plans for modernizing, streamlining and improving the money order service. The resumption of the issuance of postal notes in the form of a prepunched card was an effort to determine by actual experiment the feasibility of the use of a punched card form of remittance. The results have amply demonstrated the advantages and economies which may be obtained through the use of a punch card form and it is with considerable satisfaction that I can say to you at this time that we are in process of completing plans for the adoption of a new money order form and system for its handling which it is believed will not only improve and modernize the money order service but at the same time will effect a substantial saving in the cost of its operation.

The basis of the new system, which it is planned to inaugurate on July 1, 1951, is a money order form printed on a tabulating card prepunched to designate a regional post office and serial numbers which will supersede the present blue paper form and also the postal note now sold at post offices of the first and second classes.

The new money orders may be cashed at any post office or bank and will be cleared through Federal Reserve banks. The area to be served by each of the 12 regional post offices will conform generally with the Federal Reserve districts. The installation of newly designed electrical tabulating equipment in Federal Reserve banks and at the regional post offices will enable the paid orders to be set up in serial number sequence and mechanically checked against the issuing postmaster's accountability much more quickly and economically than is possible under present accounting procedure.

In developing the new money order form and system it was essential to bear in mind that in large cities as much as 95 percent of the money orders are paid through banks. While, of course, the banks accept money orders as an accommodation to their depositors, the troublesome third-office feature presents an annoying obstacle to the ready clearance of money orders by the banks, as well as a lot of work to post offices in keeping records of such transactions. This problem will be eliminated by making the new money order payable anywhere.

The new system will involve many departures from the present procedure, one of the most important of which is that money orders paid by banks will be routed through banking channels to the Federal Reserve banks in much the same manner as Treasury checks and other cash items are now cleared. The Federal Reserve banks will then turn the paid orders over to the respective regional post offices, which in turn will prove the debit created by the Federal Reserve Bank and forward the orders to the several regional post offices of origin, as indicated by the regional office numbers prepunched in the cards at the time of their manufacture The regional post office of origin will then mechanically arrange the items into serial number sequence and set them up in a master file.

Under the new system post offices of the first class will be relieved of the task of compiling lists of issued and paid money orders and inquiries regarding paid money orders will be sent to the regional post office of origin where the searches will be made mechanically. In lieu of the individual listing of issued orders, postmasters will forward to their respective regional post offices a statement showing accountability for total amounts and total fees for orders issued within a given period. Following the close of a quarter, these statements of accountability will be matched against the paid items at the regional office by means of a newly developed electronic machine which, at a high rate of speed, will total the amount and fees of the orders, indicate the outstanding orders, and at the same time check the file for duplicates, stolen orders, and so forth. In other words, the accountability for money order transactions will thereafter be determined by the postal service instead of by the General Accounting Office. This is in keeping with recent legislation affecting the accounts of the postal service.

This is a brief outline of the new system. While some of the details are yet to be worked out, the plan is an actuality and has been developed to include the most modern business techniques available as well as the most progressive thinking of the Department, the General Accounting Office, the Treasury Department, and Federal Reserve Board and banks, and is in keeping with the need and desirability of modernizing and improving the operation of the postal service in order not only to effect economy but the better to serve the general public.

MOTOR VEHICLE SERVICE

On June 30, 1950, the total complement of Government-owned trucks was 14,486.

From July 1, 1946, to this date, the Department has purchased 13,588 new trucks of which 6,600 have been delivered. The remaining 6,988 trucks are being received in a regular stream from the factories.

It is estimated that by June 30, 1952, all old trucks purchased prior to the fiscal year 1947 will have been retired from service.

In addition to acquiring trucks with bodies built to the post office standard specifications, the Department has purchased a large number of standard paneled body trucks for use in the lighter services. We have also purchased, and have had delivered, 14 stock trucks of the package delivery type that are considered experimental trucks. This experiment is being made to determine which, if any, of the package delivery type stock models of automobile trucks are suitable for efficient operation in the postal service.

We are using 2 tractors which have been delivered for experimental purposes and have ordered 30 tractors and 90 trailers to be used in transporting mails between depots and post offices and stations and branches in large cities where the volume is very heavy.

When the truck replacement was started after the war, it was contemplated that complete replacement of all old vehicles would have been accomplished by this time. However, the volume of the mails, particularly parcel post, has increased to such an extent that we have had to retain in service both new and old trucks to the fullest extent possible. This is indicated by the fact that on June 30, 1946, the complement of Government-owned trucks was 9,448, while at the close of the last fiscal year, the complement had increased to 14,486, or an increase of more than 5,000 vehicles.

Unless there should be some interruption, due to circumstances over which the Department has no control, I am confident that within the next 2 years we will be in a position to begin the replacement of trucks bought as late as the fiscal year 1947.

RESEARCH

The Department's research and planning activities which have been carried on with a very limited force are being developed at this time into an important staff function which will operate from departmental headquarters. Additional personnel will soon be assigned to this permanent research planning and development group. The Department will also use the services of outside engineering concerns, under contract, if the need for their service develops.

We have been hampered in proper research and planning in the past due to inadequate appropriations. Some additional funds have now been provided by the Congress and I anticipate that rapid progress will be made in developing new ideas, new techniques, and new equipment. A part of this staff will be assigned to special studies looking to the better utilization of personnel, the improvement of working conditions, effective supervision, and the more efficient use of the present equipment and facilities. This headquarters staff will need active and sincere cooperation on the part of the supervisory forces in the field.

As an indication of what has been done along this line during the past year, we have expended large sums of money for additional payroll machines of modern design, new and improved check-writing equipment, coin counting machines, and similar equipment. Additional sums have been expended for modern garage equipment, more postage meter machines have been provided.

Continuous studies are being made of mail handling. Automatic tying machines have been placed in use. Automatic motor loading conveyors and gravity roller conveyors, as well as electric tractors, have been placed in use in several of the large offices. Widespread use of these devices will be determined when full reports showing their advantages in postal operations have been received and considered. One of the best known developments in mail handling is the improvement of mail-sorting machines now being used in the post office at Chicago. Additional money was invested in this development during the past year which resulted in many improvements. These machines are large and offer the advantage of increased production as well as more comfortable working conditions for the employees. Such machines in their present form can only be used to advantage in the relatively few offices that handle millions of pieces of mail daily. Further engineering studies will be made by experienced postal engineers and probably by mechanical and electrical engineers to determine what further perfection may be made to find out if it is possible to retain many of the advantages and to overcome the disadvantage of the large floor area needed for this kind of an operation. Of course, there are many other so-called distributing machines; one is a foreign make. All of them appear to have the same fault that excessive floor space is required in order to set them up. When I refer to distributing machines, I am quite sure that every one understands that no machine has been developed that actually distributes the mail. We still need human beings to read the addresses and determine into which slot or on which belt the letter is to be deposited in its onward movement.

Many citizens, a number of them employees in the postal service and a number outside the service, have submitted suggestions for mechanical devices to be used in mail handling. We are inquiring into these suggestions and examining the devices submitted. I am sure by persistent effort and constant research, we will develop new facilities that will greatly aid in the distribution of mail matter.

Another important example of research will be found in our present experiment of utilizing collapsible containers instead of mail sacks which can be stacked into mail cars. With the cooperation of the railroad officials and officials of private and industrial concerns engaged in manufacturing equipment, were all utilizing metal containers for carrying mail in storage cars, operating one car in each direction daily between New York and Chicago over the New York Central; between New York and St. Louis over the Pennsylvania, and between Chicago and Kansas City over the Santa Fe. This is a new joint industry-Government experimental program to develop new, cheaper methods of handling mail. The metal containers used in this experiment are several types that have the capacity equal to that provided by 14 mail bags. The metal containers are made of various metals and combinations which include wire mesh, combinations of steel and expanded metal, and aluminum. We are also trying out some wooden containers. All of the containers are so constructed that they can be stacked in storage cars. They are handled in and out of the cars by the use of automatic lifting devices and are of such dimensions that they may be moved by means of trucks now available in post offices, railroad stations, and terminals. They may also be accommodated in motor vehicles as well as in railroad cars. Theoretically there should be a great saving in the handling cost when container loading is developed and made practicable. However, the actual savings can only be determined by tests under actual service conditions.

In the long-range program it is our intention to reduce the use of mail sacks and to provide for the transportation of bulk mails with fewer handlings which, of course, eliminates the possibility of errors, damage, and depredation. With this type of movement, the number of individual handlings is greatly reduced. Outside parcels as well as the smaller parcels are accommodated in the containers which accelerates the loading and unloading.

The Department's research and development program is not necessarily limited to the activities carried on by the headquarters group. A great deal can be accomplished by the postmasters and supervisors in their own offices. Each supervisor should realize that by the very nature of his employment which brings him in daily contact with financial operations and mail-handling activities of the postal service, he is well equipped to bring about improvements in that part of the operation that comes under his direct supervision.

This covers only four of the postal reforms or accomplishments during the last few months. Others are under study. The postal service has always been first to take advantage of any modern facilities in the mechanized line that can be adapted for its use. With the assistance of our capable supervisors in the field, we will continue to make progress in the operation of this great public service, and I am sure I will continue to have the full cooperation of the members of this fine postal group.

Again, I want to express appreciation for the splendid cooperation you supervisors are giving to us in the Department. Without it we could not function.

It was kind of you to invite Mrs. Donaldson and me to your wonderful banquet. If I were confined to one wish for you, it would be, "May each and every one of you live as long as you wish, and have all you wish so long as you live."

Military and Civilian

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted me, I include an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, September 17, 1950. The Herald Tribune is a Republican newspaper but its editorials usually, and certainly in the case of the following item, show a willingness to put the Nation's welfare ahead of mere partisan political maneuvering and mud slinging. The editorial follows:

MILITARY AND CIVILIAN

The opposition, such as it is, to General Marshall's selection as Secretary of Defense has been neither very logical nor very convincing. But a certain grotesque climax was surely reached Friday when Representative DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri (one of the less fortunate examples of Republican statesmanship in the House), exclaimed that with the confirmation of Marshall "every general in the United States will start building a political machine to take the country over."

This is the kind of nonsense that the party should, and that the country certainly will, do without. The fact that Marshall never has and is never likely to build a political machine is exactly what has recommended him to a President harassed on every side by party and personal politics.

A good argument could be made for the thesis that Secretary Johnson—a product of American Legion politics, with unconcealed personal ambitions and a tendency to use the tremendous powers of the Defense Department for political ends—was a far greater threat to civilian control than a nonpolitical career soldier like General Marshall ever could be. Such an argument might be made; it is pointless now. What is not pointless is the lesson that the American people must grow up to the vital importance of the military problem which confronts them. Time was when War and Navy could be left to their own theoretic devices while State looked after the current and pressing business of international relations. If State failed, then War and Navy would roll out the fire brigade. That time has gone.

State relies in its daily operations as immediately upon the support of Defense as Defense must rely upon State for its daily directives. It is no accident that we set up a National Security Council to combine the two, that our leading military statesman has served as Secretary of State or that an ex-Secretary of State has been called to serve as Secretary of Defense. Civilian control has never been a real issue in any of this. The significant issue is how to get unity and intelligence of direction into our foreign policy—military and diplomatic—without too many monkey wrenches flung by opposition politicians thinking primarily of domestic matters. Opposition leaders like Senator LODGE see this very clearly and speak truly on the problem; the country at large sees it quite as clearly, and those politicians who still fail to grasp it are doing no service to themselves, their party, or their country.

Secretary Marshall Will Provide Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HALE BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New Orleans Item of September 14, 1950:

APPOINTMENT RESTORES CONFIDENCE—SECRETARY MARSHALL WILL PROVIDE UNITY

One could almost hear the cheer go up when President Truman announced the appointment of General Marshall to succeed Louis Johnson as Secretary of Defense.

It is impossible to exaggerate the confidence this great and selfless citizen inspires among the voters of both political parties at home, the soldiers in the field, among the leaders and peoples of other nations. It was even big news in Moscow.

There has to be confidence in the Military Establishment. Louis Johnson, whatever his virtues, could not provide it. But that vacuum of public trust is filled at once by the naming of Marshall; and that alone would justify his appointment.

There are, however, other considerations of paramount importance. The execution of war and foreign policy requires consistent and spontaneous collaboration between the Defense and State Departments. From now on the commander in chief can rest easily on that score.

Marshall and Acheson have worked together as a team for years. They have a mutual respect and admiration for each other. They are compatible as individuals, and the record shows that they see eye to eye on American policy both in Europe and the Far East.

It was Acheson, speaking in Mississippi in early 1947, who first enunciated the great program that became the Marshall plan. Marshall was then Secretary of State and Acheson his Under Secretary. They worked together in constructing our present policy in the West. The same is true of the East, for today Acheson is carrying out the policies established by Marshall after his return from his special China mission.

Few Americans will shed any tears over the retirement of Louis Johnson, but it should not be forgotten that he was burdened with the thankless task of unifying the armed services and the even more thankless one of imposing a difficult economy program.

In our opinion he was by no means the incompetent and bungler that he has been portrayed. But he had other and greater defects; he was long on ambition and short of knowledge. He was bent on the presidency and that inevitably colored some of his actions; he knew plenty about domestic politics, but not nearly enough about global affairs; he was jealous of Acheson, opposed his policies, and sniped at him.

The last was his undoing, for our present foreign policy was jointly hammered out by Acheson and Truman. Thus, when Johnson sought to upset Acheson's program he was striking at the President as well as the Secretary of State. Only yesterday it was revealed that Johnson had tried at a secret congressional hearing to block the Truman-Acheson move to rearm Germany as part of the European defense against communism.

But now the air has been cleared. With the Council of Foreign Ministers meeting in Washington this week, the President could not have chosen a more opportune moment to bring Marshall back. At last we have a united front on foreign policy.

Marshall has always been regarded as a citizen-soldier, rather than purely a military man. The proof of that is the willingness of Congress to exempt him from the prohibition of a career soldier serving as Defense Secretary.

Twice now the general has been called from retirement. For him, it seems, there will be no farewell to arms. But, in once more answering the call of duty, he can be sure he has the good wishes and gratitude of all America.

Westbrook Pegler

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW JACOBS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Earl Wilson, the writer, not our colleague, recently did a snapshot X-ray of Westbrook Pegler.

It is worthy of the 90 seconds' reading time, from anybody's busy day.

Under unanimous consent, I include it in the RECORD:

ABOUT MR. PEGLER

HOLLYWOOD.—Pegler's hallucinating again.

I borrow this $4 word, "hallucinating," from psychiatry, for only psychiatry can explain Pegler, the grave digger.

This master distortionist has the gall to browbeat Broadway columnists for twisting facts when he twists them till they holler. He challenges our journalistic bravery. This comes, mind you, from Pegler the fearless, who goes on year after year yowling that Franklin D. Roosevelt was a crook, overlooking the slight fact that F. D. R. has been forever silenced. Naturally, Pegler sneers at the Broadway journalists' taste. Grave digging, presumably, is good taste in his code.

Like a demented punch drunk pug who battles barroom shadows, Pegler keeps trying to kill Roosevelt, unable to get it through his brain that he's already dead

I'm far from alone in this opinion.

"Ye Ed" in the famous Kansas City Star announced to the world June 14 that he'd sold his stock in Westbrook Pegler at the market.

Now this comes from the conservative Middle West.

I looked this essay over thoroughly.

"What really made a decision to sell imperative," wrote Ye Ed, "were two or three recent occasions when Pegler considered it a propitious time to dig up the Franklin D. Roosevelt family and machine gun it all over again.

"Peg has come recently to a point where he no longer can appraise and interpret his huge collection of damning facts by a restrained and effective process. His anger not only weakens but frequently belies his sincerity," continued Ye Ed.

In short, the kid has blown his wig, he's seeing Roosevelts under the bed and on the wall. He's hallucinating.

Pegler enjoys claiming that "the gutter-snipes covering the saloon beat"—I must answer "Present, teacher" to that—can't or won't do any reporting.

I told you once how he lied when he claimed Roosevelt was a drunkard, his authority for the statement being a dead man. Recently in a base, villainous piece he offered us the yarn that many crippled children couldn't get into Warm Springs Foundation because of "impossible high fees."

I checked that one.

Seventy percent of the patients there are charity cases. Not one has ever failed of admittance because he couldn't pay.

Pegler is fond of sneering at actors' war efforts.

This reminds me of the story they tell you up around his home, which he managed to make repairs on during the war despite shortage of materials. He had partially agreed to buy a war bond during one of the drives. When they called on him, he had discovered he couldn't take it. That income tax (nine blasphemous words censored here) had strapped him, he said, and he couldn't buy one just then.

As Heywood Broun had said years before, Pegler had been bitten by an income tax return and never recovered.

Lately Pegler's been "exposing"—honest to Betsy, right there it was in the paper, in red ink—"the show business underworld."

You read it all, tremble and see he's now digging up old news stories as well as old corpses. He should start out his pieces, "Flash, 15 years ago this happened." Personally, I'm not defending the people he attacks in show business. Show business is no prouder of some of those people than the newspaper business is proud of, well, let's say, Westbrook Pegler.

Level of Lake of the Woods Must Be Lowered

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, extensive damage has been caused this spring and summer by exceedingly high waters of the Lake of the Woods in northern Minnesota. Since this situation is of such vital interest to the flood victims of that area, I wish to make a report to them and all the citizens of that section. This report will be similar to the reports made frequently by the President to the American people on various matters.

This flood situation in the Lake of the Woods area has long been of great concern to me. The Lake of the Woods file in my office is bulging with correspondence on the high water situation this year. Just recently I returned to Washington after making a personal inspection of the Lake of the Woods sector with the entire membership of the American section of the International Joint Commission, a representative of Governor Luther Youngdahl, United States Corps of Engineers of the Army, State Conservation representatives, and other Federal and State officials.

The flood situation around the Lake of the Woods is appalling. One really has to inspect the area as we did—making surveys from planes and motor launches over and on the lake and by car and foot around the lake shores—to fully realize the extent of the damage. The inundated farm lands, buildings, fish houses, resorts, and residential summer property are causing untold personal and financial hardships to the flood victims.

An important feature of the inspection trip was that we were able to meet personally with the flood victims and reassure them that we are doing everything in our power to find a solution to the situation. Through my frequent correspondence with the residents of that area I had outlined the program which, when adopted, will greatly lessen future flood damages and may even fully prevent future floods. The four main points in this program are as follows:

First. Complete control of the lake level by the American Section of the International Joint Commission.

Second. A new method of determining the lake level.

Third. Increased lake outlet capacity of the dams on the Canadian side.

Fourth. Lowering of the maximum lake level at least 1½ feet.

With these proposals in mind, I contacted Secretary of State Dean Acheson early in August this year, advising him, among other facts, of the following:

The water level on the Lake of the Woods on the border of northern Minnesota is the highest in history. More disastrous damages are being suffered by property owners than at any time before.

Notwithstanding the treaty of 1925, it was intended to enlarge the powers of the Commission in an effort to solve this question of protocol in 1940, which had the same object in view, that is, of controlling the flood situation in the whole chain of lakes, as well as the Lake of the Woods.

Judging from the various hearings by the International Joint Commission, it is perfectly manifest that the artificial rising of the Lake of the Woods is the sole basic cause of the enormous damage that the people of Minnesota are suffering this year.

It is now shown that any effort to maintain a maximum of 1062.5 as provided in the treaty of 1925 is at least a foot higher than the margin of safety required.

It is obvious that this whole question should be reviewed, especially since it is true as was pointed out by the Honorable James Tawney, a Minnesotan, in 1917, when he was Chairman of the American Section, that the Commission has been investigating just half the problem, that is, the outflow, and paid no attention to the inflow. The inflow into the Lake of the Woods is twice as great as the outflow.

This and other questions should be reviewed by the Commission at the earliest possible moment. I believe a solution to this question can be found. In my opinion, if this Commission, with its experience, is instructed under a proper reference, we can get the desired relief. There is no other way because of the treaty by which this relief can possibly be fully obtained.

Therefore, will you be so kind as to refer this problem to the International Joint Commission for consideration.

Later, I received a letter from the Department of State which read in part:

The Commissioners will return to Washington about September 3 and at that time your suggestion that a new reference to the Commission be arranged, will be discussed with them. In the meantime, the matter is receiving consideration by other interested agencies of the Government. You will be advised promptly of further developments with respect to this important matter.

The letter was signed for the Secretary of State by Jack K. McFall, Assistant Secretary. I have contacted our two United States Senators from Minnesota, for their cooperation. They have assured me of their help.

Many of the letters that I have received from flood victims have naturally dealt with the subject of flood-damage claims. I have contacted the office of the United States Attorney General on this subject and in a recent reply, Attorney General J. Howard McGrath informed me in part:

I appreciate your interest in this subject and will be glad to advise you fully concerning it at the earliest practicable date.

I have also urged the Farmers Home Administration and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans available to residents of the Lake of the Woods area. They have done so. Arthur W. Carlson, manager of the loan agency of the RFC, informed me in a letter of August 17 that—

Upon receipt of your letter of August 16, we wired our Washington office asked that Lake of the Woods County be included in our disaster loan authority. I am sure that this request will be approved at once.

Mr. Carlson also arranged to have his assistant manager, E. M. Rowlands, make the flood damage inspection trip with us.

Before I conclude this report, I wish to thank the newspapers of the Lake of the Woods area for their help and cooperation during the floods and in connection with the flood meetings held at Baudette, Williams, and Warroad. This "well done" goes in particular to the Baudette region, the Warroad Pioneer, Williams Northern Light, and the Roseau Times region. Their objective and interpretative reporting and their splendid news photos were of great help in keeping the commissioners and me posted on the situation previous to our inspection trip.

The job of securing a permanent solution to the problem is not an easy one. It will take time. I have a full knowledge of the situation and know first hand the area which was flooded and I personally know most of the people who have suffered from the flood.

We are making some progress. We have the fullest interest, cooperation, and support of Mr. A. O. Stanley, Chairman of the International Joint Commission and other members of the Commission.

The residents of the flood area have already given me much information but I solicit their further interest and cooperation in supplying me with any new data that may be available from time to time in reference to the flood situation.

I want to assure them all that I will do all within my power and influence as their Ninth District Congressman from Minnesota to work out a solution to this serious flood problem.

I will continue to do all I can during my present term of office which expires January 3, 1951, and if reelected, I will continue my efforts in their behalf.

It is my intention to make another trip or two to the flood area this fall to make a personal report to the flood sufferers and to make further inspection of the flood damages.

As we make progress in our plans to bring about a final solution to the problem, I will make further reports to the newspapers of the area and also report by my own personal visits to the people of the Lake of the Woods territory.

I am sure I have the support of most of the people for my efforts to bring about a final and satisfactory solution to this high-water-level problem of the Lake of the Woods.

The Late Honorable Ed H. Moore

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DIXIE GILMER
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. GILMER. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for this opportunity to pay respect to the memory of the Honorable Ed H. Moore, who passed away at his home in Tulsa, Okla., September 2, 1950, at the age of 78 years.

Ed Moore's career from a humble beginning as a country school teacher to success as an oil operator, then United States Senator at the age of 71, was characterized by his boundless energy and intense desire to render service to his country.

No American citizen has appreciated more deeply his country as a land of opportunity than did Ed Moore, and no stout heart was ever more devotedly consecrated to the preservation of the American way of life than was his.

Inspired with this burning purpose in his later life, no obstacle appeared too insurmountable, no course was too difficult and no sacrifice was too great for him if, in his opinion, it would contribute to the attainment of his ideal.

His strong character and unyielding determination naturally made his political career an eventful and a stormy one, but his lofty ideals, honor, integrity, and ability were respected by everyone who knew him.

Ed Moore played an important role in the development of Oklahoma and was always found where progress, expansion, and civic improvement were being promoted.

Though his passing brings great grief to me and the multitude of others who loved and respected him, it will always be a great pleasure and privilege for me to remember him as a personal friend.

Cabinet Changes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George Dixon:

WASHINGTON SCENE
(By George Dixon)

President Truman, who won reelection by urging the voters not to change horses in midstream, is himself the greatest horse-changer in American Presidential history.

Incredible as it may sound, Truman has made 38 Cabinet and sub-Cabinet changes in the 5 years and 5 months he has been in the White House. Louis Johnson, his pal and political money raiser, was the thirty-eighth Cabinet nag to be horse-traded in midstream.

As the all-time horse-in-midstream changer, our steadfast leader has changed his ministerial steeds at the rate of 6.91 a year.

That's more than one every 2 months since that stunned day of April 12, 1945, when the ex-haberdasher, a political accident, took over as President.

For changing horses he has beaten the previous horse-changing champ, Franklin D. Roosevelt, hands down. F. D. R. made 26 Cabinet changes in 12 years—or at the rate of slightly more than 2 a year.

It's utterly staggering—completely fantastic, when you go back over the list. You check and recheck, convinced you must be seeing double. But here are the official family members he has had in exactly 5 years and 5 months to the day:

Secretaries of State: Edward R Stettinius, Jr, James F. Byrnes, George C. Marshall, Dean C. Acheson.

Secretaries of the Treasury: Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Fred M. Vinson, John W. Snyder.

Secretaries of Defense: James V. Forrestal, Louis A. Johnson, George C. Marshall.

Secretaries of the Army: Henry Lewis Stimson, Robert P. Patterson, Kenneth C. Royall, Gordon Gray, Frank C. Pace, Jr.

Secretaries of the Navy: James V. Forrestal, John L. Sullivan, Francis P. Matthews.

Secretaries of the Air Force: W. Stuart Symington, Thomas K. Finletter.

Attorneys General: Francis Biddle, Tom C. Clark, J. Howard McGrath.

Postmasters General: Frank C. Walker, Robert E. Hannegan, Jesse M. Donaldson.

Secretaries of Agriculture: Claude R. Wickard, Clinton P. Anderson, Charles F. Brannan.

Secretaries of the Interior: Harold L. Ickes, Julius A. Krug, Oscar L. Chapman.

Secretaries of Labor: Frances Perkins, Lewis B. Schwellenbach, Maurice J. Tobin.

Secretaries of Commerce: Henry A. Wallace, W. Averell Harriman, Charles Sawyer.

Not all of the cabineterial equines were changed peaceably. It was necessary to take the bat to some, as we say in horsey and midstreamy circles.

The great horse-changer traded in Stettinius because he didn't like his work. He put Byrnes in as State Secretary and then forced him out because he felt his erstwhile bosom pal was trying to be President of the United States.

He horsed Henry Wallace out of Commerce in a conflict over foreign policy. He eased Biddle out of Justice because he was under obligation to friends of Tom Clark for election support in Texas.

He let Forrestal go from Defense to reward Johnson who had done more than any man alive to reelect him by raising desperately needed campaign funds.

He got rid of old McBurp Ickes from Interior because he just couldn't stand him—as who can? He allowed his friends to force Krug's resignation from Interior so he could reward Chapman for managing his campaign tours.

Harry keeps looking his gifted horses in the mouth.

Use of the Waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial concerning the necessity of cooperation between the United States and Canada with regard to the use of the waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers.

Mr. Ken Byerly, publisher of the Lewistown Daily News, in which this editorial appeared, points out that Gen. A. G. L. McNaughton, a member of the Canadian Section, International Joint Commission, is a firm advocate of close cooperation between our two nations. In the speech from which Mr. Byerly quotes, General McNaughton mentioned the development of our resources as one of the many fields of endeavor in which cooperation was required. Such cooperation, in the case of the Waterton and Belly Rivers, is precisely what the people of Montana are working for. We hope it will not be long before agreement is reached upon a mutually beneficial plan for the development and use of this resource. The editorial follows:

CANADA'S GENERAL MCNAUGHTON COMMENTS ON COOPERATION

Canada's Gen. A. G. L. McNaughton is a man of great prestige and stature.

North of the border, he occupies about the same position as does Gen. George Marshall in the United States.

Both commanded their Nation's Armed Forces during World War II. Both were great generals. Both, since the war, have done yeoman services for their countries in nonmilitary capacities.

Here in Montana, though we are south of the border, General McNaughton is also important to us. He is a member of the International Joint Commission, which conducts hearings on Canadian-United States problems, and makes recommendations for their solution.

Right now this commission is considering the division of waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers, which rise in Montana's Glacier Park, but flow north into Canada.

The United States gets none of this water today, but it wants a share to irrigate about 150,000 acres in Glacier, Toole, Liberty and Hill counties on the Montana side of the Canadian line. It is the American contention that this is only fair—that Alberta and Saskatchewan farmers will still get the largest portion. It—the United States—points to the need for international cooperation and understandings in solving this problem.

General McNaughton, many feel, has been stalling the settlement of the Waterton-Belly water problem so that more and more of it will be taken up in irrigation projects on the Canadian side of the line. This may or may not be true, but delay in deciding the issue does add some credence to the claim.

Anyway, the general has preached United States-Canadian cooperation himself. In a speech on May 25, 1950, to the Canadian Manufacturers Association, meeting in Toronto, General McNaughton discussed joint defenses on both sides of the line. He praised the working together of the two nations, and pointed to its importance.

"It is a happy circumstance," the great Canadian leader said, "that Canada and the United States, as two countries of North America, have come to realize the great interests which they hold in common; after the experience of two world wars, our peoples have learned the necessity for close cooperation in defense. We have learned also that the habit of cooperation is one which grows in intimacy with practice."

Later in his speech the general also said: "It requires that we work closely together in all defense matters * * * it calls for intimate association in all these matters right up to and including the employment of our forces in war, if that unhappy eventuality should come."

General McNaughton is correct in his comments, and we can feel fortunate that Canadian leaders such as himself are thinking along these lines, that there is similar thinking and willingness to act in the United States, too.

But cooperation is necessary in other activities, too, and such mutual working together has been marked through the years.

It is necessary, now, in the settlement of the Waterton-Belly dispute.

We hope the general's comments on defense will also apply in water problems, that this great man will act quickly and effectively in this case, just as he did during the war in his working for victory.

The International Joint Commission meets in Ottawa on October 10. The American members will press for a settlement at that time.

There seems to be no reason why the matter should drag on and on, so it is hoped that the Canadians will cooperate in making recommendations that will be fair to the water users on both sides of the international line, recommendations that will settle the question forever, so that all can go ahead with their plans for the development or irrigation projects—in Alberta and Saskatchewan, and in Montana.

New Orleans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HALE BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the September 1950 issue of Americas, the magazine published by the Pan American Union, entitled "New Orleans," by Serge Fliegers and Alvaro Pérez. The article follows:

A Latin American businessman visiting New Orleans can scarcely avoid doing business there. For the city realized the importance of a direct economic tie with Latin America and did something about it. It put on a planned and systematic trade drive. Today this initiative has paid off. During the past 3 years, New Orleans enjoyed the biggest trade boom in its history. With its shipping volume past the billion and a quarter mark this year, it is now the Nation's second port. Every third cup of coffee drunk in the United States is brought in through New Orleans, which also handles items ranging from wines, nuts, and toys to textiles and Haitian wood masks.

In 1943, during a sightseeing cruise of the lower Mississippi Delta, the newly appointed manager of the Port of New Orleans, E. O. Jewell, overheard a conversation that set him to thinking.

"Qué tal, amigo, this great river is magnificent. In my country, Costa Rica, we do not have such rivers. * * *"

"But, my friend, we don't have them in my country either—Peoria, Ill."

"There are other things we don't have in our country that I'm looking for right now. Electrical equipment, for example. I need 1,000 dynamos."

"What a lucky coincidence. I think I can fill that order for you."

The port manager took the story back to a group of New Orleans businessmen, including shipping and life-insurance company officials and a newspaper publisher. "Our port," Jewell pointed out, "is naturally suited to trade with Latin America. It would be nice to stimulate it by using a ship as a trysting place for importers and exporters—but a little impractical, I'm afraid."

Instead, his listeners suggested a spot on terra firma, right off New Orleans' famous Canal Street. William Zetzman, president of a local bottling plant, sent a letter to his more important commercial colleagues: "We want to start something new," he wrote, "something that has never been tried before." He invited them to a meeting, but added: "Don't bother to come unless you have a lot of money to invest in the future of your city."

Zetzman himself put up some $30,000 and more than 50 of his colleagues brought the minimum contribution—a thousand dollars. They bought an old bank building and refurbished it in record time, decorating it with the flags of the 21 Western Hemisphere nations. Office space, a library, a lobby, and meeting halls were provided. They christened the new trade center International House.

At first businessmen were apathetic. During the peak 1946 war year, the port of New Orleans did some three quarters of a billion dollars' worth of trade. After the emergency stimulus had worn off, they felt New Orleans would again become a sleepy southern town handling mostly cotton and coffee. Not many of the thousands of manufacturers, distributors, consumers, and farmers in the midcontinent area—the 13 Mississippi Valley States served by New Orleans—had ever done business with Latin America before. "Why should we seek trade abroad?" they asked. "We have no contracts, we don't know the language or the procedure."

International House officials went to work. They sent representatives to Latin America, invited Latin American businessmen to stop over on their way north. Once in New Orleans, they were furnished with a bilingual secretary, a desk, a telephone, and a long list of midcontinent firms they could approach directly. Soon the businessmen of the United States and Latin America saw—like the two who had met on the sightseeing boat—that one manufactured what the other needed.

One firm in Demopolis, Ala., is in the export business solely because of the contacts New Orleans provided. The firm manufactured all types of agricultural equipment and had a surplus stock because of the weakening domestic market. It hesitated to try selling abroad because its officers knew nothing of the export business—what forms to fill out, to whom to write, how to pack and ship, and what technicalities to prepare for.

International House provided a detailed manual and a list of 30 prospective buyers from its files. In just 2 weeks orders arrived from Venezuela for 3 wagons, 3 trailers, and 50 trucks. Today the Demopolis firm has a flourishing foreign-trade department that is still expanding. During its first 2 years, International House arranged about thirty thousand such contacts between buyers and sellers.

But how about the Latin American visitors? More and more of them, stepping out of planes, disembarking from ships, spent a few days in New Orleans. They dropped in at International House, met their United States colleagues and concluded their business deals. Meanwhile, officials of International House had absorbed some of the Latin spirit of hospitality and began to multiply its services.

One morning staff members found at the door a dejected-looking woman with a 6-month-old child in her arms and seven heavy suitcases. A Panamanian, speaking no English, she was looking for her husband, a United States sailor. She wanted a room, food for the baby, and help in finding her husband, and La Casa Internacional seemed the place to get them. The baby was fed, and a room found for her. Within a matter of days, her husband was located, and there was a touching family reunion.

Another time, a honeymooning couple from Venezuela came to see the historic places of New Orleans, its Cabildo built by Spanish colonists, the French Quarter, and the old cemetery. They stopped off at International House for dinner and a chat in Spanish with one of the Latin advisers. "We would love to see the rest of the United States," the husband remarked, "but we haven't enough money. If only I could sell a consignment of hides I have in my country, we could afford the trip." The same afternoon a United States purchaser was found and papers were signed. A month later a grateful postcard arrived from Niagara Falls.

No request is too large or too small for International House. So far, it has helped export a $4 consignment of toy balloons, and facilitated the purchase, by Argentina, of $3,000,000 worth of ships.

After confidence had been established among the businessmen of the midcontinent area, a new difficulty presented itself. Although products were available, Latin American businessmen could ill afford to travel through 13 Southern and Midwestern States showing their samples or inspecting prospective purchases. Instead, many proceeded farther north to the large manufacturing centers, where great numbers of factories and sales offices were grouped together.

New Orleans' international planners soon found an answer. At a cost of nearly a million and a half dollars, they constructed a Trade Mart. Again the flags of the 21 republics were raised; and today, across the street from International House, a huge, modern, windowless building, gleaming white and completely air-conditioned, houses more than 600 different exhibit items. It takes just a couple of hours to sample the products of half the world, without moving farther than half a city block.

Recently a Peruvian purchasing mission arrived in New Orleans—"just passing through," they said, "as we have a long trip ahead to locate manufacturers of the various items we need." Instead, they were taken on an afternoon's tour of International House and the Trade Mart. During the next week, without moving from New Orleans, they purchased all they could with their half-million-dollar budget and saved considerable traveling expense and fatigue into the bargain. The same thing happened to a group of buyers from Colombia, who were able to supply the needs of their country's merchant marine after a few business sessions at the International Trade Mart.

Neither International House nor Trade Mart facilities are restricted to nations of the Western Hemisphere. A visitor wandering through the long aluminum-and-glass-lined corridors of the mart can see United States agricultural machinery, Bohemian glassware, and Costa Rican lumber products exhibited side by side. Except for direct rentals, there is no charge for the unending variety of services offered by the two institutions. They are supported mainly by membership dues levied on New Orleans businessmen and operate on a nonprofit basis.

But for the city itself there is a distinct profit. Director Charles Nutter (who has a long record of successful dealings with Latin America, first as a newspaperman and later as an executive) and New Orleans' Mayor De Lesseps Morrison say that 70 cents of every dollar in the pocketbooks of New Orleans residents comes directly or indirectly from the trade of their port. They expect that trade to pass the billion-and-a-half-dollar figure next year, making New Orleans one of the world's largest ports.

There is another development that will help New Orleans become one of the globe's foremost trading centers. Under a law recently enacted, sponsored by Congressman HALE BOGGS, of Louisiana, both United States and foreign businessmen will be permitted to exhibit and manufacture goods in all the United States free-trade zones.

The New Orleans trade zone today comprises some 20 acres of excellent storage and warehouse space where foreign goods can be deposited without payment of United States tariffs. The idea of a free-trade zone was first tried by the Hanseatic League in the sixteenth century, but the first American free port was set up in New York as late as 1937; New Orleans created its zone in 1947. A reaction against high tariffs, it permitted the shipper to store his goods, dry them to reduce weight, remove parts that had spoiled or broken during the sea voyage, and sometimes re-pack or re-sort them to make use of a lower tariff classification.

For example, 30 cents' duty per gallon is charged on fresh pineapple juice imported by the United States from Cuba. But if, in the free-trade zone, some coloring and preservative chemicals are added, the duty is only 8 cents per gallon, which means considerable saving for the United States importer and consumer. Brazil nuts, taxed according to their weight, can remain in the zone until most of their water content has evaporated, reducing their final weight and, consequently, the import duty.

Wines and other liquids can be brought into the New Orleans free-trade zone in barrels, there to be repacked into bottles. This avoids possible loss from breakage en route. And Latin American countries that have no facilities for manufacturing the kind of bottles required by United States buyers can now avoid the tedious and costly process of importing the necessary glassware from the States, only to have it shipped back on the next boat.

J. H. Boyd, the zone manager, showed us around the enormous layout of the New Orleans free port. It was a far cry from the wooden reshipping platforms constructed 300 years ago by the Hanseatic traders. We saw lumber from Costa Rica, machine parts from Belgium, emeralds from Colombia, and blue, shimmering aquamarines from Brazil. "This is another free-port facility," Mr. Boyd explained. "In the case of jewels, for example, a United States importer no longer has to lay out the 10-percent duty on a stone before it is sold. He can keep it here and show it to prospective purchasers. If he makes a sale he pays the tariff; otherwise, he is free to return it abroad."

As far as the United States public is concerned, the free-port operation does not mean loss of duty income. According to the zone manager, it offers these advantages: It encourages imports and thus provides dollars for foreign purchasers of United States goods; stimulates the United States transportation business; gives employment to United States personnel in the handling, packaging, and grading of goods; provides a market for the United States manufacturers of packaging materials; and enables the small importer to operate without tying up his capital in tariff payments.

Typical of such small importers was the United States sailor who had used up all his savings to bring precious stones from Latin America. When he returned to the States he had $7 left, not enough, naturally, to pay for the import duty, and was advised to store his wares in the free-trade zone. One by one he sold the jewels and paid the tax. He is now back in Latin America on another buying expedition.

Last year the New Orleans free-trade zone received some 50 different types of goods from 28 countries with a total estimated value of $27,101,114. With manufacturing within its area it will be busier than ever.

Small Business Needs More Favorable Consideration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I have received an open letter from the Conference of American Small Business Organizations that I think will be of interest to the business people of my district.

This organization is represented on the Business Advisory Committee of the President's Council of Economic Advisors and on the President's Conference on Industrial Safety. It was a supporter of standing congressional small business committees for permanent liaison with all major Federal departments and agencies. It expresses the deliberated opinion of delegates from organizations representing over 260 different lines of industry in 48 States, representing an affiliated membership of over 600,000 small business concerns.

The letter, written on July 25, 1950, from the Chicago headquarters of the Conference of American Small Business Organizations, follows:

JULY 25, 1950.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAGEN: As you know, the legislative work of the Conference of American Small Business Organizations takes me to Washington frequently and so I have had the opportunity of estimating the ability and character of many Congressmen and Senators, and to evaluate their services, especially to the business interests of the country. Also how each man is rated by his colleagues, which is an excellent criterion as to whether a man is regarded as a statesman or a dud.

Although I do not vote in your district, nevertheless when I have had occasion to call on you in Washington I have received the most friendly welcome, was made to feel at home and that you and your staff were at my service, and believe every caller receives the same friendly treatment. I mention this to indicate that public office has not given you an exaggerated sense of self-importance, which so many men acquire and then forget who elected them to office. This modesty stamps a man's character.

In discussing legislation, I found you to be unusually well informed. I have found that you have voted according to what you considered to be the right thing to do, not according to pressure by lobbyists and selfish interests. It requires courage in public life to oppose powerful, selfish interests. Whether we have always agreed with you or not, this is statesmanship of a high order, and the most valuable kind of Congressman that can be elected.

And you have been one of the best friends the small-business men have had in Washington, which you demonstrated many times, especially by your support of the policy of Senate Concurrent Resolution 14, Eightieth Congress (which this conference wrote), by which, for the first time, Congress recognized small business as an economic entity on a par with the farmer and labor groups, and entitled to equal representation on appointive commissions, boards, and committees. This resolution placed small business on the map.

I wish it were possible for me, personally, to tell every businessman in the Ninth Minnesota District that he should feel under obligation to you.

Cordially and sincerely,

FRED A. VIRKUS,
Chairman.

I am, of course, grateful for this recognition of my interest and cooperation in the problems of the small merchant and businessman of my district.

In these days of excessive Federal meddling and interference into their affairs, they need a friendly Representative in Washington.

As the Congressman from the Ninth District of Minnesota, I pledge to them my continued interest in their welfare and success. I offer them my official services at any time during my present term of office. I hope that I may continue to serve them and the other people of the Ninth District again during the next 2-year term of Congress, starting on January 3, 1951.

From Enemy to Ally

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SID SIMPSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Quincy (Ill.) Herald-Whig of September 15, 1950:

FROM ENEMY TO ALLY

Should western Germany be accepted into full partnership in the military preparations being made for the defense of the western nations against communism? That is the perplexing question before the Big Three foreign ministers now meeting in New York. Just beyond is the question of rearming Japan. Certainly if the democratic portion of Germany is accepted it won't be long before the Tokyo regime is treated similarly.

Historians of the distant future will read with amazement the record of the twentieth century. Unless one had been an observer of the strange events of the last few decades it would be impossible to understand why the allied powers would consider acceptance of their erstwhile foes as military friends.

Only a little more than 5 years ago the western Allies were locked in death combat with Germany and Japan. Hardly had the stench of the Buchenwald atrocities and the Bataan death march lifted before the victors' feeling against their enemies had cooled. A victor can be magnanimous. The willingness to forgive is commendable. The free world should hold no grudge against the German or the Japanese people. Certainly we should be eager to welcome both into the family of free nations.

But there is the vital matter of safety to be considered. Our trust has been violated so often that we have good cause to be wary. Even today we are reaping the bitter results of placing too much faith in the world of an ally.

The majority opinion in this country is that western Germany has made great progress toward democratic thinking and that the need for unified action to defend the west is so great that Germany must be permitted to contribute her part in men. Before long we may come to the same conclusion with respect to the Japanese. MacArthur believes the Japanese are sincerely committed to free ways.

Certainly, both western Germany and Japan appear to have made commendable progress toward free ways, but the aggressive spirit of militarism cannot have been wholly effaced. We have had some experience with arming one menace in order to defeat another. The west can't afford to repeat that practice We may find it necessary to use the vast manpower of our recent foes and the technical training which they possess. If so, we should hedge to the extent of minimizing the danger to ourselves. The new troop units should be scattered through the international army so that none would have independent status.

We might also find it worth while to lay down the rule that where American arms go in considerable quantity they must be accompanied by units of American military forces, so that the arms remain under the supervision of the nation which supplied them.

We know of the military skill of the Germans and Japanese. It can be useful in defense of freedom, but it can be equally potent as a threat to that freedom.

Letter of Charles P. Strain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN PHILLIPS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, there are a great many clear-thinking, independent people living in my district of California. One of these is Charles P. Strain, of Santa Ana. At 82 years of age he is still speaking forth clearly for the Republic, and with a vigor I envy. I wish to include in the Appendix of the RECORD one of his letters, recently published in the Santa Ana (Calif.) Register. It follows:

Fellow citizens, isn't this a time when we should consider well acts which constitute treason. Webster defines it as the offense of betraying the state or subverting the government of the state to which the offender belongs; treachery. He defines subvert: "To turn upside down; to ruin; overthrow; to corrupt."

This applies with special force during war, when treason is most likely to ruin the Government. And war is something we have had since the close of World War II. Up to now it has been a cold war, but still a most costly and dangerous one.

Let us now, each for ourself, review our own acts with reference to treason and see if we have not, millions of us, committed not one, but many acts of treason.

Doesn't any act by us which gives aid and comfort to the Stalin dictatorship constitute treason? And doesn't a strike by union labor give such aid and comfort to Russia? Isn't its object to use its monopolistic power to extort wage increases above parity with the incomes of unorganized classes?

And haven't most strikes involving a vital industry been waged for gaining such advantages? And haven't such strikes succeeded to the extent that the Washington Government found it necessary to support farm prices with the result that these subsidies run up to around $5,000,000,000 a year and pile up surplus farm crops beyond the warehouse capacity of our country where without sufficient shelter it rots? And why are not conspiracies by the unions, such as strikes, treason? For they weaken the Nation in the face of a deadly foe.

And what of profiteers who grow fat and consume necessities during war while at home, so far in safety, while the young men are being drafted to endure all the hardships and perils of war at a wage that is not won by the power of any union monopoly of labor or of capital? Doesn't war profiteering tend to ruin our Government by reducing its power in the face of the world's most dangerous and immoral government?

Isn't this a time and hasn't the need been with us all these years of the cold war to think more of the Nation's security than just of gratifying our own selfish wants? Wouldn't we be safer now from attack if we had tightened our belts and spent more in retaining our power of defense here at home? One phase of self-defense is a solvent government, and a government is solvent only when it is able to meet its obligations out of current income, and it is financially sound when, if heavily in debt, it reduces such debt.

But didn't Russia—and doesn't she even yet—have trained agents in our country seducing our labor and many others into the extortionate demands which have weakened us in all these respects?

And have not each and all of us who have greedily sought the selfish gains promised by such agents committed treason? And will the God in Heaven see fit to favor a nation so full of traitors that they control its policies?

And should these sins and their resulting weakness induce Russia to open a third world war, wouldn't this plunge us so deeply in debt that our Government could no longer meet its obligations with tax funds collected from its people or loans obtained from them?

This would be Federal bankruptcy, and when this occurs Government creditors do not siege the Government as the creditors of corporations siege the assets of bankrupt debtors. But the Government confiscates to itself private property and drafts labor into its services.

This constitutes dictatorship which is the end of freedom and self-planning—the beginning of slavery.

CHARLES P. STRAIN.

Carl Vinson Has Been Unified, Too

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. STERLING COLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times magazine of September 10, 1950:

CARL VINSON HAS BEEN UNIFIED, TOO—ARMY, NAVY, AND AIR FORCE LEARN FROM A SUAVE GEORGIAN WHAT THEY CAN EXPECT

(By William S. White)

WASHINGTON.—So far as Congress sees it, Representative CARL VINSON of the little inland Georgia town of Milledgeville is admiral of the ocean seas, field marshal of the armies and, as to the air, wing commander of everything.

There was a time when he was boss only of the United States Navy—the high patron for 15 years, as iron-handed chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee, of all the blue waters from the Caribbean to the China Sea.

But those were in the old, unreconstructed days before the Armed Forces, and Mr. VINSON, too, were unified and solidified—which meant, for the forces, a unification into rather more establishments than before and, for Mr. VINSON, a solidification into a place of congressional power so high that it might have brought a certain dizziness to a less earthy man.

The Unification Act amalgamated the old rival Committees on Military Affairs and on Naval Affairs into the House Committee on Armed Services. This, of which Mr VINSON is the chairman and absolute boss, is a formidable body of 35 men so big that, collectively, it sits upon three staggered tiers in its hearing rooms in the Old House Office Building, with Representative VINSON front and center rather like an ancient monarch surrounded by ministers whose proximity to the throne depends upon the years that lie upon their heads.

The juniors are thus far away and their voices seem—but only seem—to be heard a little faintly as Mr. VINSON and his bipartisan elder regency, with the senior Republicans sitting just to his left and the senior Democrats just to his right, settled the high and low affairs of national defense—Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine, whatever.

It is not that the juniors are ignored, however. The chairman keeps a nice balance between protocol and practicality. While he gives far more outer deference to the graybeards, as congressional custom infallibly demands, he gives far more work to his favorites among the committee youngsters. These, until he has tried them out, he sometimes calls "ensign." When a new man has done a good task, however, Mr. VINSON may suddenly begin to call him "commander." When, one day, he changes this salutation to "captain," the member knows he has arrived.

His old "ensigns," whether still in the House or now promoted to the Senate, are deeply devoted to him, and the long finger of his influence is thus not limited to his own side of the Capitol. One of the former "ensigns," Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON of Texas, who made "captain" before he left the House, still keeps deferentially in touch with his old chairman, and now and then goes over to the House to report in person to Mr. VINSON on matters of mutual interest. Men call on Mr. VINSON; Mr. VINSON does not call on them.

Indeed, the chairman, who used to be called "the Admiral" but now is more commonly known as "the Old Operator," by virtue of the fact that he is no longer limited simply to caring for the Navy, is in a position of a prophet handsomely vindicated in his robust later years. No prophet has more honor in his own country—which in this case is Congress and the Pentagon. For Mr. VINSON—"Cahl" to the other southerners, not one of whom has quite the richness of his own southern accent—was complaining bitterly as early as 2 years ago of "economies" in the Military Establishment.

He was in the extraordinary position of a congressional leader who was urging the Pentagon to spend not less but more. Now, his own personal chief of staff, he is at work on an unfolding, and personal, Vinson plan for mobilization—more tanks, more marines, more carriers, more of everything for the cutting edges of the military force. It is often a fact that the administration proposes but VINSON disposes, and the powerful logic, in Congress, of any Vinson plan should never be underrated.

Not to be underestimated, either, is the thing that is the life force of his being, a curious, politically perfect, intermingling of the art of attack and the science of withdrawal and compromise. This has carried Mr. VINSON to his not inconsiderable summit and it has preserved him, personally as a politician who must be elected and professionally as a leader among other politicians, these many years.

Not so long ago no man of influence in Congress was so implacably opposed to unification of the armed services; the proponents, mainly the Air Force men, looked with a great fear upon Mr. VINSON and the administration leaders were in despair. But somehow, with many changes in the original text and with the slow attrition of popular pressure, the Vinson rock was softened and unification became the law. Its most important convert was Mr. VINSON himself.

This, to the Navy, was an incredible issue to events, and nothing more sadly incredible in it than to see CARL VINSON accept the principle of a partial merger—VINSON for whom admirals in the past gladly had served as little more than office boys; VINSON, whose burning conviction had made the Navy the unquestioned elite of the armed forces, and the proudest pet of an adoring Congress.

The old blue-water men began to shake their heads a bit, while Mr. VINSON himself kept the dignified and forbearing silence of a father who has, for reasons he considers sufficient, temporarily put aside an elder, and really favored, son in behalf of another. But not this, even, was to be the end. Soon VINSON, of Georgia—the old "Battleship Carl" of another day—began to take a great and direct interest in the Air Force. W. Stuart Symington, then Secretary for Air and now Chairman of the National Security Resources Board, began what was perhaps the most unlikely, difficult, and rewarding bit of personal lobbying in the recent history of Washington. First he got Mr. VINSON into an airplane—the chairman before that had been at home only on anything that sailed. What followed was, to the service people, nothing less than history, poignant or elating, depending on where one stood.

For Representative VINSON "put on the crushed cap," as it was said by the Navy partisans, and went all-out for the Air Force. Over the objections of the President that a defensive imbalance was being created, he joined in 1948, and then led, a rebellion in the House for 70 air groups. He thus unquestionably gave a powerful, if not the decisive, impulse to what he was later to indicate was a questionable high-command preoccupation with strategic air power at the Navy's expense.

The Navy people, who before this had been in anxious sorrow at what had happened to Mr. VINSON, were now, simply, aghast and in despair. For them, the established church had fallen; all, so it seemed to them, was lost. But then it was the same Mr. VINSON who, in due season, gave to them, last year, the first great forum from which to voice their heretofore throttled complaints; it was the Vinson committee that made the investigation of the troubles of unification. And it was Mr. VINSON, too, who began to protest at the Pentagon and elsewhere and to restore some of the Navy's combat strength. When he had insisted on so much more for the Air Force, it was said by his friends, he had never intended that this was to mean much less for the Navy and Army.

In other words, Representative CARL VINSON, of Georgia, as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has pursued at times what has seemed a most unseamanlike course of unexpected zigs and violent zags. His view would be that all these were necessary and that all preparations for any war mean, necessarily, the selection of the least undesirable alternatives. There is never enough money; there is never enough firepower; there is never enough time.

The Vinson philosophy, in everything, is that the best world possible is this present best of possible worlds. By doing things the way he has done them, by zigging and zagging sometimes, he has had a major hand in providing for the defense of the United States so many uncounted billions of dollars that if stacked against the sun they would cast so fantastic a glitter as almost to be seen from here to Moscow.

To be a committee chairman in Congress requires, first and foremost, longevity and continuity of service. One cannot, of course, be a statesman here until first, and continuously, he is a successful politician, in Milledgeville or elsewhere. Mr. VINSON is the archetype of the successful politician. His predominantly rural district in Georgia is generously sprinkled about with great Federal installations connected with the armed services which did not reach that distant area by accident or by academic considerations like the annual rainfall and incidence of humidity.

So long has he been entrenched in Congress—38 years, to put a figure upon it—that he has sensible reason to fear for his reelection every 2 years as the years roll by. But he is an immensely practical man and he doesn't like to be annoyed by even possible opposition in the Georgia Democratic primary, which, of course, is all that matters. So, he keeps an ear to the ground, not by running about shaking every hand in his district but by staying in touch with five or six Vinson men in each county who pretty much run things and keep him advised, well in season, of any prospective trouble.

In the matter of possible opponents in the primaries, he stands no nonsense. Once he heard that a Mr. Lewis might engage him, for the nomination. Promptly, he telephoned the junior of the Georgia Senators, RICHARD B RUSSELL, in these words:

"DICK, I don't want you to let tha' cousin of yours run against me"

Senator RUSSELL protested that to his knowledge he had no cousin with such designs.

"Well," Mr. VINSON complained, "anyhow he married one of your cousins. Get him out of there, DICK." Senator RUSSELL, hurriedly promising to do what he could, made some research and discovered that Mr. Lewis had married a very distant connection of the Russell family—what is sometimes called "a southern cousin." Anyhow, the crisis for Mr. VINSON was averted; he was unopposed.

"Cahl's" highly developed sense of self-preservation has often, and more subtly, been illustrated. It is said of him that when the time for congressional redistricting comes around every 10 years, he has not once failed to have been on the side of the man who that year was or was going to be Governor of Georgia, and thus in a decisive position as to what congressional districts would be reshuffled by the Georgia Legislature, and how.

All this would provide, perhaps, some rather interesting speculation about the relative value of absolute consistensy in ordinary political affairs as against the value to a nation—and Mr. VINSON'S value to this Nation, quite simply, is great—of the man who manages, with a little bending here and there to political necessity, to stay on where he can serve.

His demagogies, if they exist at all, are small; his sins in this direction are of the genial, venial kind. There is, to a reasonably close observer, absolutely no trace of partisan politics or political chiseling in the House Committee on the Armed Services. If CARL VINSON has got a few extra Federal dollars for Georgia, he has earned them and more from the United States of America.

His service on the committee is intense and by the accounts even of his enemies it is brilliantly informed. His work begins at 7:30 in the morning; at 4:45 p. m., nearly every day, he leaves the Capitol to go home to an invalid wife. Not even the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator MILLARD E. TYDINGS, of Maryland, is thought to be quite so well up on military subjects, since he has not had Mr. VINSON'S tremendous length of service.

These committees lay out the basic military policies. They decide whether there shall be a draft, for example, and how. They give general direction to the highest military authorities, from Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson on down. They authorize the money—the billions upon billions of it—and then they must get the Appropriations Committee and finally Congress itself, to come through.

Over the House committee of thirty-five, Mr. VINSON presides with a sort of seemingly absent-minded paternalism that fools nobody. He knows, and intimately, everything that goes on in the big staff organization which a far more executive-minded Republican predecessor as chairman, the late Walter G Andrews of New York, provided in the days of Republican control.

Under Mr. Andrews, the committee organization quit looking much like a congressional group and had the sharp efficiency of a corporation office and much of the snap of a military company. These go on, though much softened at the edges, in the Vinson regime. Mr. VINSON, most of the time, has the outward casualness of any rural Southerner on his front porch—though he reserves his tobacco chewing for his actual front porch in Milledgeville—but nothing is allowed really to go slack.

He is so homespun, in a Georgia way, as almost to suggest a case of art improving upon nature, and it is his habit, though he knows the military language down to its last polysyllable, to put things to military witnesses with a challenging aid of simplicity. When one speaks, for example, of "logistical problems," Mr. VINSON may say to him earnestly: "You are speaking of how you are going to get those things from here to there?"

For the most part, like many of the old-timers, he rarely bothers the House with his rhetoric, but when a crisis is up for one of his bills he moves about the lobbies without an obvious care in the world, buttonholing the Members with a kind of happy friendliness and, in effect, signing them on the dotted line. He keeps a great voting power, in his committee and in the House, by not overexercising his position as one of the House leaders—by not intruding, for example, on issues that don't mean much to him anyhow.

The members of all House committees are designated by the parent of them all in this regard, the Committee on Ways and Means. But Ways and Means, by one of those unspoken understandings that are a part of congressional life, does not offer to Mr. VINSON for Armed Services anybody whom Mr. VINSON, privately, has not already nominated. Thus, to a very considerable extent, he controls the selection of his associates and though he certainly would never make a point of it, the point nevertheless is not lost on them.

Then, he has another technique that has always stood him well when voting is close on something for which he is responsible. When a Member wants anything legitimate from the Military Establishment he gets it, and quickly, by applying to CARL VINSON. A VINSON request "downtown" does not mean tomorrow; it does not mean this afternoon. It means this morning, now. The "old operator" through the years has unforgettably impressed this fact upon all concerned.

The soft manner, in this and in everything else, imperfectly conceals a profoundly determined personality, which is shown in the conferences between deputations from the Senate and House that become necessary when the two bodies have passed differing versions of the same bill. Each delegation goes forth charged by its House to yield not to the other. The resulting process is a kind of collective bargaining.

Recently, on a military bill, Mr. VINSON liked certain provisions in the Senate text better than those he had been able to obtain from his own House. In the conference, Senator TYDINGS, for the Senate, was pressing for those provisions. Representative VINSON plainly was going to give in, after offering what might be called a token resistance. The senior Republican conferee present from the House, Representative DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri, began in vehement pain to shout his protests to Mr. VINSON: "Mr. Chairman, you are going against your own House."

"Now, Mr. SHAWT, Mr. SHAWT, * * *," Mr. VINSON said softly, waving his hands in vague deprecation. "Just wait a minute—just wait a minute." Mr. SHORT waited. Mr VINSON prevailed, and got his Senate provisions.

Thus, the small legends gather about the former "admiral." The one of which his colleagues are most fond is that which deals with what Mr. VINSON calls his "ice cream pants." These, the sort of striped flannels that in his youth used to go with a blazer, the chairman wears, so the superstition runs, only on days when things are going well. What these things are is never clear—whether an improvement in the Military Establishment, a looking-up in the prospects for a Vinson bill, or, conceivably, the successful frightening off of one more prospective opponent down in Georgia.

The yearer of the ice-cream pants is enigmatic at times; an elderly man (67) with vanishing hair and a bulge at the middle. But there is a bright, smiling, knowing eye, with a touch of cynicism in it and shining out beyond that a deep long-proved devotion to the military safety of the United States.

Another Letter the President Should Not Have Written

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD the correspondence between our President, the Honorable Harry S. Truman, and our colleague, WALTER NORBLAD, of Oregon. I would call your attention to the President's letter wherein he stated:

I read your letter of August 22 with a great deal of interest and, for your information, there has never been any intention to divert any water from the Columbia River, except at the point where it flows into the Pacific Ocean. * * * I hope you will inform yourselves more fully on the situation before you come to a conclusion that this project cannot and should not be done.

Mr. NORBLAD was a little more diplomatic when he replied to the President as follows:

In your letter you state that the water will be diverted from the Columbia River at the point "where it flows into the Pacific Ocean," and I wish to respectfully call your attention to the fact that because of the high tides at that point the water is very salty and would be useless for any purpose.

I think this correspondence answers my statement that the President should not have written his letter of August 28.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 7, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 28, in which you indicate approval of proposals to divert Columbia River water to California. In view of this fact, I feel it only proper and right that the people of the Pacific Northwest should be given complete information on the subject.

The questions which are raised in my mind, and I am sure in those of the people of the Northwest, are:

(a) Has feasibility been established from an engineering or economic standpoint, or both?

(b) What would be the cost of such a project?

(c) Just how would the project be paid for?

(d) Will this be undertaken now during this time of national-defense needs and increasing deficits?

(e) Would it not be cheaper and easier to tap the waters of the Smith, Mad, Eel, Russian, and other rivers in northern California?

In your letter you state that the water will be diverted from the Columbia River at the point where it flows into the Pacific Ocean, and I wish to respectfully call your attention to the fact that because of the high tides at that point that the water is very salty and would be useless for any purpose.

On the other hand, I have understood from statements of those in the Reclamation Bureau that the water would be taken from the first point on the river below where it is used for reclamation. This particular point would be near the confluence with the Yakima River, which is about 300 miles upstream from the point you indicate in your letter that the diversion would take place.

Although I am still firm in my opposition to the proposal, I feel that it is only proper at this time for yourself or the Interior Department to give these facts to the people of the region affected.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER NORBLAD.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., August 28, 1950.

Hon. WALTER NORBLAD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN NORBLAD: I read your letter of August 22 with a great deal of interest and, for your information, there has never been any intention to divert any water from the Columbia River, except at the point where it flows into the Pacific Ocean.

The best survey that I have been able to have made states that 140,000,000 acre-feet of water flows into the Pacific Ocean every year. There isn't any reason in the world why this waste water should not be used. Of course, there has never been a project, which is for the welfare of the Nation as a whole, that hasn't had opposition and I expected opposition to this one.

If I remember correctly some of your colleagues in the Northwest made the statement that Grand Coulee Dam would serve only coyotes, ground hogs, and jack rabbits. That prophecy doesn't seem to have come true.

I hope you will inform yourselves more fully on the situation before you come to a conclusion that this project cannot and should not be done.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: May I herewith express to you my disapproval of the plans currently being undertaken by the administration to divert and transport Columbia River water to the State of California.

I am advised that you are in accord with these general proposals, which it is apparent would terminate the California-Arizona controversy over the use of the Colorado River waters by giving a major share of this water to the State of Arizona and diverting Columbia River water in turn to California.

May I respectfully call your attention to the fact that Representative CLAIR ENGLE of California, a Democrat, and Representative NORRIS POULSON, of California, a Republican, and each ranking members of the Public Lands Committee from their States, have both publicly expressed their opposition to the Columbia River diversion plan.

At present the Interior Department is spending $520,000 on these studies, and engineers advise that completion of the proposal would cost from five to ten billion dollars. The distance between the Columbia River and the San Francisco Bay area is over 700 miles, and the lowest point at which major rail traffic crosses the mountains is over 5,000 feet. While it is true that there is now a surplus of water in the Columbia River at certain periods of the year, that with our tremendous growth in the Pacific Northwest, this situation will not long obtain. I particularly refer to the constant growth of irrigation and industry in our part of the country and to the fact that the Grand Coulee project within itself will require a very large withdrawal of future Columbia River water.

Very truly yours,

WALTER NORBLAD.

The Defense of Our Cities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted me, I include a penetrating article by Dr. R. E. Lapp. Dr. Lapp was with the Manhattan project during the war and subsequently was head of the Nuclear Physics Division of the Office of Naval Research. Currently an independent consulting scientist, he is the author of Must We Hide? The article, entitled "The Defense of Our Cities," appeared in the September 12 issue of the Reporter magazine. The above-mentioned article follows:

THE ATOM—THE DEFENSE OF OUR CITIES

(By R. E. Lapp)

After jolting the Nation into hasty military preparations, the Korean outbreak has thrown our civic leaders into a mad scramble to do something about civil defense. For 5 years Federal officials have treated civil-defense plans as blackboard exercises. As Mayor Elmer E. Robinson, of San Francisco, put it: "Federal agencies have been shuffling papers, plans, and schemes back and forth between themselves. One report supersedes another. Neither is officially accepted as a guide for local authorities but both are sent to local authorities. That is a deplorable situation because you may plan the defense of your city one way, I may plan mine another, and someone else may have even a third plan. * * *"

The late James Forrestal, acting with a foresight and wisdom only now beginning to be appreciated, set up an Office of Civil Defense Planning in the Pentagon in the spring of 1948. By the end of that year the comprehensive Hopley report, Civil Defense for National Security, was prepared for the Secretary of Defense and given wide distribution. But like many other Government reports, it was acted upon; in fact, this report was never blessed by any other Government agency. It fell into discard when the President plucked the civil-defense problem out of the hands of the military and gave it to the National Security Resources Board, where it was promptly pigeonholed. A year passed before W. Stuart Symington, the present Chairman moved over to NSRB from the Secretaryship of the Air Force, and a young atomic-weapons expert, Dr. Paul J. Larsen, was appointed Director of Civilian Mobilization.

Under Larsen's direction, planning began to move. On June 13, 1950, Larsen promised the assembled mayors on the west coast: "* * * I want to assure you that the Federal Government is developing a modern, flexible, and practical civil-defense program to meet all types of twentieth-century warfare. We have little doubt that the final results * * * will be adequate to whatever situation an enemy might impose upon us." These words mollified the mayors, and they sat back to wait for September, when the NSRB plan would be unveiled.

Communist aggression in Korea overtook the timetable for the defense of our cities. Several cities and States plunged ahead on their own plans. Gov. Thomas E Dewey picked Gen. Lucius D. Clay to head civil defense in New York State. In accepting the position, Clay remarked: "After a very calm and clear analysis of the facts we expect to develop a plan as soon as possible." These words keynote the fact that the Nation starts from scratch in the summer of 1950 to prepare against wide-scale devastation.

As if to atone for its policy of not informing the American people, the administration authorized the publication last month of a monumental treatise called the Effects of Atomic Weapons, a 456-page book which examines in detail the various effects produced when a bomb is detonated in the air, on the surface of the ground, or below water or earth. The layman is confronted with an array of scientific terms, equations, and graphs. One Washington official summed it up as he laid the publication aside: "I wonder who it was written for?"

The British have published a homely little training booklet on atomic warfare which depends almost wholly upon an easy narrative augmented with simple diagrams, and can be read and understood by the man in the street. Such a publication is a major requirement on this side of the Atlantic.

Enough atomic bombs have been detonated so that we can predict fairly accurately just what the effects will be if the bombs are set off above the surface of the earth. From a strictly military viewpoint, an air-burst atomic bomb does the most damage over the greatest area, and for this reason it is generally assumed that an enemy would employ this method of atomic attack against us. Obviously, the bigger the bomb, the wider the area affected. The 1945 Nagasaki-type atomic bomb was rated as being equivalent to 20,000 tons of TNT. We may call this a small bomb. Assuming a big one as equivalent to 50,000 tons of high explosive, and the probable future H-bomb as equal to 200,000 tons, we can make a comparison of the areas subject to moderate blast damage from the detonation in the air of a small atomic bomb, a big atomic bomb, and an H-bomb.

For planning purposes, what size bomb should we assume the Russians can produce? It seems reasonable to give them the benefit of the doubt and plan for a medium-sized bomb—something between a 20,000 and 50,000-ton high-explosive equivalent.

If we assume that the Soviet bomb is of the 35,000-ton type and further assume that it is detonated half a mile above an American city, we can then proceed to predict the probable areas of damage from such a burst. The damage can be cataloged in three different categories.

The first, most spectacular effect of an atomic explosion is the blast effect. It is in terms of blast effect that an atomic bomb is compared with conventional explosives. Experts classify blast damage in five degrees, ranging from demolition or virtually complete destruction to light damage. In between there are severe, moderate, and partial damage, the first classed as heavy structural damage (irreparable), the second heavy (but reparable), and the last self-explanatory.

When an atomic bomb is detonated, a relatively small amount of solid uranium is instantaneously converted into a glowing intensely hot gas which quickly expands to form a fireball. Energy is radiated from this glowing mass in the form of visible, infrared, and ultraviolet rays as a prolonged flash of brilliant light. An ordinary TNT bomb produces temperatures of about 5,000° centigrade, but an atomic bomb boosts the temperature to the multimillion-degree level. Although this flash of heat can cause wood to ignite and causes conflagrations as widespread as many bomberloads of incendiaries, the most significant effect is on human beings.

In addition to blast effect and flash burn, there is nuclear radiation, which is emitted from an atomic explosion in a burst, half being produced in the first second after the explosion and the rest within 10 seconds thereafter. A high air burst leaves no residue of radio-activity of any serious consequence, but bombs burst below earth or water may be expected to leave residual radiation (Bikini effect).

All three primary effects of the bomb—blast, heat, and nuclear radiation—occur simultaneously, and each has its own radius of action. Assuming that the enemy detonates a 35,000-ton bomb half a mile over a city, if a person is within 1 mile of the ground zero he may be killed by any or all of the three effects. Beyond 1 mile, he is safe from penetrating radiation but can be killed by flash burn or by blast injury. Civil-defense planners can assess the casualties in their community by drawing a series of circles on population maps. While the results will vary with each city, the average figure for large American population centers has been estimated by NSRB experts at 140,000 casualties. This figure includes the dead, missing, and injured. In an area such as that around Times Square the total casualties would be two to three times higher.

These estimates are based upon the assumption that the city receives no alert; they are, therefore, maximum figures. If a city receives a sufficient alert, if the people are disciplined to seek shelter, if shelters are available or the people seek good makeshift shelters, and if secondary damage from fires, cave-ins, and collapse is contained, then these casualty estimates can be halved. In the most favorable circumstances one can hope to reduce casualties to as little as a tenth, but this involves a tremendous amount of preparation for disaster. The alert is of the greatest importance to effective civil defense. If a man happened be on the eightieth floor of the Empire State Building when an alert sounded, his chance of survival would be negligible unless he had a 1-hour warning, for it would require at least that to evacuate the building.

Just what kind of alert time is it reasonable to expect? There is no firm answer to this question, for we do not know what means of delivering the bomb an enemy would use. If he employed the covert or clandestine technique, as it is technically termed in high Government circles, then he could plant atomic bombs in our harbors, in tramp steamers, or in the basements of skyscrapers. Unless the bombs could be ferreted out in advance, the alert time would be zero. During the past summer the Central Intelligence Agency and the Federal Bureau of Investigation were alerted more than once to the danger of a smuggled bomb.

Despite the publicity given to the tramp-steamer or Trojan-ship method of delivery, it is by no means an open-and-shut case that an enemy would elect to employ such a delivery scheme The risk for him would be very great. Should a single bomb be detected, he would lose the all-important initiative. Furthermore, the mechanics of exporting bombs from a distance and the technical problems in preplacing and detonating them are by no means simple. Even the results obtained would argue against this method of delivery.

The means of delivery apparently considered as the most probable by our defense experts is the heavy bomber. Today our $85,000,000 radar screen is still under construction, and even when it is completed it will not be holeproof, for radar has a horizon limitation that allows low-fying aircraft to escape detection. It is this well-known fact which, being misinterpreted by civil-defense officials, has led to the mushroom regrowth of an obsolete aircraft-spotting system. Life magazine recently featured a full-page photo of a grim-faced woman spotter gazing intently at the sky above San Francisco's Bay area. The pathetic futility of the scene strikes home when one realizes that the bomb-release point for an atomic bomber would be 10 or more miles from the city.

It is highly improbable that an enemy could stage a simultaneous attack upon our far-flung network of cities, or that such an attack, if attempted, would go undetected by all radar stations. Depending upon the nature of the alert, some cities should implement evacuation plans while others should have the populace routed to previously designated shelters. Here the man in the street will rightfully ask: What constitutes an adequate shelter?" Perhaps the best answer is simply: "Any port in a storm." It would hardly be feasible to provide adequate shelters for everyone, if by adequate we mean bunkers with 5-foot concrete walls designed for all-night occupancy. British and German experience in the Second World War showed that far from perfect shelters can be highly effective against high explosives, and it is to be expected that we shall find this true for the atomic weapon. Of course, the 1-mile circle directly around ground zero would have to be written off, for within it only the most ruggedly built shelters could be effective. It is highly unlikely that many such shelters will be—or in fact should be—constructed.

A lesson to be learned from the past war is that civilian discipline is just as important as shelters. Panic could be as disastrous as atomic explosion.

Thus the problem of civil defense is framed in terms of the probable damage from an atomic explosion, the maximum casualties, and the practicability of an alert. Clearly, it is an exceedingly tough problem; some will say it is one without a solution. Actually, there is a solution. The dispersion of our cities and industries would make targets which would be unprofitable for the enemy to bomb. However, this is viewed as political dynamite in Washington, and now that the Korean war has revised our time scale for preparedness, there is not sufficient time to undertake effective dispersion. While dispersion is the complete and eventual answer to weapons of mass destruction, there are partial answers that may prove useful. It is well to adopt the philosophy of a skilled boxer who knows that his opponent can knock him out with a series of lucky punches, but who nonetheless trains conscientiously, toughening his body to absorb punishment while perfecting his defense to ward off as many punches as possible. The analogy may be extended to point out that while the boxer has capable medical aid in his corner he does not rely upon it to win his fight. In this respect many of our defense planners, too much impressed with medical advice and in awe of radiation, have built their plans around medical relief for a bombed area. Medical aid for a stricken community is important, but it should not constitute the whole of civil defense.

The most reliable medical estimates of the casualties resulting from an air burst atomic explosion over a large American city place the total toll at 140,000, of which half would be deaths. Not all the deaths would occur instantly, although it is estimated that about 45,000 would be killed outright, or would die the first day. Another 15,000 or so would succumb during the first week and the remainder would die within six weeks. This means that apart from those missing or killed, there would be 95,000 casualties requiring medical treatment during the first week. Not all casualties would require extensive treatment and hospitalization, for many would suffer minor injuries from falling debris, superficial burns, and flying glass. About one-third of those injured would require hospitalization and careful treatment for radiation injury, serious flash burn, or internal injuries. Another third would require some hospitalization but not as much medical care and nursing; these people would in general come from the areas of intermediate blast damage. The remainder of the patients should not require hospitalization and could be treated at first-aid stations.

When these casualty estimates were given to an NSRB medical committee, the doctors were staggered. How could a city paralyzed by an atomic attack muster the medical facilities and personnel to cope with these tens of thousands of casualties? With hospitals demolished, many doctors killed or injured, medical supplies destroyed, and transportation at a standstill, how could the injured be evacuated, hospitalized, and treated?

Plans must be made for establishing emergency hospitals, evacuating the wounded, enlisting medical aid from all nearby towns, setting up emergency reserves of medical supplies, and a whole host of allied measures. To the extent that we prepared in advance, we should be able to cope with an atomic disaster.

The very magnitude of the medical problem ought to compel civil-defense authorities to undertake every measure to minimize casualties. One of the most effective procedures would be to evacuate all women and children, along with nonessential workers, to smaller communities. This measure should remain in effect for the duration of the war. Those who had to remain in the target cities should be thoroughly disciplined for their role when disaster struck. They would have to be schooled in the rudiments of survival in an atomic bombing. A person caught in the open at some distance from a detonation can still survive—if beyond the lethal range of nuclear radiation—by shielding himself from the heat flash and the blast wave. At a distance of 2 miles from the blast it takes 10 seconds for the conclusion to be felt, and this may be sufficient time to seek some sort of shelter.

An atomic attack would obviously have a serious effect upon specific communities. But unless the attack were widespread, the resulting loss of population and industries would not knock out the United States. Especially if we were prepared, we could withstand terrific punishment. For the most part our industry is located on the peripheries of our cities and is not as vulnerable as the hearts of them are. But there is one prime target city that is of such importance to the Nation that its loss would seriously cripple the country This city is Washington. From the steps of the Capitol to the low silhouette of the mammoth Pentagon is only 3 miles as the crow flies. Yet within this 3-mile circle are concentrated the National Military Establishment with its 25,000 employees, the Navy Department, the Atomic Energy Commission, the State Department, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and many offices of the executive branch of the Government. All lie within the area which a single modern atomic bomb could devastate completely.

Within high Government circles there has been angry debate about doing the obvious—moving the Government agencies out of town. There are still many dichards in the Capital who prefer to believe that it can't happen here, and who vigorously resist any attempt to transplant the critical Government agencies. Instead of moving out to Bethesda, Silver Spring, and Alexandria, the Government is crowding more and more personnel into the District. Needled into action by the Korean war, Congress has authorized the establishment of an Office of Civil Defense for the District. However, the steps taken and the measures planned so far are wholly inconsistent with the size of the problem.

The confusion that exists in civil defense, with the local communities and the Federal Government at loggerheads as to who should do what, reminds one of the classic story of two fire companies that rushed to put out a fire in a house. The house straddled the city line, and while the two fire companies argued over who should put out the fire, the house burned down. While the National Security Resources Board is charged with responsibility for civilian defense, it has no clearly defined authority and no operational function. The Board has farmed out civilian defense to more than a score of Government agencies, and it acts as a sort of holding company over them all. Now that cities are clamoring for civilian-defense preparedness and are specifying such measures as shelter construction, it is clear that staggering sums of money will soon be needed. True civilian defense will cost many billions of dollars, and if this money is to be spent sanely it must be cleared through a single operating agency, just as requests for appropriations from the Army, Navy, and Air Force are processed through the office of the Secretary of Defense. To handle the defense of our cities on a scale proportional to the magnitude of the problem, there must be established an Office of Civilian Defense with far greater authority than that now vested in the National Security Resources Board. Only in this way can this extremely tough problem be tackled realistically.

Mistakes of the Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Farm Journal of September 1950:

MISTAKES OF THE FUTURE

The mess in Korea highlights grievous mistakes in recent American statesmanship. That this Asiatic peninsula, with no strategic military importance to the United States, must be the scene of a bloody struggle proves once again that all mistakes must be paid for. The price for governmental errors always comes high.

In order that future mistakes may be fewer, those of the past should not be dismissed. They should be studied.

The route to Korean bloodshed began back in 1933 when our Government recognized Soviet Russia. Much has been lost by the appeasement policies which the administrations since then has followed. We gave the Soviets generously of lend-lease materials, with little in return. We yielded to Stalin by making the second front in Normandy. Had that attack been made from the Mediterranean, Russia would not today be solidly installed in half of Europe. We stopped our advancing armies so that Russians could be first to enter Berlin—an error that cost millions for the air lift later, and that may yet cost far more to protect western Europe.

We suspended the war with no plans for winning the peace. At Cairo, Tehran and Yalta concessions were made to Stalin which set the Communists up in business in China, Korea, and elsewhere in the Orient.

Then our confused and infested State Department faltered year after year over China. Bemused by attempting to mix into the economic affairs of half the world, it failed miserably to head off the Communist control which now holds China in iron grip.

Meanwhile, a 1948 campaign money-raiser was made Secretary of Defense. Recommendations for defense expenditures were whittled, while nondefense spending mounted to unprecedented figures. The Navy was weakened, the Air Forces throttled down, and the Army limited, while the illusion of adequate preparedness was fostered in the public mind.

The Voice of America was held to an ill-managed whisper while Russian propaganda against the United States blanketed the earth.

Soft methods have enabled Communists, and their helpers to penetrate deeply into American industry. Should world war be resumed, American action could be crippled in countless ways by Communist sabotage from within.

The Nation has been weakened internally by governmental borrowing, which has cut down the value of savings.

Bad examples in high places have impaired moral standards, and have weakened another great source of strength.

This is a gloomy record. We regret that it can be recited America deserves more glorious history than this.

The mistakes which have been made can not be reversed They can only be paid for in the high currency of blood and treasure. We are the people, and cannot escape the cost.

If the courage, character, and good sense of the people will rise this autumn to choose patriotic, nation-minded representatives for Congress, the United States may begin again to make history with more triumphs and fewer errors.

General Marshall Comes Back

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "General Marshall Comes Back," published in the Duluth News-Tribune for September 13, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL MARSHALL COMES BACK

The much criticized Secretary of Defense Louis A. Johnson resigned yesterday and, he said, he had recommended Gen. George C. Marshall, former chief of staff, to take over the job of rebuilding this Nation's moldering defenses.

The resignation of Johnson is good news, if for no other reason than the need immediately for a man of strength, personal prestige, and experience. General Marshall fits that description perfectly.

He will bring to the Department of Defense the quality it has lacked most—confidence.

There was not a thing Johnson could have done to inspire the men under him and, of greater importance, the American people. The public has been aware of the need for a change. The question remains whether this change is enough. Time will tell.

General Marshall has sought a quiet life in retirement for a decade or more, but each retirement has been followed by a crisis that brought him back into the service of his country. He is a soldier above all else and, in this hour of need, it is no surprise that he willingly accepted President Truman's offer that he now serve as Secretary of Defense.

Johnson, too, is motivated by a desire to serve the best interests of the United States.

He has recognized by his resignation that he could not gain the support of the American people in the Korean war and in preparations for a greater conflict now in the threatening stage.

The return of General Marshall will serve a dual purpose. It will jack up the sagging morale of the fighting men in Korea, the American soldiers spread so thinly over a confused Europe, and the people back home who soon will be called upon for cutting sacrifices. It also will be a clear warning to the Politburo in Moscow that the United States has been asleep at the switch once again, but now has come out of its stupor and soon will be prepared to meet any test.

It is the sincere hope of the American people that Congress will rally behind General Marshall and offer him the support he now needs to tie together loose ends. The general can do the job, he has the mental equipment and experience to do it, but he must be backed right down to freedom's hilt.

Federal Rent Control in Los Angeles

REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, before this House took its recent Labor Day recess, I called attention to the decidedly unusual way in which Housing Expediter Tighe E. Wood first delayed and then was prevented by a series of legal maneuvers from issuing an order decontrolling rents in the city of Los Angeles.

The manner in which this matter has been handled has been extraordinary, to say the least, and increasing suspicion has been voiced about the possibility the Housing Expediter, or members of his staff, are in cahoots with groups fighting decontrol in the hope that an order removing controls can be held up until Congress possibly passes a new law—under the guise of checking inflation and helping out new defense armament program—reestablishing Federal rent control.

I have discovered the delay in issuing the decontrol order—twice requested by overwhelming majorities—has bewildered and confused thousands of people. Landlords and tenants both are upset about this complex situation, which is marked by some strange shenanigans by lawyers representing a group that claims to be made up of large numbers of tenants.

On the very day this House went on its Labor Day recess, the United States Court of Appeals here in the District of Columbia issued another restraining order that has the effect of continuing controls indefinitely in effect. Before taking that action, the three-judge panel showed deep concern over suggestions the judicial proceedings are the result of or at least partly made possible by collusion between the Housing Expediter or his staff and the people who are trying to block removal of rent control in Los Angeles.

Judge Harold M. Stephens asked attorneys participating in an argument in this case to comment on the insinuation the Expediter was in cahoots with the people trying to get the courts to tie his hands judicially. Of course, the lawyers denied anything improper in their actions.

The court of appeals, Mr. Speaker, so far has not gone into the peculiar circumstances—which may be entirely outside the court's jurisdiction—that mark the time-consuming handling of this Los Angeles decontrol matter. Perhaps the court here in the District cannot look into the possibility that certain individuals in Los Angeles were in communication with certain Federal officials plotting possible ways of preventing the Expediter from issuing a decontrol order. Perhaps the court is not concerned with the shenanigans that have caused much comment. By this, I mean the way the attorney for the so-called tenants council went into the chambers of a Federal district judge here—3,000 miles away from the city where this matter is of vital importance—after the end of normal business hours and obtained a temporary restraining order tying Expediter Woods' hands temporarily. I also mean the way in which the Expediter's legal counsel failed to oppose the issuance of this order and then made no move to ask for dismissal of a petition for a temporary injunction blocking issuance of a decontrol order.

The peculiar maneuvers in this matter were reflected recently in Los Angeles. Councilman Ed J. Davenport, one of the city councilmen who favored decontrol, has protested against the apparent effort of Federal bureaucrats to nullify the will of Congress and their defiance of local governing bodies whom we in Congress decided are best situated to decide whether there is any need to continue rent control.

Councilman Davenport has asked us, the Congress, to investigate what he terms "bureaucratic interference." He has charged Expediter Woods with conniving with groups desiring continued bureaucratic control of local affairs.

Another Los Angeles Councilman, George P. Cronk, who sponsored the rent-decontrol resolution in the council, has echoed Mr. Davenport's feelings and said the handling of this matter indicates "how far this great Nation has drifted down the road to socialism."

Mr. Speaker, I ordinarily do not encourage Congress to meddle in local affairs and heartily favor the maximum amount of local self-government. I know a large number of my colleagues feel the same way. The question that has been presented by this Los Angeles rent controversy is whether Federal bureaucrats are undermining local self-government.

When Congress enacts a law defining clearly the powers and authority of administrative agencies of the Government, we are entitled to expect the officials of those agencies will respect the law and carry it out faithfully, as they have sworn to do when taking office. If officials can connive with groups outside the Government who dislike the laws we pass, if they can engage in collusive steps to use the courts to prevent the will of Congress from being put into effect, the privileges and prerogatives of this House are seriously challenged.

This situation may affect only one city—but I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, it is the fourth largest city in the Nation—but the facts I have just given and the statement I put in the RECORD 2 weeks ago seem sufficient to me to warrant asking this House to investigate these weird shenanigans, to find out if the courts are being used by attorneys who are in cahoots to get around the laws enacted by Congress, to look into the motives and actions of the parties in this unusual situation. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a resolution calling on the Banking and Currency Committee to conduct an inquiry and report the facts back to this House so we may decide whether further action is necessary to see that our statutes are honestly administered, whether our judicial processes are being abused, and whether our officials are living up to the trust we put in them.

Mike Mansfield Reports on Project Developments in Western Montana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in accord with my annual custom, I am happy to include with my remarks a summary of appropriations approved by the Congress for specific Reclamation, Bonneville Power Administration, Rural Electrification Administration, Indian Office, and Army Engineer's projects in the district I have the honor and the privilege to represent. The time covered by these appropriations is for the period during my service as a Representative from the First District of Montana and follows up similar reports sent out by me in previous years.

These projects, with the coming into western Montana of new industries in the Butte-Anaconda and Hungry Horse areas, mark the beginning of the development of our State, a diversification of our economy, and greater security for our people.

RECLAMATION PROJECTS

1. Hungry Horse project

1946	$1,700,000
1947	867,210
1948	2,500,000
1949	14,611,650
1950	22,093,125
1951	29,500,000
Total	71,271,985

Truman's Turn-Abouts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Earl Richert, writing in the Washington News, calls attention to the President's nimble mental gyrations. He points out simply, clearly, that Mr. Truman has, over a long period, been talking one way and then shortly after acting oppositely. As part of my remarks, I include the article:

TRUMAN'S TURN-ABOUTS

(By Earl Richert)

The speed and frequency with which President Truman executes turn-abouts on hired hands and policies has sent this wisecrack on its way around the Capital circuit.

"When the President makes up his mind, no power on earth can keep him from changing it."

Defense Secretary Louis Johnson's dismissal is the latest in a series of acts that make this wisecrack appropriate.

On August 4, the President said at a press conference that Secretaries Acheson and Johnson would not resign as long as he was President. On September 12, little more than a month later, Secretary Johnson's letter of resignation was politely accepted by the President.

That turn-about, fast as it was, was not as speedy as one the President made in the fall of 1946 during the great meat shortage.

On September 27 of that year, the President flatly declared himself against removal of price controls on meat. On October 14 he was on the air announcing the removal of all controls on meat.

Only last Thursday, President Truman was asked about a story saying W. Stuart Symington would be made the over-all defense boss.

That, said Mr. Truman, was the first he had heard of it.

Saturday night, in his radio talk, the President announced that the new powers provided by the Defense Production Act of 1950 would be coordinated by the Chairman of the National Security Resources Board, W. Stuart Symington.

Also at last week's press conference the President was asked if he had under consideration an economic stabilization agency which would have control over wages, prices, and commodities.

The President said that was not under consideration at the present time and he probably would answer the question Saturday night.

On Saturday, he issued an Executive order setting up an Economic Stabilization Agency. Its function will be to guide voluntary efforts to hold down inflation and to prepare to impose price-wage ceilings if, and when, they are necessary.

Most important turn-about of all, of course, has been that on far eastern policy. That switch sent our troops into Korea and the United States fleet to guard Formosa, although Mr. Truman repeatedly had indicated that Formosa was not in the United States defense plans.

Back on December 3, 1948, Mr. Truman said Defense Secretary James Forrestal had been asked to stay in the Cabinet. Mr. Truman pointed out at the time, however, that all persons at the top level in Government served at the pleasure of the President.

Three months later, on March 3, 1949, the President announced that Mr. Forrestal had resigned.

On the same day the President said Army Secretary Kenneth Royall was not resigning. On April 20, 1949, less than 2 months later, the White House announced Mr. Royall's retirement.

And so it goes.

Mr. Speaker, consistency is a necessary virtue for a man who is the President of the United States. It is a quality that Mr. Truman obviously does not possess. How much longer will the people continue to follow this kind of leadership?

Unfinished Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in the Washington Post, September 18, 1950, which I have been asked to insert in the RECORD:

UNFINISHED BUSINESS

The withdrawal of 11 names from the petition to bring the home rule bill before the House is a cruel blow to the hope for self-government here. Only 13 more signatures were needed to insure action on the bill at the present session. Now the sponsors of home rule will have to obtain 24 additional signatures to save the bill from the ashcan to which the House District Committee consigned it. We hope this will not prove impossible, but it is obvious that extraordinary efforts will have to be put forth if the goal is to be reached before the present Congress expires.

All the reasons given by the Representatives who changed their minds seem petty beside the overshadowing fact that this Capital of the world's greatest democratic power is denied any participation in its own government. This is not a new issue thrown at the Congress in the last days of the session. It has been kicking around Capitol Hill for years. Indeed, the Eightieth Congress put a similar bill aside on the ground that it did not have time for adequate discussion. Since then the issue has been thoroughly explored. The community has debated the bill and expressed its approval by the only means available. The measure has been passed by the Senate; it has the support of the President and was written specifically to carry out the platform pledges of the Democratic and Republican Parties. To let it die for want of action by the House would be not only a gross waste of legislative time and effort, but an inexcusable frustration of the national will. The same may be said, of couse, of the statehood bills for Alaska and Hawaii.

The chances for any of these bills before Congress takes its long-postponed recess is very slender. But their enactment is of sufficient importance to warrant a postelection session of the present Congress even if there were no other reason for Congress to return. Incidentally, some Congressmen are likely to hear from their constituents regarding these bills. For example, the New York Times asked editorially the other day why 16 Republicans from New York State have failed to sign the District home-rule discharge petition. The issue of "democracy in Washington" has won support in many States because of the gross injustice resulting from the present situation. If Congressmen returning to their home districts to campaign would ask their constituents whether voting rights and home rule should be restored to the Nation's Capital, we should have no doubt as to the outcome.

Respect for the Law of the Land

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the American Bar Association is one of the great stabilizing influences in this country, because it has a wholesome respect for the law. It stands four-square in defense of the Federal Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald of September 18, 1950, which refers to Frank E. Holman, of Seattle, the distinguished past president of the American Bar Association, and his views with reference to the United Nations:

The journal of the American Bar Association in its August and September issues calls attention to the disposition manifested by the California State court of appeal to regard to the UN Charter as a self-executing treaty despite the specific disavowal of the Charter that it so regards itself. The legal and constitutional dangers of this attitude are certain to engage the attention of the association at its annual convention, opening here today.

VOTE REFLECTS CURRENT ILLUSION

An editorial in the journal for August implies that the Senate was extremely shortsighted when it ratified the Charter in 1945 by an overwhelming vote of 89 to 2 without serious concern for its hidden implications. The vote was a reflection of the illusions current at the time, when internationalists were professing to be certain that UN would cure all of the world's evils.

Since then Americans have had an extended opportunity to find out for themselves that UN has not only been incapable of achieving its purposes of outlawing war and guaranteeing peace, but that it has served principally as a sounding board for the most flagrant sort of anti-American Soviet propaganda.

These consequences would have been harmful enough without an American court attempting to read into the Charter mandatory duties resting upon the United States which any reasonable reading would show were not there. Such a decision was that in California rendering invalid the State's law on alien land holdings, which had been upheld in a long series of decisions by the State courts and the United States Supreme Court.

Conceding that the law was constitutional under the State and Federal Constitutions, the court still insisted that the UN Charter superseded the State constitutions. The argument turned on the provision of article VI of the United States Constitution that treaties shall be supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

MANDATE NOT SELF-EXECUTING

The California case involved land ownership by an alien Japanese. The court of appeal contended that under statements of the UN Charter undertaking to promote respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without discrimination as to race, sex, language, or religion, the American States were obliged to enforce this mandate, whatever their own laws might say.

The fact that there was no self-executing mandate however, is attested by Article 56 of the UN Charter, pledging the members to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the organization for the achievement of purposes. No such action has been taken by Congress, although the California court brings in the fact that a draft covenant of human rights for the world has been prepared by a UN agency under the chairmanship of Mrs. Roosevelt. Not only has this document never been submitted to the Senate for acceptance as a treaty, but the UN Social and Economic Council recently laid it aside as wholly unsatisfactory, so that it does not even have the approval of UN.

The bar association editorial states that, should the California opinion be affirmed, the power of Congress and the States to legislate will be subordinated to a whole series of rights and responsibilities which would automatically become binding upon the United States simply because of some value UN statement concerning them. The Truman civil-rights program, for example, would almost certainly come into effect, notwithstanding the refusal of Congress to pass it.

WOULD "GIVE AMERICA AWAY"

Again, in its September issue, the Journal deals extensively with the question of whether the treaty-making power constitutes a blank check for writing a new Constitution. Frank E. Holman of Seattle, the distinguished past president of the ABA, offers a penetrating analysis of the revolutionary offshoots that endanger the Republic as a result of UN. He says that if the bar fails to resist the threat it will be a criminal accomplice to giving America away.

The interest of the American Bar Association in these grave matters is heartening for the Constitution and the laws of the Nation and the States, as legal instruments, must depend largely for survival upon the advocacy of our trained legal minds. If their integrity is impaired, the Nation's sovereignty will be gone. International bodies, rather than the elected representatives of the American people, would then legislate for us all.

N. E. Dodd, a Successful Administrator

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I have just heard that the Food and Agriculture Organization has to elect a director-general, since the term of N. E. Dodd, the present director-general, will expire in November. Considering the present unsettled world situation and the fact that the organization is planning to move its headquarters to Rome early in 1951, I sincerely hope that Ed Dodd can be prevailed upon to stay with the organization. The United States has a large stake in this international organization and pays the largest sum toward its operation.

I have known Ed Dodd most of my life. I know of his successful farming operations and of his efforts during the past 25 years to improve the position of people engaged in agriculture. While he was with the United States Department of Agriculture he served in many positions—the county office, the State office, in Washington as director of the farm program in the 13 Western States, then as chief of the agency which had the major responsibility for food production during the war, and as Under Secretary of Agriculture until 1948. He has appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Appropriations of both houses many times and I have never talked to a Member of Congress that did not express respect for his great general knowledge of agriculture as well as for his good practical judgment.

We have voted a large appropriation to be used in providing technical assistance to underdeveloped areas. The Food and Agriculture Organization will receive the largest single share of the part of these funds that will be administered by the United Nations, these funds being in addition to the funds voted directly for the FAO. The object of this program is to teach underdeveloped nations "to help themselves," to supply practical plans, along with technicians and a small amount of equipment, for improving their agriculture and raising their standards of living.

I am sure that many of my colleagues in Congress will agree with me when I say that we will have more confidence in the success of these programs if we can keep N. E. Dodd directing and guiding them.

Politics as Usual

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend, heretofore granted, I am inserting an editorial which appeared in the Evening Observer, of Dunkirk, N. Y., on September 14, 1950:

POLITICS AS USUAL

Under the threat of a new war emergency there seems to be a tendency to condemn the idea of "politics as usual."

Why? Politics will be about as usual this fall and there is nothing destructive nor unpatriotic about that.

When the emergency becomes so great that we cannot permit the democracy to function with politics as usual it will be a sad day for our country and for human rights.

A part of the fight for human freedom is to keep politics as usual.

This year we will elect a State ticket, a Senator, and various Representatives. That means the people will register and go to the polling places. They will govern themselves as usual which means that politics will be as usual. When politics are not as usual we will no longer have a democracy and we will no longer have anything worth fighting for.

Let the incumbents defend themselves. Let the aspirants attack with constructive criticisms. Let the people decide. That's democracy. That's politics as usual. We can't see where there is anything unpatriotic about it. Let there be the usual number of investigations, inquiries, and hearings. Keep the searchlight on. It is our Government. If government by the people be right, and it is right, no part of government need be concealed. If government by the people be right in peacetime it is right in wartime. If the people cannot be trusted in emergency they cannot be trusted at all. Politics is nothing more than the system by which the people rule themselves. Any time politics departs from the usual the people will have a right to be more suspicious than usual.

Communist Charge Against Farmers Union Is Not Substantiated by Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, a vicious attack was made against the Farmers Union by one of our Senators, in which he charged that the Farmers Union was a Communist-front organization. Nothing could be further from the truth. I am a member of the Farmers Union and was identified with the organization and development of the Equity Society of America and the Equity Exchange at St. Paul; I aided in organizing the Farmers Union, which was the successor of the organizations above named.

The National Farmers Union has supported the President, as that is their perfect constitutional right; they have supported the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, and appropriations generally to prevent communistic aggression, and have very definitely fixed the blame for the Korean invasion on Russia. Does that sound like a Communist front? I do not always agree with the National Farmers Union, but that is my right. In presenting here the resolutions of the board of directors of the National Farmers Union in answer to the irresponsible charges of a Member of the other body, I wish to say that I approve that resolution on all points mentioned. Here is the resolution:

The National Farmers Union board of directors adopted the following statement at a meeting in Denver, Saturday, September 9, 1950. The board is composed of all presidents of State Farmers Union organizations.

"Senator BRIDGES' attack in the Senate on the National Farmers Union has done a disservice to the cause of truth and decency by resorting to the tactics made infamous by totalitarian dictators in Italy, Germany, and Russia. His assignment to such a role in the Washington drama of terrorism and deception obviously was made because he has no Farmers Union members in his State, and, therefore, he can safely pretend to bravery in his name calling. Few will envy him the responsibility he has accepted for this unsavory attack on the second oldest farm organization in the United States, an organization whose basic political philosophy has its roots deep in the American soil and in the fundamental principles of democracy.

"The speed with which fellow Senators repudiated the charges made by BRIDGES is clear indication of the lack of foundation for the statements.

"As every honest observer knows, the Farmers Union is not communistic and is not a Communist-front organization. Farmers Union officials on many occasions have denounced communism as well as other forms of totalitarianism. For example, on July 29, an official statement of the President, approved by the executive committee, charged the North Korean aggressors had been trained and agitated into waging war on South Korea by Russia.

"We, the democratically elected presidents of State Farmers Union organizations, constituting the board of directors of the National Farmers Union, and representing more than 400,000 farm people, support and approve that declaration.

"The Farmers Union will not be diverted in its determination to follow the course it has pursued for 48 years, that of fighting for the interests of family farmers, who represent the bulwark of democracy in this great Nation. We will not be muzzled by such use of fear techniques of dictatorship.

"We are for the freedom and dignity of the individual citizen, and we will continue to oppose any hysteria-spawned legislation that threatens that freedom and dignity.

"We are for the independent family farm operator, and we will continue to fight for the Brannan farm program and any other legislation that we regard as aiding family farmers.

"We are for a healthy Nation, and we will continue to fight for a national health-insurance program.

"We are for the strengthening of such instruments of true democracy as farmer cooperatives, and we will continue to fight the monopolies that seek to tear down these instruments.

"We are for genuine international collaboration to build a peaceful and prosperous world, and we will continue to support wholeheartedly the United Nations.

"We herewith rededicate ourselves to the ideals of our organization and pledge ourselves to answer any and all attacks by building a Farmers Union increasingly more effective for the strengthening of democracy."

Retailing Daily Praises Arkansas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the following statement by Earl Lifshey, which appeared in the Retailing Daily of New York City, on September 11, 1950:

ARKANSAS TRAVELER

(By Earl Lifshey)

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., September 10.—It's high time we big-city hillbillies stopped selling Arkansas so short. Even a brief visit to the pine tree State should be enough to convince any but the most uncomprehending that tremendously exciting things are happening here and that our traditional cartoon-concept of it as being primarily a place of bare-footed, mule-riding mountaineer moonshiners is just so much more Manhattan madness.

Since the war Arkansas has been revolutionizing its economy in an effort to balance its agriculture with industry. At long last the tremendous potentials of the State's great natural resources, (which include the only United States diamond mine) are being recognized. "Land of opportunity" say all Arkansas car license plates; "Arkansas is opportunity" say the Little Rocklans and a host of former GI's have returned to seize their share. The statistics sparkle; some samples:

In 1939 the State had 1,178 manufacturing firms—now there are almost 4,000 with a growing list of big names. (A G-M division just opened an aluminum auto-parts pilot plant near Malvern.) Last year the value of manufactured goods hit nearly a billion dollars; lumber production hit one and one-half billion feet (could hit three). In 1939 Arkansas produced $11,500,000 worth of furniture—last year it nearly doubled that amount. Fifty percent of every tax dollar is going for schools. Little Rock is having the greatest increase in housing of any city its size. Vigorous healthy growth is evident everywhere—you can almost hear it.

Must We Change Our Mining Laws?—Report of the Chairman of the Public Lands Subcommittee on the Conference on Revision of United States Mining Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 27, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a determined effort on the part of some of the Government departments to abrogate the mine lode location law and in the place of this law enact a mineral leasing system to include not only the nonmetallic minerals but also the nonferrous metals of all classes such as gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc—and thereby take away one of our last remaining birthrights to procure and own any of the natural resources in the public lands.

Before making any of these proposed changes in our mining laws, Congress should give thoughtful consideration to the effect such a plan would have on the development of our mining industry and the utilization of the Nation's mineral resources.

Only recently, I was informed that leasers had been successful in taking over all the known nitrate deposits in the public lands, and thus had a monopoly, and were charging exorbitant prices for nitrate and nitrate fertilizer.

The whole program of the changes proposed in our mining laws by these Government departments has been the subject of an investigation reported in the Hearings on the Conference on Revision of United States Mining Laws, pursuant to House Resolution 66. The report and recommendations made in connection with the hearings by myself as chairman of the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining is presented herewith:

REPORT OF THE CHAIRMAN OF THE SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON MINING TO THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS

Hon. J. HARDIN PETERSON,
Chairman, Committee on Public Lands,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN PETERSON: I have the honor to report to the members of the House Committee on Public Lands the findings of the joint investigation conducted by the members of the Public Lands Subcommittee and the representatives of the Bureau of Land Management concerning the development of mineral deposits on the public lands, and the effect of the suggested changes in the provisions of the Federal mining laws proposed in the memorandum recently issued by the Bureau of Land Management.

The transcript of the record of the joint hearings held in Spokane, Wash., on October 17 and 18, 1949, together with addenda and mining illustrations, are submitted herewith for the record of the Public Lands Committee and the consideration of Congress.

Mining in all its branches ranks second in our basic industries. The development of the Nation's mining industry since colonial times, when the mother country, England, forbade the American Colonies to manufacture so much as a horseshoe or horseshoe nail, has outstripped mining in every other country in the world.

To the constructive Government policy that gave this country its liberal mining laws, which stimulated the development and utilization of our mineral resources, must be credited in a large measure the successful defense of our country, the preservation of our Government, and the present preeminent position this Nation has attained among world powers.

No other nation, with the possible exception of Canada, enjoys the constructive and liberal mining laws that foster mining and protect the rights of their citizens to go upon the public domain to seek, acquire, and utilize mineral deposits.

The mining laws enacted in 1872 established the rules and regulations by which our citizens could go into the unsurveyed and unexplored rugged mountain sections of the Western States to search for, acquire, and perfect their rights to their newly discovered mineral wealth by staking mining claims which were theirs to hold as long as they complied with Government regulations.

The plan embodied in these Government laws has worked so well that mining flourishes in every State where minerals have been discovered, and the Nation's factories and industries are abundantly supplied with the minerals and metals used in the fabrication of the vast assortment of things used in every branch of human endeavor.

It is now proposed to modify and change the provisions of the existing laws, as set forth in a memorandum recently issued by the Department of Interior.

Without changing the mining laws, there should be a turn to the Government policy that has been followed in the past, of fostering and assisting mining development. If the location work and annual assessment work requirements are complied with, the rights and enterprise of our citizens to own, develop and patent mining claims will be protected, and mining development on public land will be encouraged and the development of the Nation's mining industry will be stimulated.

The Government's constructive policy as enacted in the provisions of the Federal mining laws were designed to encourage the search for mineral deposits and stimulate mine development. This plan has been carried out by giving any of its citizens the right to locate a mining claim on public land by performing 10 feet of discovery work on each claim staked and the right to hold possession of the same by expending $100 annually in labor or improvement, and the further right to acquire title to each claim or group of mining claims on which $500 has been expended, and fulfilling the provisions of the Government requirement by making a final payment of $5 per acre or fraction of an acre contained in each mining claim patented to the applicant.

Laws suspending the requirements for the performance of the annual assessment work on unpatented mining claims were enacted by the Congress for the protection and temporary relief of mining claim owners in meeting impossible labor conditions as a result of the war emergency and depressed financial conditions. This emergency relief measure was not intended to be and should not be a permanent Government policy. With the expiration of this temporary law and the restoration of the requirements for the performance of the annual assessment work on unpatented mining claims, much of the uncertainty as to title will be removed, and the stimulus to mining development will be restored.

In considering the conditions affecting the acquisition and holding of mining claims, and the proposed change in the Government's policy and provisions of the mining laws presented in the memorandum of the Department of Interior, it appears that the experience gained in the development of the Nation's mining resources and the facts relating to geological conditions and the uncertainty as to the location, extent and character of mineral deposits in underground vein structures should be taken into consideration, as well as the conditions to be met in financing, exploring, equipping and operating a new mining property to the producing stage by owners of moderate means. It is urged that the salient facts should be taken into account by those in Government departments responsible for the formulation of Government policies in planning for utilization of the mining resources in the public lands.

Rarely do we find pay ore in the outcrop of a mineralized vein where these surface exposures have been weathered for millions of years. Attention is called to the fact that some of the veins containing the richest copper at depth in Butte are exposed and can be seen and traced in the surface in the railway cuts, and contain no ore of value in these surface exposures.

We know that the deep explorations of the mineralized veins in Butte, Mont., and in the Coeur d'Alene mining district in north Idaho, have encountered literally hundreds of extensive and extremely rich ore bodies of copper, lead, zinc, and occasionally silver ore literally thousands of feet below the surface.

Outcrops or traces of mineralized veins in our public lands are usually found on steep hillsides in rugged, mountainous country where the prospector or finder must search out the course of his vein and the existence of ore deposits that may exist in the underlying rock formations, in many cases covered over with a dense growth of brush and timber, and, in most places, overlaid with deep deposits of loose earth and gravel.

The plan usually followed in exploring a mineralized vein by the locator, who in most cases is a man of limited means, is to follow the vein into the hillside with a mine tunnel, with the result, in most cases, that while further development is encouraged, little or no pay ore is encountered in the mineralized contents of the vein. After the first tunnel has been extended at some length, it may be found advisable to explore the vein at a deeper level. Accordingly a second tunnel is driven farther down the hillside where the mineralization in the veins may be found to contain a series of submarginal ore bodies within and along the vein without the discovery of pay ore. Indications in the vein may encourage the owner to look for richer ore in the lower horizons of the vein by driving a still lower tunnel, or sinking a shaft and opening the lower levels in the mine by driving a series of tunnels on levels deeper and deeper underground, where water may complicate mining difficulties.

Once the exploration of a vein structure is undertaken by a locator or a group of investors of limited means, in the hope of developing a paying mine, these owners may continue to work their claims year after year, spending their money to equip and explore their mining properties which usually consist of a group of unpatented mining claims. Until ore is found in paying quantities, these owners can ill afford to divert their limited funds, available to continue their search for pay ore, to finance the expensive process of patenting a group of unproven mining claims and shoulder the burden of paying real-estate taxes on land where paying ore may not exist.

The proposed change in the mining laws that would force owners of unpatented mining claims to make cash outlays for costly mining patents at the end of 3 years or forfeit all the work that has been done, and the money that has been expended in exploring a vein structure in unpatented mining claims on public lands, undertaken in good faith by men of limited means in the hope and expectation of developing a paying mine, is impractical and unfair, and will seriously retard the development and utilization of our mineral resources.

It is stated by the Bureau of Land Management that "In practice most mining claims are not located for mining purposes."

When consideration is given to the cost of labor in doing the prescribed 10 feet of discovery work, and the annual assessment work of $100 as a requisite of obtaining and holding each unpatented mining claim, and the further requirement to be met in obtaining title by mine patent that $500 of work must be done on each claim or group of mining claims, with outlays to be made for costly surveys and legal service, and a final payment to the Federal Government of $5 for each acre or fraction of an acre embraced in a patented mining claim, we find the effort and expense of obtaining title to the 20 acres comprised in a mining claim is on the average more costly than obtaining title to Government land than under other provisions of law providing for the acquisition of public land.

The tax revenue received from building and improvements placed on an unpatented mining claim, and the real estate taxes on patented mining claims paid each year to the county and State where the claims are located, seems to be completely overlooked. Taxes that go to support schools, roads, and other State and county activities, as well as income taxes received by the Federal Government from those owning or employed on this class of property, should be taken into account.

In considering the benefits received by the schools, the county and State governments from the disposal of the land and timber, if any, the miner may obtain and utilize in developing his mining claim, contrasted with the benefit derived from the disposal of national forest timber exchanged with privately owned lumber companies for denuded cut-over stump lands in a plan which operates to take this privately owned land off the tax rolls and deprive the schools of their 25 percent of the proceeds received under the provisions of existing law from cash sales of national forest timber, it appears the benefits derived from the mining claims and patented mining property far outweigh the benefits derived by the Government and the American people from this forest program.

In California where Government officials are obstructing mining development by contesting mine locations and mine patent applications in the national forest on every pretext, many of these mining locations have been staked in worthless brushlands. We learn that in making land exchanges, the Forest Service has openly induced the lumber companies to retain the mineral rights in the cut-over lands traded to the Government for standing timber, so the prospector could be barred from these reacquired lands for the reason the minerals was in private ownership.

In considering the use of public domain for the propagation and protection of wildlife and for public recreation, we find there is little interference with wildlife and recreation by the miner and prospector in the staking and development of mining claims, which are, for the most part, in isolated areas where the public and game can range over the surface at will. It is only after paying ore is developed and large mining operations take over, that industry replaces the wilds that had been frequented occasionally by vacationists and wildlife in its migration.

In weighing the benefits that accrue to the people of this country between the conservation of wildlife and recreational areas and the developments and utilization of our mineral resources, it may be pointed out that both Manchuria and Ethiopia abound in areas suitable for recreation with an abundance of wildlife, but when these nations failed to utilize the mineral resources and develop their mining industry, they were helpless when attacked and were despoiled by the invader. Under our system of development of our resources, a balance is maintained between industrial utilization and the conservation of wildlife and recreational uses.

In considering the problems of the Forest Service, and the list of alleged fraudulent mining locations in California, presented by the Bureau of Land Management, it seems that there has been a conflict between mining development and forest conservation, with mining getting the worst of it, due to the obstructive program being followed by local Forest Service officials. It develops that if the outcrop of mineralized veins and lodes which the prospectors were seeking to locate did not contain paying ore where an outcrop was exposed, these veins were simply declared nonmineral by the representative of the Forest Service, and by his dicta, they were nonmineral, with the result that the exploration and utilization of indicated underlying mineral deposits are effectively stopped.

The same rule could have been applied to most of the outcrops of the veins of many of the Nation's famous ore producers that contained little in the way of pay ore in the outcrop which later have been developed into big mines by deeper exploration. For instance, the United Verde Extension, the New Cornelia, the Polaris, the original Anaconda at Butte, the Hercules, the Independence on Cripple Creek, and thousands of other mines scattered all over the world.

We know that the autocratic and restrictive policy of the Forest Service officials in dealing with mining development throughout the West has given rise to the unpopularity of bureaucratic control.

The record discloses that the Forest Service attempted to set up a mine-leasing program for the mining of nonferrous metals in administering the lands reacquired under the Weeks law, and had printed for distribution rules and regulations for leasing these lands for the extraction of metals and nonmetallic minerals but for some reason the book containing these rules and regulations was withdrawn and the leasing scheme was abandoned.

While the Federal Government is spending millions of dollars to construct access logging roads to isolated timber areas within the national forests, very little, if anything, is being done to build mine-access roads to isolated mining districts in the national forests and mineralized public-land areas. In contrast to this neglectful policy as to mining, our neighbor, Canada, on the north appears to be going the limit in encouraging and assisting the development of its mining resources by enacting liberal mining laws by providing geological advice, building mine access trails and roads, and maintaining a liberal and constructive policy, governing the issuance and marketing of mining securities and has outstripped this country in the development and utilization of their mining resources, with a stimulating effect on Canada's national economy.

We learn that when Canada expected and prepared for a severe financial recession during the depression years in this country, the inflow of mining investment capital and the outflow of mine production buoyed and sustained Canada's national economy, and spared the Dominion much of the financial distress experienced at the time in other countries.

The Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management should be relieved of the proprietary complex. Government policies should be formulated and laws enacted that will convince the officials of these Federal departments of the intent of Congress to follow a policy of preserving and safeguarding the right of the individual citizen to acquire, develop, and utilize the natural resources in the public domain, which have been intrusted to the custody and administration of these agencies of the Federal Government.

The separation of the surface and subsurface rights of mining claims is impractical and unworkable. The locator or owner of a mining claim or group of mining claims seeks the discovery and development of pay ore, and in making underground explorations requires surface areas for the disposal of the excavated material. He requires room to construct the necessary mine buildings. When pay ore is developed he requires large surface areas for timberyards and the storage of material, mill sites, haulageways and miscellaneous passageways, and mine structures. It is out of reason to expect the operation of a producing mine to be confined to restricted surface areas.

The proposal to tie up as much as 2,560 acres of Government land in a mining district by a single owner or company in a geological mining claim that may embrace several units of 640 acres of land, without complying with the provisions of the mine location law, approaches the policy and plan being followed in granting wholesale mining concessions as practiced in European, African, and South American countries, and is contrary to sound public policy and is not in the interests of the prospector and the average American citizen and will operate to deprive them of their rights to locate, develop, and procure title to mineral deposits in unappropriated public lands.

This proposed change in the mining law could be used by special interests to tie up all the public land in an entire mining district for a long period of time to the exclusion of the miner prospector.

With the abrogation of the rights of a citizen to obtain possession or title to public lands under the Homestead Act or the stone and timber law, by the provisions of the Taylor Grazing Act we find that practically all of the remaining unappropriated land has been withdrawn and is now embraced within the national forests or Taylor grazing districts, and the only opportunity the average citizen has to obtain any public land is to find a mineral deposit and locate a mining claim, and now the Bureau of Land Management seeks to take away from the American citizen this last birthright.

RECOMMENDATIONS

In reviewing the Federal mining laws and the stimulating effect of the application of these laws on the progress that has been made in development and utilization of the Nation's mineral resources, we concur with the Hoover Commission in their recommendation which states: "The mineral patent system, under which outright ownership of mines can be acquired, has remained unchanged since its enactment on May 10, 1872. Under it, prospecting of the public domain has been extensive. Protection has been assured to claims on which a discovery has been made while exploration and development to establish the value of the discovery were carried on. The discoverer has been eventually rewarded by grant of title by patent to a holding of prescribed size. The system has worked well, and the committee favors the retention of location and patenting for the mineral deposits to which it now applies."

Your committee further recommends that in the light of present-day mining experience in the discovery of extensive ore deposits that have no surface exposure, we recommend that the validity of mining claims in mineralized districts or adjacent to proven mines be recognized without the requirement of discovery of valuable minerals, so that ground without surface exposures or other positive evidence of ore or other valuable mineral deposits can be acquired and explored under the provisions of the Federal mining laws.

To avoid confusion and uncertainty concerning the status of the appropriations of public lands we further recommend that the provisions of of the Federal mining laws be amended to provide that mine location notices filed for record with the county recorder, after being recorded in the county where the mining claims are located, be forwarded to the nearest Federal land office for recording with the Bureau of Land Management.

In recognition of the fact that the greater part of the mineralized areas of the public lands in rugged and inaccessible mountainous areas of the country are embraced within the boundaries of the national forests and that the development of these mines is dependent in a large measure on the policy of the Forest Service, we respectfully recommend that a division of mining be established within the Forest Service in charge of competent mining executives or experienced mining engineers, so that the Government's mining resources, discovered and undiscovered, within the national forest land may be given proper consideration in the administration of the national forests and the allocation of funds appropriated for the utilization and development of the natural resources within the national forest.

Recognizing the need for an active, prosperous, and productive mining industry as a safeguard to the national defense, we recommend and urge the restoration of a liberal and constructive legislative and administrative policy in fostering and encouraging the continued development of our mining industry.

Respectfully submitted.

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Chairman.

Cavendish W. Cannon, United States Minister to Syria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, last Friday the Senate confirmed the nomination of Cavendish W. Cannon, to be United States Minister to Syria and for other ambassadorial duties. The nomination was acted upon so rapidly that I did not get to say what I wanted to say about Mr. Cannon, one of Utah's distinguished citizens. He is highly regarded. He is a career diplomat, who has served faithfully and loyally, and with great efficiency in various parts of the earth. His last assignment was as Ambassador to Yugoslavia.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, two editorials, one entitled, "One of Utah's Famous Sons Is an Able Diplomat," published in the Salt Lake Tribune of September 14, 1950, and the other entitled "Cavendish W. Cannon Goes to Syria," published in the Salt Lake Deseret News of September 14, 1950. Both editorials deal with Mr. Cannon's appointment.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Salt Lake Tribune of September 14, 1950]

ONE OF UTAH'S FAMOUS SONS IS AN ABLE DIPLOMAT

The active and distinguished son of Utah who has received commendation and advancement in the diplomatic service during the past 2 years has been assigned to an important post in the Middle East, where his exceptional qualifications are especially needed.

As Ambassador to Yugoslavia he was instrumental in the establishment of friendly relations with the Tito regime and thus preventing the Soviet Union from adding another power to its galaxy of satellites. Recently he was assigned to a wider sphere of action as a member of the National Planning Board, a department that molds the foreign policy of this Republic.

According to a press dispatch from Washington, he was chosen for this position because of his wide and practical background of dealing with the peoples of eastern Europe and combating the influence of Soviet propagandists in that critical area. "The appointment gave him the title of chief political consultant for Europe and the Near East, although Mr. Cannon's assignment virtually covers the entire globe," said the announcement.

Word has just been received that Cavendish Wells Cannon, Utah's astute State Department trouble-shooter, has been given a new assignment to one of the hot spots of the globe. The President has nominated him to represent this country in Syria, where another uprising similar to that in Korea is threatened.

It is believed that Mr. Cannon will be able to avert another local war while police forces of the United Nations are trying to quell the communistic disturbance in Asia.

[From the Salt Lake Deseret News of September 14, 1950]

CAVENDISH W. CANNON GOES TO SYRIA

Cavendish W. Cannon, former United States Ambassador to Yugoslavia, and more recently a member of the planning board of the State Department in Washington, D. C., has been appointed as United States Minister to Syria.

Cavendish W. Cannon makes national and international news. He is one of the truly experienced and efficient career diplomats in the service of this Nation, and has been assigned some of the most tricky and difficult responsibilities that could fall on men in foreign service. He got his European background through 19 years in the United States consular service, much of which was as vice consul in Sofia, Bulgaria, during the thirties when this city was one of the most important listening posts on the Communist fringe.

His transfer to the State Department, and his service as Ambassador to Yugoslavia followed. He has represented the United States in vital conferences at Moscow, at Potsdam, and in London.

Of special personal interest is the fact that Cavendish Cannon grew up right here in Salt Lake City. He is a son of the late John Q. Cannon, long-time editor of the Deseret News, and a grandson of George Q. Cannon, formerly a member of the first presidency of the church.

His personal connections with Utah are interesting, but not nationally important. His Syrian appointment is of very great importance, as affairs in the Middle East are threatening to come to a boil, and a man of Cavendish Cannon's sound experience and proven judgment is needed in such a post.

Financial Help Now Essential to Nation's Medical Schools

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, in light of the recent third-round defeat in committee of legislation to provide urgently needed Federal aid to the medical and health-training institutions of our country, the following article entitled "Financial Help Now Essential to Nation's Medical Schools" by Dr. Howard A. Rusk, veteran New York Times medical reporter, New York Sunday Times, September 17, 1950, is particularly relevant reading for Members of the Congress, and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues. The article follows:

FINANCIAL HELP NOW ESSENTIAL TO NATION'S MEDICAL SCHOOLS—COLLEGE FACILITIES KEEP UP WITH POPULATION, BUT TRAINING COSTS GO UP MORE RAPIDLY

(By Howard A. Rusk)

This month about 7,000 fortunate young men and women will start their first year of medical school. They are fortunate because they were chosen from the 24,434 persons who applied last spring to an average of three or four different medical schools.

Upon first glance it appears paradoxical that cries are heard in many quarters for more and more physicians, and legislation is being enacted to draft doctors for the Armed Forces, while thousands of prospective young students are denied the opportunity of studying medicine.

This view was taken last January at a meeting in Cincinnati of the academic deans of several colleges and universities whose actions indicated that they believed there was a serious shortage of doctors that there was insufficient competition to maintain a high quality of education or medical service and that research suffers because thousands of qualified young men and women do not get into medical school. The problem, however, is not so simple as this.

Today in the United States there are 72 medical schools and 7 schools of basic medical sciences. These 79 schools had a total enrollment of 25,103 students last year. This is compared with 66 class A medical schools with an enrollment of 12,530 students in 1910; 70 class A medical schools with an enrollment of 12,559 in 1920; 76 approved medical schools with a total enrollment of 21,597 in 1930, and 77 approved medical schools with 21,271 students in 1940.

COST OF EDUCATION MOUNTS

With the increase in the number of physicians, there has been a disproportionate increase in the cost of medical education. Comparative data show that the educational expense of medical schools nearly doubled between 1941 and 1948. In that period the depression of the 1930's and later increased taxation resulted in less private funds available for endowment.

One large medical school estimates that it now costs nearly $14,000 to train a medical student for 4 years. Tuition fees covered 70 percent of the costs of medical education in 1910, but they account for less than 25 percent at present, for, obviously, the current high costs of medical education cannot be borne by the students. The council on medical agencies and hospitals of the American Medical Association has reported recently that budgets of medical schools for 1950–51 totaled about $76,500,000. This is an increase of $19,500,000, or 42 percent, in the last 4 years.

Recently the House Interstate Commerce Committee voted 9 to 8 to table a bill providing Federal aid for the operation of medical schools and for construction and equipment. Following this action, Representative ANDREW BIEMILLER, Democrat, of Wisconsin, introduced a new bill (H. R. 9508) that provides $15,000,000 a year for a 5-year period for construction grants to educational institutions in the health fields. This bill, which was tabled, side-steps the controversial issue that Federal grants for operations might lead to Federal control. The Senate has already passed a bill providing for both construction and operational grants.

Even if unlimited funds were made available for medical education, this alone would not make it possible for all who wish to attend medical school, for there are the interrelated problems of laboratory facilities, clinical training, teaching personnel and other factors that make medicine the most complex of professional courses.

SCHOOL FACILITIES KEEP PACE

Despite these difficulties, the opportunity to study medicine in approved medical schools has practically doubled in the last 40 years, and has more than kept pace with the growth in population. This week's issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association reports that the number of freshmen medical students increased last year by 5.3 percent to 7,042. This is a 17 percent increase over the average-size freshman class in the 10 years preceding World War II.

The shortage of doctors is real, but not as acute as some alarmists would indicate. The new doctor draft legislation is for the purpose of providing an equitable system of service in the Armed Forces, and not primarily because of an over-all shortage of doctors. With the closing of a number of inferior, second-rate medical schools during the period of 1904–14, the number of physicians to 100,000 population in the United States declined from 149 in 1909 to 125 in 1929. Since 1929, the ratio has risen steadily, until today it is 133.

At the same time, however, specialization, increased research, higher standards of care, better distribution of services, and new programs such as industrial medicine and public health have created a need for more doctors. As our national income is at the highest level in history, more people have the funds to buy the medical service that they need.

It is obvious that if the medical schools are to maintain even the present quality of medical education, much less expand to meet the present shortage of doctors, they must have financial help. In view of the present national emergency, differences must be resolved and action taken, for some type of Federal aid is an urgent necessity.

Appointment of Edgar B. Brossard as Member of the United States Tariff Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Brossard Nomination," published in the Washington Post of September 15, 1950, commenting on the nomination of Edgar Bernard Brossard to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission. Mr. Brossard's nomination was confirmed last Friday.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BROSSARD NOMINATION

President Truman was well advised to reappoint Edgar B. Brossard to the Tariff Commission. The nomination had been held up for many weeks and rumors had spread that it would not be made. Dr. Brossard was an economist for the Commission before he was advanced to a commissionership 25 years ago. Since then he has gained a vast knowledge of the country's economic problems and an invaluable experience in fact-finding and laying the economic groundwork for governmental policies. In addition to his work at the Commission, he served on the executive committee of the interdepartmental group responsible for the scientific and cultural cooperative program—the forerunner of point 4. He was also a delegate to the Geneva and Habana Conferences at which the charter for the International Trade Organization was worked out. The high quality of his work is attested by the endorsement given him by many agricultural, business and labor organizations and by Members of the Senate and House of both political parties from the 11 Western States.

While the Tariff Commission is a bipartisan body, its work calls for economists and expert fact finders. That Dr. Brossard, a Republican member, has worked primarily as an economist interested in the national welfare is indicated by the widespread, bipartisan support accorded him. This is no time to lose such experienced men from the public service. It is to be hoped that the Senate will confirm the nomination before adjourning.

Another Look at the Tariff Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOM STEED
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, I include herewith an article appearing in the current issue of the journal of the United Cement, Lime, and Gypsum Workers Union, A. F. of L., by O. R. Strackbein, chairman of the National Labor-Management Council on Foreign Trade Policy which deals with the Nation's existing tariff problems.

This is an objective and thoughtful discussion of an important issue, one bound to become even more important when the present emergency ends and we turn back to normal times.

The article follows:

In order properly to understand the tariff question, it is necessary to understand the reason for trade among the nations in the first place. The fact is that nations do not produce all of their requirements in the way of goods and commodities. There is the further fact that some nations produce some items which other nations need but which the latter themselves do not produce. On the other hand, the nations that have a scarcity of particular products may produce other products which other nations require for their own economy. Under those circumstances, the natural basis of trade exists.

The first natural development then is for each nation to import those commodities which they themselves do not produce or produce in a quantity which is not sufficient for their requirements. The theory of free trade, in fact, is based on this kind of disposition of resources among the various nations of the world.

The basic concept of free trade consists of each country producing those commodities for which it is best fitted and to import from other countries commodities which the other countries produce to better advantage. The theory is that in this way each nation will devote its economic energies to the production of the commodities and the goods for which it is best fitted and to draw from other countries those goods and commodities for which they are best fitted. Assuming that all nations act on this principle, all the peoples in this world would be devoting their energies to the end of greatest possible production in each country.

This is an idealistic economic concept and was propagated particularly by the British political economists in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. England, under this theory, became the workshop of the world. By drawing their raw materials from other countries and taking them into England and fabricating them and then exporting the finished products to other countries which were not industrialized, England was able to build up a very strong and prosperous economy. This theory which fitted so well the British economy was in a sense imported into the United States and was taught in the colleges and universities and particularly in the schools of economics of such institutions.

It became apparent in a very short period of time, however, that the United States was in a different position from that of England in the days when she was the workshop of the world. The United States was a young country and had few, if any, industries and imported most of the manufactured and finished products which she needed from England and the other European countries. In order to build up her own industry, it was found necessary to erect certain barriers against imports from abroad in order to protect the industries in this country which were only getting under way and did not have the advantages of the skills and machinery which had already been developed overseas.

Under this system of protection, the United States did develop in time into an industrial nation. There was some inconvenience to this system, however, because in the United States industrial activity was confined considerably to the northern part of the country. The Southern States were primarily agricultural in character and it soon dawned upon them that the prices which they paid for manufactured products produced in the Northern States were somewhat high because of the very fact that the industries were protected by a high tariff. As a result, the Southern States tended more and more toward the idea of free trade, while the northern industrial States insisted upon protection.

BECOMES POLITICAL

It was not long before the tariff became a political issue upon this basis. In the latter half of the nineteenth century, the Democratic Party, as everyone knows, associated itself with the free-trade philosophy, whereas the Republican Party was dedicated to the idea of protection. This political division continued through the end of the century and on each occasion that the Republicans came into power, a new tariff bill was brought up and, in general, the tendency was either to increase the tariff or to bring additional items under tariff protection. On the other hand, when the Democrats came into power, their first step was to lower the tariffs existing at the time they came into power.

This alternation of high and low tariffs continued through the Woodrow Wilson administration, through the Coolidge and Hoover administrations. With the advent of the New Deal, the previous philosophy of free trade was again embraced by the Democratic Party, but on a somewhat different basis from the previous system. The idea was launched that world trade could be freed of barriers by a system of reciprocal trade agreements. Since 1934 some forty-odd trade agreements have been negotiated by the United States, and the tariffs on the whole and on the average have been decreased by some 50 percent.

The question now arises whether these tariff reductions have gone too far or whether they have not been carried to the extent that they might be, or whether, having gone far enough, they should now be halted.

FREE TRADE

Going back now to the theory of free trade, there are several observations that may be made with respect to the United States. In the first place, the United States does honor the principle of free trade to the total of two-thirds of its imports each year. During the past 40 years, from 60 to 65 percent of our total imports have come in free of duty. The items that are free of duty consist largely of raw materials and other commodities which are not easily produced in the United States or could not be produced without sacrificing economic principles. Among the items that are imported free of duty are such commodities as coffee, tin, rubber, bananas, undressed furs, hides and skins, newsprint.

On the other hand, there are items which are produced abroad but which are also produced in this country, but upon which we do insist upon having some tariff protection. Now, what is the basis for this protection? The basis lies in the fact that the advantage which other countries have competitively over the United States in the production of these goods, lies not in any advantages of soil or climate or skill in the country of origin, but rather in the fact that other countries, without exception, pay lower wages than are paid in the United States. In other words, the principles of free trade as enunciated by Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, and other political economists do not really call upon us to import items in which other countries merely possess an unfair economic advantage. So long as the advantage enjoyed by other countries consists in the mere fact that they pay lower wages than those prevailing in this country, it cannot be said that we violate the principles of free trade when we seek to place those commodities on a competitive parity in our own market.

The question remains whether or not the competitive advantage which is derived from lower wages than those prevailing in this country is really one that can be justified. It is usually said that the consumers in this country are entitled to the cheaper products which are thus made available to them, permitting them to make certain savings in their dollars and to take these savings and buy other commodities. In this connection it should be said that the political economists who enunciated and elaborated on the theory of free trade did not take into consideration the disparity in wages prevailing in the different nations. No thought appears to have been given at all to this differential.

The very New Deal, which espoused the reciprocal trade agreements program was responsible in great part for making this country and perhaps other countries, wage conscious. This consciousness was carried to the extent that one of the prime purposes of the national minimum wage legislation was to protect those employers who pay high rates in wages, against the type of competition which bases its advantages on lower wage payments. Employers who engaged union labor found themselves at a great disadvantage when they were exposed to competition from employers who were not unionized or who paid in some instances sweatshop wages. It was realized that high wage standards could not be maintained under such conditions. As a result, the idea of establishing national minimum wages made headway and was finally enacted into law.

PARITIES ESTABLISHED

About the same time attention was given to the fact that farm prices had a tendency to fall below the price level of manufactured goods. As a result, the principle of price parities was established and was recognized as a national institution. The system of price supports was enacted and is still in effect. Thus our economy was bolstered both in the field of wages and in the field of farm prices. Neither the industrial labor nor the agricultural segment of our economy was to be allowed to fall out of balance and thus upset the economy as a whole.

Strangely enough, our economy was to be exposed without benefit of such protective measures to the undermining competitive influences of imports which derived their principal advantage from low-wage scales. Thus the domestic producer is protected from the influences of low wages paid within our own country, but is to be subjected to unfair competition from abroad. Why it should be thought necessary to set up protective measures within our own country while exposing our producers to the same kind of competition from other countries, often in a much more serious form than any experienced within our own country, is something of a mystery. As economic philosophy, this seems to be entirely contradictory.

In answering this charge of contradiction, the supporters of the trade agreements program maintain that the United States can outproduce all the other countries of the world and therefore has nothing to fear from foreign competition. It is true, of course that the United States can and does outproduce other countries in the mass-production industries. In the production of automobiles, steel, electrical equipment and appliances we have no peer anywhere in the world. However, there are numerous smaller industries which supply us with a wide variety of products that we need in this country and which we consume from coast to coast, that do not have the advantage of mass production. This is simply in the nature of the case. Consumption is not sufficiently large to permit the installation of mass-production systems or the variety of the products is so great that they do not lend themselves to this type of production. We have only to mention such products as toys, scientific instruments, pottery, glassware, hardware, pharmaceutical items, and many others to be reminded that not all of our industries consist of production line types. In other words, the advantages, the economic advantages, of mass production do not extend to all of our industries. It is in this wide variety of miscellaneous industries that the impact of foreign competition makes itself felt.

Yet the fact remains that these industries pay wages that compare very favorably with those paid in the mass-production industries. Unless some form of protection is granted these industries, it is quite obvious that they will not be able to withstand the kind of competition they will be called upon to meet if the tariffs are cut below a point which will guarantee competitive parity in this country with imported products. Typically the measures of protection which we have historically used have consisted principally of the tariff either in the form of ad valorem rates or in the form of specific rates or a combination of the two. Other nations have used many other forms of protection, among them import quotas, import licenses, exchange controls, barter arrangements, and many other related devices.

QUOTA BARRIERS

Our State Department is on record before all the world to the effect that quotas are the worst form of trade barriers. Thus the United States has condemned out-of-hand all forms of quota regardless of their character. This has been most unfortunate. It has been most unfortunate because quotas need not necessarily be restrictive of trade. They need not necessarily act as a trade barrier and can, in fact, be of great advantage to our own producers as well as foreign producers, and foreign exporters. I suggest that the State Department has taken an extremely narrow view of the case.

Quotas may be devised which bear a certain relation to past imports and past consumption and production in this country by the utilization of which products could be brought into this country without restricting their comparatively free flow. The device is very simple. I would propose that in suitable cases, many of which can be found, imports be limited to quantities which can be determined by reference to records of past years and then permit imports to continue, in direct proportion to consumption in this country.

YEAR IMPORTS

Assuming that during a representative past period 10 percent of a given item had been imported into this country, that is, 10 percent of the total consumption, then 10 percent of total consumption would be permitted to be imported in future years. It is obvious that as consumption in this country increased imports would also increase. The great advantage of this proposal lies in the fact that it would remove from imports the effects which are most feared by our producers and by our wage earners. This fear is the fear of the effects of low-priced imports upon our own price structure. In a buyer's market the ability of foreign exporters to sell in this country in competition with our own producers at prices lower than those which are offered by our own manufacturers can be very disruptive of the market.

It is the unkown factor of how great a supply is available abroad for shipping to this country at low prices that does the damage. A quota limitation would remove this question, this doubt, this fear, and would permit our producers to plan for the future and to establish production schedules accordingly. They could systematically plan their plant expansions, renewal of equipment, and other outlays of capital. When, on the other hand, it is not known how large a supply is available or potentially available from abroad, it is extremely difficult to plan for future production and for future plant expansions and the reequipment of plants and factories. All of this has a depressing effect on the economy. It affects employment; it affects wages; and it affects the hours of work. If, in place of this uncertainty, it were known definitely that in any case no more than a certain percentage of the total consumption would be imported, then the producers would be free of this fear and uncertainty. Therefore, I say that the percentage quota system should be established in those commodities where such quota systems could be instituted with comparative ease.

There is little question that many industries in this country would be willing to accept quotas which would provide for a larger volume of imports than have previously come in, in return for the certainty that the quota limitation would establish. In many instances they might even be willing to have the tariff removed entirely.

This type of quota would have the additional great advantage of overcoming one of the great defects of any tariff. It is one of the notable facts of foreign trade that not all nations operate on the same economic level. Therefore, the competitive impact of the different countries upon the importing nations may vary greatly. Thus a rate of duty of 30 percent might establish competitive parity if applied to products, imported let us say, from Canada. On the other hand, on the same product, a rate of 3 or 4 or 500 percent might be necessary in order to produce similar competitive parity in this country on imports coming from some other country in which the labor standards are far below those of Canada. In such instances there is no single tariff rate that can perform the function for which tariffs have been established. Under those conditions, the percentage import quota would fill the gap and would very admirably perform the function in which the tariff has so completely failed.

CHANGED ECONOMY

Coming back now to the claim of the consumers to low prices; one thing should be made clear and that is that the United States economy today is not the United States economy of 1939. Today we are operating on an economic plateau. We have a national indebtedness of some $260,000,000,000 and a national budget ranging from forty to forty-five billions of dollars. To sustain this sort of structure of obligations and debts, it is absolutely necessary that the annual national income of this country be maintained well over the $200,000,000,000 mark. This cannot possibly be done unless prices are maintained at or near their present levels. This, in turn, cannot be accomplished unless wages remain high; unless production remains unusually high; unless fair profits are maintained and unless employment continues at the highest levels. Therefore, to say that the consumer is entitled to lower prices through imports of cheap goods from abroad, simply does not stand up.

The consumer, too, must make his contribution to this vast burden that we are carrying. The consumer is no more entitled to cheap prices based on cheap labor abroad than he is entitled to cheap prices based upon slave labor abroad. It is simply a matter of degree.

All in all, the chief protective problem of the United States arises from the fact that the United States is unique among all the nations of the world in the great good fortune of our country which lies in the fact that we have attained the highest standard of living in the entire world. This makes trade between us and other nations something quite different from trade among nations that are of an equal economic level. This fact has not been given sufficient acceptance and sufficient recognition. It makes of protection not a matter of selfishness or the promotion of selfish interests, but the maintenance of something which we have attained and for which all other countries are striving and to the attainment of which we can help them best and most effectively if we succeed in maintaining this high standard of living. Clearly, success in holding our unique position is dependent upon a reasonable degree of protection.

Marshall and China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, the editorial in the Christian Science Monitor of September 16 entitled "Marshall and China."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARSHALL AND CHINA

While it seems to us that what General Marshall can accomplish as Defense Chief is of overriding importance, a debate on China policy and his part in it might well clear the air. Let's hear the objections of Senators TAFT and WHERRY—and replies to them. The better Americans understand what has happened in China the better they will be prepared to deal with the future in the Far East.

It is easy now to point out some of the mistakes. The first was in continuing to consider Russia as an ally. The second was in believing that the Chinese Reds could be led to cooperate in a civil-war truce and the formation of a coalition government. General Marshall was sent to China late in 1945 as a mediator. He was also authorized to put pressure on Chiang Kai-shek to reform his government and end the civil war.

After a year's efforts General Marshall concluded that it was neither possible to make peace with the Communists nor to reform the Nationalist regime. But the effect on those efforts was to weaken the Chiang regime—which lost some military advantages in the truce, some face through American willingness to treat with the Reds, and some aid Washington withheld in endeavors to force reforms. For this the Truman-Acheson policy must bear responsibility.

But any fair judgment must weigh alternative policies. The chief of these was General Wedemeyer's plan for an American protectorate. That would have meant active, large-scale military intervention in China. It would have virtually made China an American colony and lost for the United States the moral position of a nonimperialist.

Moreover, an operation of such scope in Asia would almost surely have greatly curtailed American anti-Communist efforts in Europe. It might have foreclosed the Marshall plan and invited the disaster of Red political triumphs which so closely threatened France and Italy 3 years ago.

To assume that something less than the Wedemeyer plan would have done the job in China is to miss the nature of the change in that country. To imagine that the Marshall mission was the cause of the Communist triumph is to forget that America was dealing with a social revolution among 450,000,000 people It is to forget that Chiang received $2,000,000,000 in postwar aid, especially arms which quickly fell into Red hands. It is to forget that popular rejection of a corrupt oligarchy had more to do with Nationalist defeat than any Communist military operations.

Debate on the Marshall role in China may well point up official mistakes. But it ought also to expose both the partisan insinuation that Washington sold out to Moscow and the shallow supposition that China can be rewon by backing a discredited and exiled regime. The genuine issue is not whether but how to combat the spread of Communist imperialism.

Numerous Misconceptions on Taxing Excess Profits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SPESSARD L. HOLLAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an excellent article entitled "Numerous Misconceptions on Taxing Excess Profits," written by Lawrence L. McKenna, and published in the editorial section of the Sunday Star.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NUMEROUS MISCONCEPTIONS ON TAXING EXCESS PROFITS—LEADS TO INFLATION INSTEAD OF DEFLATION; DOESN'T STOP WAR CONTRACT PROFITEERING

(By Lawrence L. McKenna)

Congress has no power greater than the power to tax—unless it is the power to spend. Through the use of these it can either create or destroy. And although they are sometimes used for various purposes, political and otherwise, which may be questioned, these powers were delegated to Congress by the framers of the Constitution so that the people might be assured that they would always be used for the purpose of strengthening the Nation by adequately providing for the defense of the country and the general welfare of the people.

Today, with the Nation embarked on a military enterprise the implications of which are so vast it is difficult for the majority of the people fully to comprehend, the Congress, in the exercise of these powers, is presented with the choice of (1) taxing and spending wisely with a view to strengthening the country militarily, economically and socially, or (2) merely taxing and spending expediently with a view to strengthening political positions of parties and individuals.

CONNALLY-O'MAHONEY PROPOSAL

The interim tax bill was presented to Congress originally as a bill designed to reduce taxes rather than increase them. But the Korean war so changed the fiscal environment of the Federal Government that this legislation, first proposed as a tax relief measure, became a bill aimed at increasing taxes.

This tax legislation originally called for a reduction in excise taxes which contemplated a net loss in revenue of $910,000,000 annually. But when the bill was referred to the Senate-House Conference Committee last week it carried provisions calling for increases in taxes which contemplated raising total revenues by at least $3,000,000,000 in the current fiscal year, and by at least $4,500,000,000 annually when the law becomes fully effective.

Although this proposed increase in taxes was deemed to be quite substantial, there nevertheless were Senators who pressed for including an excess-profits tax provision in the bill. Four amendments designed to accomplish this were proposed. The most important of these, and the one around which debates in Congress raged, was the so-called Connally-O'Mahoney amendment.

The Connally-O'Mahoney amendment proposed a virtual reenactment of the excess-profits law which was in effect during World War II. The only essential difference between the law proposed by this amendment and the law in effect during World War II was in the base established for computing the tax.

The World War II Excess-Profits Tax Act fixed the years 1937, 1938, and 1939, as the period during which profits of corporations might be regarded as normal. Under this act, all profits above the average of these years were deemed excess and hence taxable as such. On the other hand, the Connally-O'Mahoney amendment stipulated that 80 percent of the average corporate profits for the 4 years—1946, 1947, 1948, and 1949—was to be regarded as normal. All profits above this average were, under the amendment, deemed excess and taxable as such. As was the case in the World War II Excess-Profits Tax Act, this amendment provided a specific exemption of $10,000 for all corporations, and an additional exemption of $10,000 for corporations choosing the invested-capital formula instead of the 4-year average-profits base.

The two most important provisions in any excess-profits tax law are the base and the rate—that is, the formula upon which the tax is to be based and the rate at which the levy is to be imposed.

POPULAR MISCONCEPTIONS

The excess-profits law in effect during World War II fixed the 1937-39 period as the base. Profits during this period were deemed normal, according to this law. Therefore, all corporate profits above the level of the average profits of this period were considered excess profits and taxable as such. This law fixed the rate of taxation as 95 percent—that is, 95 percent of all profits above the level of the average of this 1937-39 period were siphoned off by the Federal Government as excess profits.

In the Connally-O'Mahoney amendment (which was rejected by the Senate—the base was fixed as 80 percent of the 4-year period 1946-49 and the rate was put at 85 percent. That is, all corporate profits above 80 percent of the level of the average profits of the 4 years, 1946-49, were to be deemed excess and taxable as such at the rate of 85 percent thereof.

There is no tax about which there is such an abundance of misinformation in nonexpert circles as there is regarding the excess-profits tax. Vast numbers of people believe that excess-profits taxes are levied on excess profits everywhere. Very few people realize that they are levies on the profits of corporations only. Indeed, the name excess-profits tax is a misnomer. This form of tax really should be called "corporate excess-profits tax," not merely "excess-profits tax." If it were, people may then understand that it applies solely to profit-making corporations.

There are some 383,000 profit-making corporations in the United States. During the 1941-45 World War II period, when an excess-profits tax was in effect, these corporations paid a total of $39,491,251,000 in so-call excess-profits tax to the Federal Government—in 1941 they paid $3,359,186,000; in 1942 it was $7,851,814,000, in 1943, $11,291,483,000, in 1944 $10,431,762,000 and in 1945 $6,557,006,000.

Under the Connally-O'Mahoney amendment, because of the ill-conceived base which this improvised amendment provided, not more than 20,000 of these 383,000 profit-earning corporations would have been compelled to pay an excess-profits tax. Since the large automobile industry, as well as the mammoth steel industry, have enjoyed abnormal profits during the base-period 1946-1949 stipulated in this amendment, corporations operating in these industries would have been called upon to pay only a very small amount had this amendment been adopted. Most revenue produced by it would have come from medium-sized and small corporations, and from industries which have not prospered during the postwar period.

In the course of the debates in the Senate on this Connally-O'Mahoney amendment, Senator GEORGE, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, told the Senate that an excess-profits tax law could not be intelligently written until hearings on it were held. "There is no one capable of writing an excess-profits-tax law without hearings," he said. It simply cannot be done. It is impossible to impose on the structure of the Excess-Profits Tax Act of World War II, or World War I, for that matter, a new excess profits tax act when conditions are not only different but when they are actually completely opposite to the conditions which existed when we formulated the Excess-Profits Act for World War II. * * *

"The difficulty about an excess-profits tax is this: An excess-profits tax which is no more than the changing of a base period, with an attempt to fit into an act which was passed at the beginning of World War II, is wholly inapplicable, because none of the relief proposals will fit into it, and the average credit formulas will not fit into it. Without relief provisions in an excess-profits tax, the result is one of the most harmful forms of taxation that could possibly be devised."

GREAT POLITICAL VALUE

It is generally believed—especially by many of those whose sons are called upon to face the enemy in battle—that an excess-profits tax must be imposed during wartime in order to stop wicked profiteers. And since such a policy is loudly applauded, it has great political value. But an excess-profits tax cannot stop wartime profiteering. The real way to curb excess profits (that is, profiteering on war contracts) is through the device known as a contract negotiation, which is a provision in all agreements with the Government under which all contracts for war materials carry a drastic stipulation giving the Government the right to reprice products contracted for.

Another popular view is that an excess-profits tax is deflationary. This, too, is a great fallacy. As a matter of fact, such a tax is perhaps the most inflationary type of tax that can be devised. It encourages corporations to be wasteful and extravagant. It causes them to spend money simply on the grounds that if they do not somehow spend it the Government will take it from them in taxes. Moreover, it creates its own inflationary money with which to pay the tax. Only insofar as it provides money which the Government would otherwise be compelled to raise through deficit financing is it a check on inflation. In every other respect it is inflationary.

However, such a tax has great psychological value during wartime. It also is a means of providing revenue. "I think," Senator GEORGE said, "that if military preparations continue on a large scale we will need it, both for psychological effect and primarily to get revenues."

Although there are many other and perhaps better methods of raising revenue (such as boosting corporate and individual tax above the presently proposed levels, or by boosting the excise tax—which the interim bill now before Congress originally proposed reducing—or maybe through imposition of a general sales tax), an excess-profits levy will be enacted early next year. It may even be effective retroactive to October 1—maybe to July 1—1950. Indeed, an excess-profits tax is inescapable—if for no other reason than on psychological grounds.

Warning that we face vastly more taxes, Senator MILLIKIN, Republican, of Colorado, said that no one is going to find an umbrella under which to shelter himself. Whether they are paid directly or indirectly is beside the point; we all must pay them. In emphasizing this, the Senator, in the course of the debates on the excess-profits taxes, said:

"If there are any implications in this debate that the adoption of an excess-profits tax is adequate to meet the expense of the military program, that, I respectfully suggest, is sheer fakery or ignorance. I mention this to remove from the debate—and, if not from the debate, from opinion outside the Senate—the thought that an excess-profits tax is the complete solution, that the rich corporations are going to pay for the war, and that others will not be called on to carry additional burdens."

The Perfect Leader

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "We Need the Perfect Leader," published in the Memphis Press-Scimitar of September 4, 1950, together with a letter which I have written to President Truman on the subject of this editorial.

There being no objection, the editorial and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE NEED THE PERFECT LEADER

We have shown what the perfect citizen is. We had only to quote the words found in the diary of Martin Treptow, an American soldier killed in the battle of Chateau Thierry in World War I.

"America must win this war. Therefore I will work; I will save; I will sacrifice; I will endure; I will fight cheerfully and do my utmost as if the whole struggle depended on me alone."

The perfect citizen is the man or woman who carries out Martin Treptow's resolution.

The perfect citizen requires the perfect leader; where can he be found?

The leader is already chosen by circumstances. He is the head of that one of the free nations which is potentially, though not yet actually, the most powerful on the globe.

He is Harry S. Truman, President of the United States.

In his hands destiny has placed this great issue—whether the free world shall survive, whether western civilization, even though it might win shall take such a beating that we shall face a new Dark Age, whether this Nation, never yet defeated, shall go down before a better prepared foe and yield world leadership to an evil power which imposes slavery.

Truman is our leader. What must he be and do that he shall meet the awful requirements of this hour—the greatest demand that has ever been made on a human leader?

Is Truman capable of becoming the perfect leader which we require for our survival?

Yes. What qualifications does he have?

He is willing to take responsibility; he doesn't dodge it or pass the buck.

He has good judgment, when he does not allow it to be clouded by politics, ideology, or a mistaken sense of loyalty to particular persons.

He has courage, as shown, for instance by his daring pronouncement of the policy that we would defend Greece and Turkey.

He has a strong physique and an untroubled mind.

He can walk with kings yet keep the common touch.

What must Truman do to use these qualifications to the utmost, to rise to the greatness that alone can meet this crisis?

He must give up politics.

He must give up the desire for a third term. He need not announce that decision, but he should follow no course dictated by third-term politics. (Might not Harry S. Truman be more influential as a former President who had retired with honor and vigor, than a third-term President who might crack under the strain?)

He should regard it as unimportant whether the Democratic Party wins in 1950 or 1952. If the free world and this Nation survives—and it will survive only if Harry S. Truman is wholly dedicated to that survival—the Democratic Party will survive along with it, none the worse in the long run though it should lose a particular election.

He should not make his swearing off of politics conditional on the Republicans doing the same thing. There is no single Republican leader who can make that decision, as Truman, head of a Democratic administration, can make it. (Besides for a President, even in normal times, the best politics is no politics; there is no way you can beat a perfect performance.)

He must not defend the tragic past mistakes in our foreign policy which led us to the situation we are in; they cannot be defended. But they can be wiped out by sound and great actions now.

He must abandon the policies which seem so unlike him and so inappropriate to his traditional American character, such as socialized medicine and deficit financing for other than defense.

He must substitute, for his fierce loyalty to particular persons, a fiercer loyalty to the hundreds of millions of living people who depend on him for their survival, for the billions yet unborn who depend on him to be cradled in a civilization it has taken centuries to build.

He must pray, and know that this whole Nation will join him in praying: "Not my will, but Thine, be done."

This hour of danger cries for the perfect leader. Only the resolution of Harry S. Truman, and the grace of God, can give him to us.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1950.

Hon. HARRY TRUMAN,
The President,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Dr. Charles E. Diehl, president emeritus of Southwestern University, Memphis, Tenn., sent me a copy of an editorial in the Memphis Press-Scimitar of September 4 by Edward J. Meeman, one of our great American editors.

I know that you do not have time to read many editorials, but this editorial so clearly states the aspirations of the American people during this critical time, and the confidence that thoughtful people have in you, that I do hope you will read it. I think that your recent speeches are definitely in line with the type of leadership this editorial envisions.

I am also sending you Dr. Diehl's letter to me, and I hope you will particularly read the second paragraph in this letter.

Respectfully,

Our Senior Citizens Are Home-Front Casualties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include an article which appeared in the September 16, 1950, edition of the Townsend National Weekly, written by the editor, Mr. George B. Fritz. This article points out that while public attention is focused on Korea our old folks are allowed to become home-front casualties.

KOREAN WAR TESTS ROLE OF AGED: WILL THEY BE CASUALTIES, TOO?

(By George Fritz)

CLEVELAND.—During World War II we learned that not all of the casualties took place in the fox holes and on the beachheads. A lot of people died a living death right here at home. The aged were the forgotten folks of that war. They were battle casualties along with the soldiers and sailors in the front lines.

When war comes strange things happen to the American dollar. Everybody needs more of them. Prices of food and clothing double or triple. And so everybody makes more money. Wages go way up. So do profits.

Everybody makes more money except the old people. They stay where they were before war broke out. The 3,000,000 on old-age assistance received just about the same checks in 1945, when prices reached their peak, as they did in the years before the war.

Their $45 old-age-assistance checks bought goods they could have purchased for about $20 in peacetime. The Government refused to grant them more. So they slowly starved. Their poverty grew more critical. They were the casulaties of the home front.

CALL IT POLICE ACTION, BUT IT'S STILL A WAR

Now we are in another war. Don't let anybody tell you that the fighting in Korea is merely "police action." You know we are at war. On paper, the aggressor is North Korea. In reality, the aggressor is the Soviet Union. The North Koreans, knowing full well that the United Nations would never stand for a war of invasion, would never have dared to fire the first shot without the backing of Russia. The North Koreans are supplied with Russian materials.

So the United States—and the United Nations—are warring with Russia even though no formal declaration has been made. That adds up to a long war. And the experts tell us that to win this one the Nation must be placed on an all-out wartime footing.

That means total mobilization of all our resources, human and material. It means that every last person in this country must contribute to the winning of the peace. We can't do that if we have millions of casualties at home.

Today there are at least 11,500,000 people in America 65 years of age or older. That's a lot of people. They are needed in a war economy.

But millions of these are already casualties. More than 3,500,000 of them have absolutely no income at all. More than 2,000,000 have incomes of less than $500 a year. More than 2,000,000 more have less than $1,000 a year.

So of the 11,500,000 past 65, some 7,500,000 have less than $1,000, or nothing at all. They live in poverty or on the fringe of poverty. These 7,500,000 are casualties. They cannot help the economy because they have no purchasing power to contribute to the war effort.

MAKE HOME SOLDIERS OF THE MILLIONS OF AGED

Now, if America is to convert to an all-out war effort, it is going to have to make home soldiers of these people. Some of them, of course, will find jobs, especially when the employment market tightens. But millions of them will not be acceptable to industry because they are too old, or because they are blind or otherwise physically disabled. Nevertheless, they can be made good soldiers if the Government wants to help them enlist in the war to save democracy.

They can help in a valuable way. They can help by being transformed from paupers into folks able to hold their own in the market place.

Why should our Government make things tougher than they already are? Why try to fight a war overseas and at the same time support an intolerable burden of poverty at home? Why saddle ourselves with people who are useless to the economy, and expensive to the taxpayers, when we have the means to enable them to stand on their own two feet?

Let's grant that these folks can't put on a uniform and march off to the wars. Let's grant that they can't, because of advanced age or disability, compete with younger people in industry. Let's grant that they have passed the stage of productivity?

WE CAN'T AFFORD A WAR AND A DEPRESSION, TOO

That doesn't mean that they can't be useful. In a war economy (and for that matter, in a peace economy, too) everybody must have purchasing power to keep the Nation healthy. When millions have no money, and there are pools of poverty, we wind up with areas of depression.

This Nation cannot afford to fight a war and depression at the same time.

So the smart thing to do is to win the war against depression at home, and to do it right now, before it is too late.

We aren't winning it with the weapon called H. R. 6000, the Social Security Act as amended. True, it will increase average old-age insurance by about 77 percent. But that only means that the average will be increased to $47 or so a month, and you can't get along today on that kind of money. The 3,000,000 on old-age assistance aren't going to be helped at all; they will still continue to receive their $46 average each month.

So the Social Security Act isn't the answer. It won't prevent casualties on the home front.

TOWNSEND PLAN WILL WIN WAR AGAINST POVERTY

But the Townsend plan will. Suppose these 7,500,000 casualties each had $150 a month to spend. We would have won the war against depression at home. The great horde of case workers and welfare bosses would be free for more useful work. There would be no need to divert our attention from war problems to Community Chest drives and other forms of uneconomic charity. We would be in a position to devote our entire efforts to making democracy victorious.

If the Townsend plan is needed in peacetime, it is needed even more in wartime. If the United States Congress really wants to get this country in shape to win against any threats from foreign nations, it had better get our own house in order first. The place to begin is by abolishing charity and poverty at home.

Korea is the crucial test. How are we going to face up to it? Are we going to try to fight two wars at once—one abroad, the other, against poverty, in our own country? Or are we going to stand up to the enemy confident that our own economy is healthy and sound?

Are the old people going to be the home front casualties of the Korean war? Or are we going to have the Townsend plan?

A Constituent Wants His Share

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from a constituent which reads as follows:

HARTFORD, MICH., August 8, 1950.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: The other day I was talking with a fellow on the street when another fellow comes along and says "What's your name?" Well, sir, I kind of scratch my head and told him. Then he says to me, "Just how much of that scratching do you do a day?" I knew right away he was one of them big Government men making a dandruff survey. Well, sir, I told him I don't know just how much scratching I do. He says, "What do you mean you don't know how much scratching you do?" Well, sir, I says, I really don't know; you see I got the itching piles, too. He started looking through a big book that he had with him, and the more he looked the madder he got; finally he slammed that book shut and says: "I got to consult Washington." He was sure upset because he started right off in the wrong direction. Well, sir, this fellow that I had been talking to says to me, "Why don't you get one of them big Government expert jobs?" I says, I don't know nothing about being a big Government man. Now you'll notice that this writing isn't very good, that's because my arm is sore. I thought that fellow would shake my arm right off. He says, "Son, I thought all the time you was a big Government man; but as soon as you said you didn't know anything, I knowed you was."

Like all people he started wanting to know all about the Government. He says, "I know the Boy Scouts have a slogan, 'Do a good deed daily,' and the Navy's is 'Sink or swim.' What have you big Government men got?" Well, sir, I don't know if I gave away a Government secret or not, but I told him, ours is "Don't do today when you can do tomorrow." You can be sure if this is a secret it won't go any further, because he said he wouldn't tell no one but his wife. Then he says to me, "I hear they got them big Government experts that can just take a peep at a man's differential and tell if he is high speed or geared down like a Mack truck." Well, sir, I says, "That is a top secret no one is supposed to know that but us and the Russians; we can't let every Tom, Dick, and Harry know about these things." I did tell him if he would wait until he got his income paper and look at Form B, paragraph 2, he would learn a lot.

I'd kind of like one of them big Government jobs, but I don't want to travel. I used to drive truck and I got kind of tired of traveling. I thought maybe I could get a job I could do right here at home, like counting hairs on a dog; that's something the Government hasn't done yet, and I could furnish the dog.

Sincerely,

MAX DANIEL HOGMIER.

Registration of Communist Organizations and Members

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Our Inner Defenses," published in the Chattanooga Times of August 21, 1950; an editorial entitled "Blunderbuss and Rifle," published in the Nashville Tennessean of September 14, 1950; an editorial entitled "The Anti-Subversive Bill," published in the Chattanooga Times of September 14, 1950; an editorial entitled "Hodge-Podge," published in the Washington Post of September 14, 1950; an editorial entitled "Is Communism a Yardstick?" published in the Wilmington (Del.) Journal; and an editorial entitled "The Senate on Subversion," published in the New York Times of September 14, 1950. These editorials criticize and point out the weakness of the McCarran bill passed by the Senate on last Tuesday.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chattanooga Times of August 21, 1950]

OUR INNER DEFENSES

There is in the United States today a rising tide of fury against Soviet Russia and its purveyors of communism in this country. The anger springs from deep within the American consciousness. It is based on the knowledge that the Communists deliberately provoked the Korean aggression and that Americans are fighting and dying as a result. It feeds upon the presumption that Russia has set the timetable for these "little wars" by which we are to be bled white in conflict against Russian stooges and made ready for the final assault by Russia's own forces. It is fanned to white heat by battlefield atrocities against American prisoners of war.

With it comes a louder, more insistent clamor for direct action against Communists in the United States, not the result of hysteria alone, but also in the sober realization that we must look to our inner defenses. The demand for stringent laws no longer comes from the extreme right or the Fascist minded, although the latter, of course, is still with us.

The very urgency of the matter requires that we base our actions upon clear thinking rather than emotional stresses.

A very large segment of our citizens believes the thing to do is to outlaw the Communist Party and to make membership in it a punishable offense. They cite the fact that the party is an organ of an international conspiracy, dedicated to the overthrow of this Government. They declare that to continue to allow it to exist in our midst under the myth that it is an ordinary political organization is not democratic, but dangerous. They say: "Ban it, break it up, destroy its strength."

They have persuasive arguments which would be well nigh unanswerable—if the methods they prescribe actually would accomplish what they would like to see done. We are not yet convinced.

In the first place, the proscribing of any organization is alien to our principles. Our cherished freedoms of assembly, of expression, of thought are intended to protect those who disagree as well as those who agree with us. They imply the right to be unpopular, to be wrong in beliefs and attitudes.

To outlaw the Communist Party would be to send its members and activities completely underground, instead of only partly so, making them more difficult than ever to detect. A law may prevent a man from calling himself a Communist; it won't change his beliefs. And it is his belief and not a label which makes him a danger. No law can be strong enough to combat an idea; it can be overcome only by a better idea, a more enduring principle.

Our constitutional liberties, of course, do not include the right to spy, to sabotage, to disrupt through the perversion of one's freedoms in the service of an ideology which denies all freedom. But these are actions which come into the province of enforceable laws. We have on our statute books measures which protect the Nation against their commission. Some of the laws need strengthening and this should be done at once. Subsequently, a campaign of vigorous enforcement should be undertaken in protection of the Nation.

Such a course of action would answer the immediate needs for greater internal security without endangering the freedoms which are the basis of all our security and without weakening the moral fiber of the leadership we must present to the world.

We still do not need thought control in this country. We do need more and better and straighter thinking.

[From the Nashville Tennessean of September 14, 1950]

BLUNDERBUSS AND RIFLE

The Senate's 70-to-7 vote on a subversive control measure may be taken as an accurate reflection of the country's demand for some such legislation before a major war emergency occurs.

The time is surely ripe for making possible a crackdown on Communists and their colleagues when necessary, and at the same time safeguarding the basic liberties of the people. There are grave doubts as to whether these ends will be achieved by the catch-all measure that has now been approved.

President Truman has already announced that he will not sign the McCarran bill which includes provisions of the Mundt-Nixon-Ferguson measure. And it is the McCarran bill that has been passed, with its complicated and ineffective program for registering Communist organizations and members, and also the leadership of "front" groups.

The dangers of this registration provision were effectively pointed out in a scholarly analysis by Senator PAUL H. DOUGLAS, of Illinois, but the majority was not impressed. It does credit to the Senate, however, that it finally reversed the opposing vote on the Kilgore program for clamping down on dangerous Communists overnight and putting them under immediate detention.

Assuming that blunderbuss methods might not work, the Members decided to add the rifle technique which is designed to get immediate results.

Senator ESTES KEFAUVER, who was one of the sponsors of the Kilgore bill, is listed among the few who voted against the final compromise measure on grounds that it "endangered many of the basic rights held dear by Americans." He would go further than Senator MCCARRAN in blocking spies and saboteurs, but he will not encourage legislation that seems destined to bring endless confusion and at the same time pave the way for possible persecution of good citizens. His steadfast stand for his convictions is a commendable demonstration of political courage.

The country will not be apt to forget that it was due to the persistent demands of Senator KEFAUVER and others that the concentration camp provision was finally accepted after its initial defeat. Under it, the FBI can proceed to round up the listed 12,000 dangerous Communists in an emergency, and the country will not have to wait for court action on endless petitions citing nonregistering Communists to appear in court.

Assuming that the House will support Senate action, the anti-Communist legislation can easily become an important political issue if the President stands by his determination to withhold approval. For the Republican standpoint, of course, this will be entirely satisfactory.

The White House shares the general opinion that the liberties of those who are bent on undermining national liberty are not important. But the resolve to see that the Bill of Rights will always apply to good citizens is in strict accordance with the oath Mr. Truman has taken to uphold and defend the Constitution.

The idea of suppressing the overt act rather than trying to establish controls over thought is thoroughly American and its projection at this time by the Chief Executive of the Nation merits the attention from lawmakers that it has received from the plain people who think.

[From the Chattanooga Times of September 14, 1950]

THE ANTISUBVERSIVE BILL

Where should that eternal vigilance which Jefferson said is the price of liberty be more religiously exercised than in Congress, which makes the laws? And yet Congress has passed a bill which, though based on a laudable aim, strikes at basic constitutional rights of the people, the right of freedom of opinion and the right to be immune from arrest without due process. Such restrictions are common and indispensable in police states, but Americans fought two world wars against tyrannies based on enslavement of human thought.

Congress happens to be supported by public opinion, and public opinion is motivated by a desire which every patriotic American must share—the desire to see all dangerous Communists or potential pro-Russian saboteurs placed where they can do no harm. But that should be done without adopting a sort of vigilantism against all who do not conform to orthodox thinking.

ESTES KEFAUVER was 1 of 7 Senators who voted against the bill, while 70 were in favor. It was not that the Tennessee Senator hates communism less but that he loves liberty more.

Likewise, Senator LEHMAN, of New York, the only one of the seven facing an immediate contest for reelection, declared: "My conscience will be easier, though I realize my political prospects may be more difficult," and he called the bill "this tragic, this unfortunate, this ill-conceived legislation."

By requiring that they register with the Government and imposing a fine if they fail to do so, the bill outlaws all Communists, the misguided theorists as well as the potential tools of Soviet Russia. If signed by the President or passed over his veto, the law would mark the usurpation by Congress of the authority of the Supreme Court to decide whether a political group constitutes a conspiracy against the country.

The dangerous Communists will immediately go underground. If enforced by the Attorney General, who is made responsible under the bill, the measure may result in clogging the courts with cases against citizens suspected or merely accused of harboring Communist ideas, though many of those citizens might be willing to die for a country which, in the past, has placed no restrictions on how a man shall think or what he may believe.

The particular provision of the bill which Senator KEFAUVER simply could not stomach was section 4 which says that it will be illegal "to perform any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship." He might have argued that Congress, by passing such a law, has possibly itself performed such an act. The Manchester Guardian recently printed a dispatch from its leading American correspondent, Alastair Cooke, which stated that "President Truman remarked to an intimate a few weeks ago that if he had a taint of the hysteria now rampant in Congress, it would be possible to have an American police state in no time at all."

A veto by the President seemed probable yesterday, but not certain. The Senate included an amendment favored by administration leaders, calling for the internment of suspected individuals in time of war.

If the bill finally becomes law, there is no reason for opponents to entertain too much optimism over the possibility that the Supreme Court would hold it unconstitutional. The alien and seditions laws, of 1798, were upheld in court tests, though they later led to the first nullification proceedings in the Southern States and contributed to the downfall of the Federalist Party which sponsored them. Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer's "red hunts" in the Wilson administration find no defenders now, but he managed to make convictions stick in the courts.

The antisubversive bill, in several of its provisions, sets up orthodoxy and conformity as the American pattern, though the Constitution guarantees just the opposite. The coming world struggle is between freedom for the individual in the democracies and enslavement of the human soul in the Communist dictator states. If we are not fighting for that, we are not fighting for anything.

The bill has some strong points, in tightening the laws against espionage, but in other provisions it clearly seeks to force conformity by intimidation and under it not only the Communists, but the precious constitutional right of dissent may go underground.

[From the Washington Post of September 14, 1950]

HODGEPODGE

The internal security legislation adopted by the Senate on Tuesday combines at least three radically different and essentially contradictory approaches to the Communist problem. It includes (1) the President's recommendations to protect the country from the real and immediate threat of espionage and sabotage by Soviet agents; (2) the Kilgore-Douglas proposals to protect the country from the contingent, yet nevertheless serious, threat of Communist fifth-column activities in case of war, invasion, or insurrection; and (3) the Mundt-Nixon-McCarran provisions to protect the country from the remote and wholly imaginary threat of subversion by Communist propaganda. The hodgepodge bill into which all these measures were scrambled for reasons of political expediency deserves sober and realistic analysis.

The existing laws which forbid and penalize espionage and sabotage have loopholes which urgently need plugging. The President sought to plug them by asking Congress to extend the statute of limitations on espionage and to make punishable the disclosure of defense information as well as defense documents; to authorize the promulgation of regulations for safeguarding defense plants, facilities, and installations; and to provide for the supervision of deportable aliens whose actual deportation is blocked by the countries from which they came. These are sensible precautions entailing no trespass on personal liberty. We believe, as we urged in a recent editorial, that Congress should have enacted these measures, concerning which there was no responsible dispute, in separate legislation. Unfortunately, they are now tied up with the highly controversial sections of the omnibus bill.

The Kilgore-Douglas proposals deal with a danger that does not now exist but that may arise in the near future. It was reported just the other day that the director of the FBI had told a congressional committee he would at once arrest some 12,000 suspected enemy agents if the United States should become involved in war with the Soviet Union. The number seems fantastically high, but there is no doubt that some suspect citizens as well as aliens would have to be rounded up and detained pending clearance in the event of war. Since there is now no legislation to authorize such executive action, it would be sensible to provide it in advance and to provide at the same time, as the Kilgore-Douglas measure does, a rational procedure for judgment and review of every case on an individual basis.

The Kilgore-Douglas proposals as actually incorporated into the omnibus bill would be put into effect only in case of war, invasion, or insurrection. The original version would have made them applicable additionally in case of an internal security emergency jointly declared by Congress and the President. The Senate did well, we think, to eliminate this uncertain contingency in accordance with an amendment offered by Senator MCCARRAN. Quite needlessly, in our opinion, it also adopted an amendment by Senator FERGUSON stating that nothing in the detention provisions should abridge any right guaranteed by the fifth and sixth amendments or suspend habeas corpus unless in conformity with the Constitution. This seems sheer surplusage.

Admittedly there are grave constitutional questions involved in legislation which authorizes detention on the ground of mere suspicion of an intent to commit espionage or sabotage. Such authorization is a drastic measure repugnant to American traditions. But it is meant to meet an unprecedented danger threatening the survival of the American society. The validity of the measure would have to be determined by the courts in the light of the danger. We think it preferable in any case that it should be undertaken in conformity with considered legislative authorization instead of on the basis of executive expediency. The Kilgore-Douglas proposals represent a conscientious, careful attempt to reconcile security and freedom.

Senator MCCARRAN'S contributions to the omnibus bill—including the Mundt-Nixon Communist registration requirements and the Senator's own provisions for an asbestos curtain shutting out all aliens with inflammatory ideas—have no direct relation to security at all. These are measures that would do no injury to spies and saboteurs but would do irreparable injury to rights of expression and association. These are the measures which prompted President Truman—correctly and courageously, in our opinion—to declare that he would interpose his veto. They are the measures which led an honor roll of 7 Senators to vote against the bill. They are so dangerous and corruptive that they overweigh all the commendable protections that the bill provides and make a Presidential veto imperative. The United States needs protection against Communist treachery, but this country has no occasion to fear Communist ideas.

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Journal of September 13, 1950]

IS COMMUNISM A YARDSTICK?

Passage of the McCarran Communist-control bill by a thumping Senate majority is evidence that America is losing its sense of proportion where Stalinist communism is concerned. By any test but one, the McCarran bill is inferior to the House version and to the Kilgore substitute. It is more dangerous to the traditional liberties of all Americans. It upsets diplomatic immunities, provokes retaliation on Americans, and adds to international tensions. It will be hard to enforce; it imposes methods on the FBI and other agencies which they have not asked for and which would make their job more difficult. It discriminates against refugees from Stalinist persecution. The bill is not so much a blow at communism, in short, as a trumpet blast at it.

Not all the Senators who voted for the bill could have been unaware of its disadvantages. Why, then, did they vote for it? Presumably because the McCarran bill is "more anti-Communist" than other versions, its practical application will be less troublesome to Communists, its dictatorial restrictions will threaten the liberties of anti-Communists; but its provisions are more aggressive and more unrestrained. No man who voted for it can be accused of wanting to coddle Communists.

The bill, in short, is evidence that where communism is concerned Americans are no longer able (or so their representatives assume) to judge an issue on its merits. Is a bill (or a doctrine, or an act) anti-Communist? If so, it is good. Can it, by any device of oratorical prestidigitation, be linked up with communism? Then it is bad.

Communism as practiced by and for Russia is thoroughly cynical, vicious, and dangerous. But communism is not, and cannot be, the yardstick by which we should measure all other questions. You cannot run a business that way, or play the stock market, or pick a winner at the races. We doubt that you can run a country that way, either.

[From the New York Times of September 14, 1950]

THE SENATE ON SUBVERSION

As it passed the Senate Tuesday evening the McCarran antisubversive bill is something of a hodgepodge. On the credit side it now includes as a last-minute addition the Kilgore detention-center bill, which goes to the heart of the Communist problem. And it retains a few useful technical provisions that would strengthen existing security laws. But the fact that the bill embraces some good features does not alter the more important fact that it would impose infringements on the freedom of thought, speech, press, and political association that Americans have always held dear. It is noteworthy that HERBERT H. LEHMAN, of New York, was one of the seven Senators who voted against this measure.

Of course, it is necessary to protect our country from the menace of Communist aggression, whether in the form of Russian imperialism or of internal espionage and sabotage. But it has been and still is our belief that the principal features of the McCarran bill, far from achieving this goal, would interfere with it. Its registration provisions would ensnare Federal authorities in interminable litigation, while the Communist Party itself would be blithely going underground or making its appearance under a succession of aliases. Its prohibitory language is so broadly worded that there would be danger of involving in the toils of the law perfectly loyal citizens of leftist or radical or even merely unpopular views. Its immigration sections give vent to Senator MCCARRAN'S own peculiar version of the know-nothingism that was rejected in this country nearly a century ago. This bill would strike primarily at beliefs; the real danger to our country lies far more in actual or potential espionage or sabotage at the hands of Russian sympathizers who may or may not be members of the Communist Party than in the public expressions of Communist belief, however offensive, mendacious, and contemptible such expressions may be.

The Kilgore bill, on the other hand, would deal directly with activists at a time of danger. It would afford concrete protection from that which we fear. Mr. Hoover speaks of the existence of some 12,000 dangerous Communists on whom the FBI has its eye. The Kilgore bill would give a legislative basis, replete with constitutional guaranties, for the police action that undoubtedly should be taken against this "hard core" in an emergency.

It is obviously too much to hope that the House and Senate will now agree on the Kilgore bill alone. We would like to see them come up with an antisubversive measure that the President can sign, but we hope that he sticks to his announced decision to veto the McCarran bill and that he will veto anything that looks like it.

Our Government in Its Whole Constitutional Vigor Must Be Preserved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial appearing in the September 15, 1950, issue of the Retired Officers Association Bulletin, entiled "Our Government in Its Whole Constitutional Vigor Must Be Preserved." This article is a sequel to the fine editorial entitled "Constitutional Liberties Endangered by World Government Proposals," published in the June 15, 1950, issue of the Retired Officers Association Bulletin, which was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Monday, June 5, 1950, by my worthy colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]:

OUR GOVERNMENT IN ITS WHOLE CONSTITUTIONAL VIGOR MUST BE PRESERVED

"Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none; the support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies; the preservation of the general Government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; * * * freedom of religion; freedom of the press; freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected—these principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us, and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation."—Thomas Jefferson, First Inaugural Address, March 4, 1801.

Many letters received from our members and others record their praise of our editorial "Constitutional Liberties Endangered by World Government Proposals," which was published in the last June issue of the Bulletin. That article was republished in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Monday, June 5, 1950.

Although comments were overwhelmingly favorable, a few letters suggested that some form of world government might be established by vesting such an organization with defined and limited powers which would not detract substantially from our present scheme of self-government under the Constitution and, that through the establishment and maintenance of such type of government, world peace could be achieved through enforced regulation.

The members who expressed such views, however, have uniformly agreed that the world-government concept, as suggested by the Chicago group's proposal for a world constitution, would be definitely dangerous, in that it would grant superior power to a government that is not our own. In view of that obvious conclusion, it is unmistakably clear that the granting of any executive, legislative, or judicial powers we now enjoy under our present Federal Constitution to any form of world government would inevitably lead to the very kind of world government as proposed by the Chicago group, and would endanger our constitutional liberties. All such proposals should be vigorously opposed.

We believe that the high aims of peace might be achieved through international cooperation under long-established principles of international relationships without the necessity of establishing a world government. We also believe that this can be done in a world organization, such as the United Nations organization, without granting to it attributes of sovereignty, provided there is a uniform desire and willingness on the part of the great nations for the peaceful settlement of international differences. Modern history has indicated that peace is not to be had merely by forms of organization or peace pacts; for the causes of conflicts are complex and often economically deep rooted. It has long been evident to students of history that the only remedy for war is the elimination of the causes of war. While this has heretofore been impossible, it is the ultimate hope of mankind as the only means of world peace.

The widespread support of the views expressed in our article on world government in the last issue of the Bulletin comes from a vast majority of a group which venerates the traditions of valor and personal bravery passed on to our generation by the Founders of our Republic and those who have supported them. These traditions are embodied in the immortal document which the great British statesman, William E. Gladstone, described as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man"—our Federal Constitution.

In view of the certain impairment of the constitutional guarantees for our national and individual welfare, patriotic Americans should be alert to all proposals for changing our constitutional setup and refrain from approving such proposals, however plausibly they are presented. We should be aware that some such proposals are made by those with possible inimical purposes which have not been clearly set forth or explained. In the parallel column on this page is one such proposal.

We should be especially alert to the fact that there are also those who, through the medium of agreements with undisclosed objectives, are actually weakening our domestic law and our form of constitutional government that has protected us for more than 160 years.

Constitutional dangers, comparable to the present, have been foreseen by statesmen of other countries. Among them was William Pitt who, with reference to our Federal Constitution, once observed that—"It will be a pattern for all future constitutions and the admiration of all future ages." We, who received such a heritage, must not permit it to be weakened or encroached upon in any respect, lest it be entirely destroyed, and we and future generations deprived of our birthright.

The people of this Nation certainly do not wish to be victimized or enslaved through any form of world government that might be organized and directed under a proposed world constitution. They are determined to remain free to worship according to the dictates of their conscience, free to write and speak within the limitations as designated by laws of their own making, free to be taxed according to their constitutional methods and not at the erratic and capricious will of a world potentate who perhaps could not distinguish between capital assessments and unjust taxation.

Why should a great and free people give alien agencies any power and control over their vast reservoir of actual and potential wealth—our national resources? The world government advises that "plans for improvement of the world's physical facilities, either public or private, and for the productive exploitation of resources and inventions shall be submitted to the (planning) agency or to such development authorities or regional subagencies as it may establish. The (planning) agency shall pass judgment on the social usefulness of such plans." The meaning of this provision is unmistakably clear. Not satisfied with our gold, our banks and credits, our atom and H-bombs, they would take from us our natural resources as well as our liberties.

In effect, the proposed "world constitution" would abolish or weaken our Bill of Rights, those first 10 amendments to our Federal Constitution, phrased by the great Virginian, George Mason, which comes to us through English jurisprudence, after their principles had been established and tested in England against considerable resistance. These tried precepts form the keystone of our civil liberties. Our Bill of Rights would go with the disappearance of our Federal Constitution and our form of government. Shall we permit this to happen?

The establishment of a world government under a "world constitution," however limited the initial grant of power and authority might be would, in our opinion, ultimately and inevitably mean the abolition of our Federal Constitution with all of our traditional rights and the protection under it. The proposal would result in the elimination of our laws concerning emigration and immigration and the movements of peoples. The proposal would eventually mean that freedom to enter our country would be extended to all peoples, regardless of their political and moral views, or degree of assimilability, and would permit to enter our country those we consider undesirable, including elements which may be hostile to our traditions of freedom.

The world government proposes to assume direction of all armed forces. Thus, our Armed Forces would pass from United States control to that of world government. With that would pass our right to organize, direct, and dispose of the constituent parts. Insofar as we would be permitted to have our own Federal military forces, they would be in the nature of a police guard. Our military groups would not follow the Stars and Stripes, as our national flag would no longer exist as our primary symbol of loyalty and patriotism. The Commander in Chief of our military forces would not be our duly elected President. As a matter of fact, the powers of our President, as now exercised under the Constitution, would no longer obtain. Even the office of President, as we now know it, would be abolished.

Two provisions of the world constitution are of particular importance: "The limitation and control of weapons and of domestic militias in the several component units of the world republic" is one of its functions, and the control and use of the armed forces of the federal republic of the world (of which ours would be a part) shall be assigned to a chamber of guardians under the chairmanship of the (world) president in his capacity as protector of the peace, is another.

Quoting further from the world constitution, officers holding professional or active rank in the armed forces of the federal republic, or in the domestic militia of any component unit thereof, shall not be eligible as guardians. These guardians are to have the control and use of the armed forces of the republic of the world—a situation that requires the closest scrutiny by members of the armed services of all nations.

Military appropriations would no longer be within the scope of the powers of our Federal Congress; all appropriations would be under the control of the chamber of guardians. Appropriations for retired pay of officers, pensions, and similar benefits no longer would exist. Active-duty compensation would be subject to the same control. Many patriots of unimpeachable record in the line of duty, whose vitality is lessening with the passing of years, would probably be deprived of their well-earned financial assistance.

We need no superstate to sap the vitality of our Federal Union. We desire no superconstitution to weaken, destroy, or supersede our Federal Constitution. We are satisfied with its wise checks and balances when they are properly observed. We take pride in our tripartite system of Government and insist that each branch of it shall not be unduly encroached upon. We are a Republic guided by a Federal Constitution and wish to remain so. We must protect our inalienable rights. In connection with such dangers as now face us, Stanley Baldwin once stated: "It will be for you to protect democracy * * * it must be defended from without and it equally may have to be defended from within." This can best be done by becoming aware of the threats which confront us in connection with erroneous proposals for the establishment of a superworld organization which, based upon untenable assumptions, is being aggressively advocated in an organized propaganda as the only means of achieving peace.

The full implications of such proposals must be investigated, studied, and understood by all, lest—through acceptance of plausible, but impracticable, panaceas for world peace—freedom under constitutional government is to become a mere memory in our Nation.

Truman's War or Stalin's War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following editorial from the September 14, 1950, issue of the Capital Times, Madison, Wis., entitled "Truman's War or Stalin's War?" The editorial follows:

TRUMAN'S WAR OR STALIN'S WAR?

The Korean war is making one thing clear: The Republicans, who do so much talking about communism, do not hate Stalin half as much as they hate Truman.

In a frenzied effort to win 1950's election the Republican high command is doing everything it can to embarrass the administration in Washington and to shake popular support of the war to stop communism.

As with every war, there are fears and doubts on the part of the people. The Republican Party and the Communist Party are doing everything they can to exploit these fears and doubts and to whip them up. The Republican National Committee and the Communist Daily Worker continue to refer to the war as "Truman's war." The Chicago Tribune, which has once again become the recognized voice of the Republican line, thinks so little of the news value of the Korean war that it won't put the war news on the front page. The Wisconsin State Journal, which could support the war against Hitler, is now writing editorials advising our GI's in the foxholes that they are being double-crossed. So is the Daily Worker.

The free nations of the world have lined up with the United States but the Republican Party takes its position with the Communists.

The Wall Street Journal, the Daily Worker of the Republican Party, exposed the Republican strategy on questions of wartime economic controls the other day when it said:

"A break in Republican ranks has insured passage of wage and price control powers, even though the President isn't asking for them. Some Republicans voted such controls to put Mr. Truman and the Democrats 'between the devil and the deep blue sea.' They figure as prices are regulated, black markets will flourish and red tape will rile businessmen and consumers. If prices aren't held down, living costs may creep up and the administration will be blamed for that."

In other words, the Republicans were willing to act, not because they want to stop inflation, not because they want to get Stalin. They want to get Truman.

That's the way it was with Taft & Co. before Pearl Harbor. They were more against Roosevelt than Hitler. And that's the way it was with the French reactionaries in the days before World War II. But they were more frank about it. They admitted that they would rather have Dictator Hitler in preference to Premier Blum.

One gets the impression from reading the Republican pronouncements that if the Nation could get rid of Truman, all its foreign policy troubles would disappear. Someone should remind them that there's a fellow by the name of Joe Stalin who is not entirely blameless. Perhaps Harold Stassen should do the reminding It was Harold who, in an article in the Ladies' Home Journal in 1947, assured us that Stalin had an "open mind" on the question of whether the American system and the Russian system could get along together in the world.

This may be "Truman's war" to the Republicans, but to an awful lot of Americans and the people of the free world, who have joined in condemning the aggression in Korea, it is Stalin's war.

The United States and China in a World Three Ways Divided

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an address entitled "The United States and China in a World Three Ways Divided," written by Stanley K. Hornbeck.

I have obtained from the Public Printer an estimate of the cost of printing this address. The estimated cost is $451.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNITED STATES AND CHINA IN A WORLD THREE WAYS DIVIDED

(By Stanley K. Hornbeck)

The old warrior statesmen of Japan had a precept: "After a victory, tie tighter the cords of your helmet."

The people of the United States had in 1945 an idea: Having achieved victory and having created a new association of nations, hurry home—and throw away your helmets." And the Government of the United States implemented that idea.

Every effect has its causes. In political affairs, mankind is given to attributing responsibility either to persons or to gods. In democracies, when things go wrong the people blame the government; the party or parties not in power blame the party in power; and critics of all sorts attribute fault to agencies and persons in positions of authority. Those who are charged with error either deny that there has been fault or declare the fault not theirs, or both: "The responsibility was not mine, not ours; it was that of some other fellow." Thus the apologists for what was done at Yalta: "The American contribution was all right; the whole fault lies with the Russians; they did not live up to their agreements." Thus the makers and the defenders of our China policy since Yalta: "There were no errors on our part; it was all the fault of Chiang Kai-shek." And in recent years there has been evolved in this country a technique of passing the buck downward. Thus in reference to the responsibility for lack of an adequate alert at Pearl Harbor: "The Government was not responsible, no agency was responsible, no persons were responsible; the fault was that of the American people, all of us." Now, there are suggestions of resort to that technique in regard to our obviously inadequate preparedness in connection with Korea: "The Government was not at fault, no department was at fault, the Congress wasn't at fault, no persons were at fault; the people had elected their Representatives and had told them what to vote for and what not; the people had preferred movies and motorcars to military training and modern weapons; therefore the fault is that of the people—all of us."

That technique has not yet been resorted to in explanation of or apology for our China policy during the years since Yalta. It probably will be, but not with warrant.

The people of the United States, even the majority of the Members of the Congress, have relatively limited knowledge of the Far East, of situations there and of problems that arise therein and therefrom. So, generally speaking, the people and the Congress leave largely to the President, i. e., to the executive branch of the Government, the formulating and conducting of policy in relations with and regarding that part of the world and the countries therein. This has been especially the case since the middle years of World War II. In the discharging of this responsibility, the President must, of course, and does, rely upon various counselors; and his counselors must and do rely upon experts and technicians. Theoretically, all important decisions are made at top level; but in matters relating to the Far East, especially to China, most of the reporting and the formulating of estimates, proposals, policies, and plans has been the work of small groups of officers who are supposed to have special knowledge of the area and the problems involved. Thus, for decisions made and action taken in United States official dealings with and regarding China during recent years, whether for better or for worse, the credit or the blame belongs to a very few persons, those men whose views have prevailed in official circles, most of them in the Government and of the executive branch. These, not the people, not the Congress, have been the makers of our China policy (policies).

It is said that once upon a time, when Prince Charles, later Charles II, King of England, was in exile, a group of his companions tacked on the door of the Prince's apartment a card inscribed: "Here dwells Charles, a prince who never says a foolish thing and never does a wise one." Later the pranksters found under that sally and in Charles' handwriting: "Quite right; my words are my own; my acts are the work of my ministers." It may be surmised that several of our top-level officials might, if they chose, make some use of such an alibi in connection with no small part of the course pursued by the United States in matters relating to China since early 1945. They might say: "The voices have been ours but the ideas expressed have been those of the men on whose reports, estimates, proposals, and plans we have relied."

The most portentous and most tragic fact about our policies in relations with and regarding China of the years under reference is that most of the persons whose views have prevailed in the formulating and implementing of those policies have, until very recently, believed about China, and about China's National Government, and about China's Communists, and about the part played or not played and playable or not playable by Russia in and regarding China, a great many things which simply haven't been so. They've believed that the United States should do things which it shouldn't; that China could do things which it couldn't; that China's Communists both were what they weren't and weren't what they were and are. The same regarding their view of the Soviet Union. Wishing the people of China well, and perturbed over ways in the political and social life of China that they consider dark, they failed—until recently—to take adequate account of a fact in international political life much more warrantable of concern both to the United States and to the Chinese, namely, the fact that communism, no matter where or of what brand, is being used by the Government of the Soviet Union as an instrument of imperialism and is committed to objectives which call for subjugation of all mankind.

World War II began when, in 1931, Japanese imperialists staged an assault of China in Manchuria, and the League of Nations and the United States in effect acquiesced. Before that war was ended Russian imperialists began a new assault on China via Manchuria, and for five long years, until 7 weeks ago, the United Nations and the United States in effect acquiesced.

Now, 8 years plus after Pearl Harbor and 5 years after VJ-day, we are living in a world politically divided—divided three ways: a world of free peoples; a world of enslaved peoples; and a world of those peoples who, neither free nor enslaved, are seeking freedom and are in danger of becoming enslaved. The United States is outstanding in the first; the Soviet Union outstanding in the second; and China outstanding in the third of these worlds.

We, the United States, are today confronted with probably the greatest test of our capacities that has ever been imposed upon us. Wanting peace, yet having since 1914 been drawn into two world wars, we have become a party to and are a leading figure in an even greater conflict: the Kremlin and communism versus democracy.

In this current conflict the Kremlin is the ultimate aggressor. Its objective is to perpetuate itself and, to that and other ends, to make world-wide its system and its control. The creators and beneficiaries of that system reason that they must either destroy democracy or be destroyed by democracy. They therefore are attacking all democratic ideas and regimes and aspirations. They intend to win. They would prefer to win by cold war, but they expect to have both cold and hot. Lenin said so. Stalin says so. As the United Kingdom's Ernest Bevin said some 3 years ago, "We would be as foolish as barnyard geese not to believe that they mean what they say and that they are preparing accordingly."

Foremost among the Kremlin's weapons of assault is communism. In prospectus, communism offers mankind government of the people, by the people, and for the people. In practice, Communists establish, wherever they gain control, regimes in which a few enslave the many. Communism is authoritarian and Communist regimes are totalitarian, absolutist and expansionist. Every member of a Communist Party—no matter where or what his or its nationality, whether he and his party be Marxist, Trotskyist, Stalinist or National Communist—is pledged to work for world victory of communism. Every Communist thus is a sworn enemy of democracy. To that extent, all Communists are subject to the Kremlin and all Communist regimes are allies of the Soviet Union in service of a common cause: Communism over all.

Because of those facts, there can be no compromise between communism as it is and men and nations that value freedom. Nor can agreements, if and when, with Communist authorities, be relied upon. Those authorities, making war on freedom, at home and abroad, neither think nor act in terms of "live and let live"; and they regard agreements not as contracts but as camouflage.

This third world conflict may be expected to continue until either the Kremlin and communism desist from the policies and practices to which they are now committed or the still free peoples, including the United States, subverted or subjected one by one, have all capitulated and with totalitarian governments, become confederates, satellites, or subjects of the Moscow authoritarian regime.

Such being the setting, foremost in importance among the political problems that should long since have been apparent and of priority concern to all of our policy makers has been and is the problem of our national security, which in turn is a part of the larger problem of the survival of freedom, free peoples, and free men.

Neither during World War II, nor for a good while after, did more than a few of our leaders have any appreciable comprehension of what communism, Kremlin brand, was, is, and intends, or of what Soviet policy makers have had in contemplation. Of the many and contradictory things which the Russians have said to all the world about themselves, their system, their objectives, and their methods, our policy makers long believed what they most wanted to believe and refused to believe what they found unpleasant or inconvenient to believe. Only as the Communists have provided, with acts of physical aggression involving American nationals and properties and other interests, indisputable evidence that communism means conquest, has there been grasped, gradually, the fact that Lenin and Stalin meant what they said the first time—and the second and the third - to their own followers rather than what Stalin has said to some diplomats and to some publicists.

President Truman sensed danger some 3 years ago. He declared it his belief that it must be the policy of the United States "to support free people who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures," and that "if we falter in our leadership, we may endanger the peace of the world—and we shall surely endanger the welfare of our own Nation." The policy makers formulated, and the Congress approved, a plan which committed us to the principle but whittled down the scope of that utterance. Toward resistance to the Communist assault, we undertook to give some support to some countries, but some only, menaced by that assault. The principle of combating the spread of communism by giving support to resistance to it has since loomed large in our foreign policy as a whole, but with some glaring inconsistencies.

In two countries, Greece and China, the Communist assault was being pressed simultaneously in terms of "hot" war. In the case of Greece, we, the United States, gave moral support and economic and military aid to a government which, under armed Communist attack, made armed resistance, a resistance which but for our support could not long have persisted. In the case of the other, China, we ostentatiously withdrew our moral support and discontinued our material aid; and the resistance there of a government which was likewise under armed Communist attack and resisting became ineffectual but did not cease.

Strategically, China was and is of extreme importance in relation to the conflict between democracy and the Kremlin because China lies in a buffer position, both geographically and politically, between the free peoples of the Pacific area—including ourselves—and the main base (Moscow) from which Communist operations are conducted. An anti-Communist China would be at least a barrier—to the advantage of the free peoples. A Communist China, if and as, will be a highway by which a base from which Soviet influence will move and Communist armed forces be able to strike southward and eastward toward free and freedom-seeking peoples. Manchuria is so serving today.

Politically, China was and is of importance because she has vast potentialities and she has a permanent seat on the Security Council of the United Nations. An anti-Communist China votes there on our side. A Communist China, if and when, would vote—and veto—there on the Soviet side.

Yet, with that country, China, the largest, the most populous, the most richly endowed country in Asia, the enduring "Middle Kingdom," a neighbor across the Pacific, long our friend, lately an ally, under armed attack and in process of being subjugated by militant communism, and with Korea, Japan, the Philippines, and other far-eastern countries, in fact most of Asia, almost sure to go as she goes—our policy makers caused this country, the United States, to refrain, from August 1946 to June 27, 1950, from giving any real support to those who there were—and are—resisting Communist aggression. They said, successively and cumulatively, that we should not, we could not, and we would not "intervene" in what they declared to be a "civil conflict."

That was just what the Kremlin and communism wanted and worked for. William Z. Foster said some 4 years ago: "The war in China is the key to all problems of the international front * * * the key task * * * is to stop American intervention in China * * * the question of China is our key concentration."

Seeds of communism were first planted in China by Russian agents in 1920. Sun Yat-sen accepted an offer of assistance from Russia in 1923. Sun died in 1925 and Chiang Kai-shek became his political heir. Chiang (who had studied in Japan and had visited Moscow) made use of and was used by Russian and Chinese Communists until, in 1927, those elements attempted to seize control of the Nationalist movement and he thereupon expelled the former and set about suppressing the latter. Communism in China then took the form of armed rebellion. In course of time the Chinese Communists moved, under arms, by the "long march," from South China into North China. There they were when, in the last week of World War II, the Russians entered and occupied Manchuria, and when, in Manchuria, in 1946, the Russians made available to them the vast quantities of military equipment and supplies surrendered by the Japanese which enabled them to begin massive attack on the Nationalists—China then, Korea now.

China's Communists have from that point on enjoyed the undivided continued moral support of the Soviet Government, the Soviet satellite states, the Cominform, the Communists throughout the world, and of many non-Communist liberals who have been moved by propaganda—much of it Kremlin-originated—which has magnified the faults of the Nationalists and portrayed the Communists as "agrarian reformers" leading a "peasants' rebellion."

The American people have always been well-disposed toward the Chinese. For more than a hundred years it was the policy of the United States to respect and befriend the recognized Central Government of China. This—not because each such government was a good government nor because China was politically pure and wholesome, but because American statesmen and the American people believed it to be to the interest of the United States and of all concerned that orderly processes prevail and that China survive as a state, be independent and be within the orbit of democratic influence.

In pursuance of that policy, we made in China and in our relations with her people an investment of influence—especially moral influence—which has been substantial and has produced substantial benefits in both directions. We came to be regarded by the Chinese and by the world as China's best friend. In the decade which preceded 1945, that relationship paid handsome dividends to the cause of the free peoples in the war of defense against the aggression of the Axis powers.

But there came—beginning in 1942—a change. Pearl Harbor had made the United States and China allies. In the course of the subsequent efforts of both countries to make the most of that relationship, many Americans, several in high places, became so intent upon ways and means for winning the war that they overlooked, were indifferent to, or were utterly impatient of Chinese methods and susceptibilities; while many Chinese, some also in high places, became so intent upon ways and means for safeguarding China's and their own interests against the pressures which they knew would develop after the war had been won that they insisted—not unnaturally—on trying to have some say of their own regarding military and political strategies and tactics in their own country.

The long and short of it was, and has been: Americans, in a variety of capacities, attempted to compel the Chinese to do various and sundry things; and the Chinese, a people who can be persuaded but who cannot be driven, were unwilling or unable to do those things and reacted unfavorably in several contexts. The irresistible force hammered at an immovable body—with results and consequences most unfortunate for China, for the United States, for the world, and for the reputations, in the long run, of some of the American participants, many of whom became hostile to the National Government, embarked on campaigns of criticism of it, and have ever since been extravagantly condemning it and crusading against it. The only gainers from that tragedy have been, until 1945, the Japanese, and since 1945, the Communists (in China, in the Soviet Union, and throughout the world).

While the war effort in China was thus being plagued, President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill made to Generalissimo Chiang in 1943, at Cairo, certain commitments. Most important, it was the agreed "purpose" of the three that Manchuria and Formosa (and the Pescadores) "shall be restored to China," and that "in due course Korea shall become free and independent."

In the same transaction it was agreed that President Roosevelt would, upon signal from Marshal Stalin, take measures to obtain the concurrence of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. The United States thus, with a view to saving American lives, paid Russia, in advance, with a draft drawn on China, guaranteed to Russia by Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, kept secret from China for many months, and honored by China on American official advice.

Later President Roosevelt, who did not understand the Russians, who thought he had persuaded Stalin, who was told by his military advisers that without Russian participation in the war against Japan the American casualty list in achieving Japan's defeat might be enormous, President Roosevelt made, with Prime Minister Churchill, to Marshal Stalin in 1945 at Yalta, concessions at China's expense inconsistent with earlier international agreements and with the commitments made at Cairo. (Incidentally, Stalin had already promised Russian participation.)

True, we could not have prevented the Russian aggression which ensued, but by giving, in advance, our assent to a predatory trespassing on Russia's part, we did in Russia's favor in relations with China a thing which we had for many years refused to do in Japan's favor; and in doing so we disregarded principles and pledges of our own and we authorized a violation by Russia of pledges which both she and we had given. No matter how much or how well our part at Yalta may be explained, defended, and justified, we there bargained in and with China's rights and interests for expected advantages to ourselves. We bought, with Chinese coin, unneeded Russian action and worthless Russian pledges. We later caused the Chinese to buy, with their confirmation, a made-in-Moscow Trojan horse. And all too few of our people, including many in high places, seem subsequently to have taken any account of the extraordinary moral obligation which we thus incurred.

In December of 1945 the American Government proclaimed its commitment to a new policy regarding China. President Truman announced that the United States would be inclined to give aid to China if and as China made, along specified lines, progress toward "unity and peace." In pursuance of that policy, and toward trying to stabilize the situation in China, it sent General Marshall to urge compromise and coalition.

The new policy was an expression of concepts and views that the Nationalist leadership in China was corrupt and incompetent; that the power of that leadership should, therefore, be diluted or be destroyed; that Chinese Communists were agrarian reformers; that Russia's pledges could be relied on; and that it was appropriate and feasible for the American Government to ask of the Chinese Government adoption and implementation in and for China of a program of political and economic reform. The policy was based in substantial part on mistaken assumptions. It envisaged the impossible So, too, the Marshall mission. And in both there was deviation from traditional principles of American foreign policy

Earlier in 1945, when Mr. Byrnes had become Secretary of State, he had begun operations with an assumption that relations with Russia could, should and would be conducted on a basis of cooperation. Within 6 months he was driven to the conclusion: You can't do business with Russia on any such basis; you've got to be tough. His experience was in Europe and in relation to problems there. We became tough—or we tried to. At about the same time, General Marshall decided that we must be tough in regard to China. In practice, our "be tough" policies were—they could only be—expressed in pressures on governments. In Europe that worked out as a pressure against a Communist regime engaged in aggression. In China it worked out as pressure upon an anti-Communist regime engaged in resisting aggression.

The Yalta and early post-Yalta developments had weakened the position of China's National Government and strengthened that of the Communists. Many of the things done and things said by the American Government and by some parts of the American public since then have had similar two-fold harmful effects.

There has been much loose, prejudiced and prejudicial talk about the amount of aid which we have given China. The facts do not bear out the impressions created by various statistical exhibits and official interpretations thereof. Much of what appears in various accountings is in no way warrantably describable as postwar aid to the National Government or as contribution to the military effort of that Government in its battle against the Communists. Our economic assistance was sent both into Nationalist-held and into Communist-held areas. It is more than questionable whether on balance the aid which we have given the Nationalist Government since VJ-day has not been more than offset by the encouragement which our other courses, in words and in deeds, have given to its Communist opposition, whether we have not in effect given the Natinal Government more of hindrance than of help.

Surely, for instance, the embargo in 1946 on export to China of munitions, official statements in 1947 after the Marshall mission, testimony officially given in 1948 in public hearings, the white book in 1949, the announcement in January 1950, that we would not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa, surely such and various other of our contributions have been the opposite of helpful to the Nationalists and highly helpful to the Communists. The withdrawal of our moral support, with substitution of official criticism and abuse, probably did the Nationalists more damage than our munitions (while, and as given) had ever done them good.

The recent flowering of the Communist operations in China has been no more the consummation of a people's or peasants rebellion than had been 20 years previously the rise to power of the Nationalists. In both cases, able leaders of originally small articulate groups organized armed forces and set about ousting the existing authorities by use thereof. Both had at the outset foreign support—Russian. Each—first the Nationalists and ultimately the Communists—picked up adherents as it piled up military victories As of 1946, the Communists, after 25 years of effort, had no substantial following outside of the ranks of their own armed forces. In that year we began our withholding of material aid to the Nationalists, and the Russians began their giving of material aid to the Communists; in the next year the Communists began to win armed victories; and thereafter, where the Communists appeared in force the Chinese people accepted them on a basis of hope and of fear, not, with the exception of various and sundry intellectuals, on a basis of enthusiastic choice.

The Communist conquest of the mainland was not a victory or, by, or for the Communist ideology. The Communists won skillful of armed forces, an abundance of munitions and a marvellous propaganda of big lies and bigger promises. They were the outs capitalizing on conditions of distress, which, after the Japanese, they themselves had helped create and which the ins were unable—as the Communists now are unable—to alleviate They broadcast to the Chinese people and to the world that these conditions were all the fault of the Nationalists; they, the Communists, would liquidate those rascals, set up a government of and by and for the people, and make everything all right. And many of the Chinese people and many of the Nationalist soldiers—impoverished and frustrated by two decades of warfare, yearning for peace, discouraged and demoralized by the discontinuance of American moral and material support of the National government, and noting the successes of the Communist armies—were easily taken in by that line—many Americans, with no such preconditioning, also.

The Kremlin is making its conquests, is enslaving one nation after another, by skillful manipulation and support of persons, parties, and peoples who think that communism will make them free and prosperous and powerful. The Communist success in mainland China would have been duplicated, easily, in Korea, had not the United States and the United Nations promptly given support, moral and physical, to a government and a people resisting Communist agression there.

There is a myth regarding China which runs to the effect that the Chinese are a people who always absorb their conquerors. The fact is, the Chinese have absorbed only those of their conquerors who have invaded China and moved in substantial members from elsewhere into China. Observers and analysts who suggest that Russia will become bogged down or Russian conquerors be absorbed in China are reckoning with phantom phenomena of their own conjuring. The Russians are not moving into China, nor do they intend to try to govern China—now. No need for them to step in and assume the burdens, responsibilities, and risks of direct involvement where local Communists are, under their tutelage, advancing the frontiers of the Kremlin's empire. And, China's Communists will not be absorbed—for they are Chinese, they are in China and of China; they are not invading conquerors.

Nor is there warrant for a belief—and still less for an affirmative suggestion—that the Chinese people will be able to rise up in revolt and throw off the foreign yoke. The yoke in China will not be a foreign yoke; it will or would be a local copy of the totalitarian system which, effective in the Soviet Union and countries satellite thereto, is giving at this moment in Czechoslovakia and elsewhere new demonstrations of its methods. Communist totalitarian regimes are ruthlessly effective in anticipatory elimination of would be—or even might be—revolters.

There is the wishful thought that Mao Tze-tung may become a Chinese Tito and a Communist China under him become an Asiatic Yugoslavia. But how can any statesman or any thoughtful layman seeking to combat the spread of communism and to make the world safe for peoples that are free or hoping to become free—how can any such person find comfort or cause for cheer in a hope for such a consummation? Tito is a proponent of world revolution. Tito's Yugoslavia is a totalitarian state. Mao Tze-tung has declared that Chinese communism is a part of world communism, and Mao's China will be a totalitarian state. Can it be imagined that a Communist China will ever become more antipathetic to Moscow dictation than Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist China has been?

There is no warrant for an assumption that a Communist regime in China could or would be friendly or helpful to the United States. Communism is by nature intolerant of democracy. The Chinese Communists are avowedly committed no less than are the Russian—and the Yugoslav—to the objective of overthrowing all capitalistic or bourgeois or imperialist governments and making the victories of communism universal. The Chinese Communist leaders have—openly, emphatically, and repeatedly—declared that Chiang Kai-shek is their enemy No. 1 and the United States their enemy No. 2. They've copied the Russian pattern; they use the Russian methods; they follow the Moscow line. Wherever they gain control they conduct themselves just as their counterparts or prototypes in other countries have done and are doing. They have told us over and over, and they show us day by day, to whom they consider themselves indebted, where their allegiance lies, what they envisage, and how they intend to operate.

We all know what these Chinese Communists did to and about our consular establishments in Mukden; what they've done at Dairen; what they did to our Embassy premises and to our military attaché at Nanking; what they did to one of our Foreign Service officers at Shanghai; what they've done to our official property at Peking; what they've done to Catholic missionaries and to foreign journalists; and what they say regarding interests and agents of "imperialist" powers. It would seem that they've been, as the Japanese once were doing and as the Russians constantly are doing, testing us out.

More serious, however, than any of these matters: If the Communists gain unchallenged control in China, the natural sequel, China, then having passed completely into the Kremlin and Cominform orbit, will be intensification of Communist pressures in areas to the south, to the west, and to the east of China; the influence of the democracies (western Europe and North America) will be diminished; Russian influence will be expanded; the interests, investments and commitments in general of the United States throughout the Far East—especially in Japan and in the Philippines—will be gravely endangered; the chance of our being involved in a "shooting" war with Russia will be increased; and the likelihood of our having any allies in eastern Asia will be reduced to approximately zero.

The authors and factors of the Marshall plan originally portrayed the foreign-aid program as in "investment" in security—to be implemented on a basis of "calculated risk." They envisaged economic aid—to certain countries. They figured that this would require expenditures up to a certain amount. They said that we could afford that amount but no more; that we therefore could not include—could not find funds to include—China. But, less than a year later they saw and they declared that economic aid to western Europe must be supplemented by military aid. They then decided that we could afford that supplement. Next, they perceived that Europe could not make a full economic recovery unless access be regained to the resources and trade of eastern Asia. But the Communist advance in China was creating obstacles to that restoration. So, they thought and said, the Communist advance must be stopped—at China's borders. Hence the idea of economic aid to countries peripheral to China—with particular thought for Korea and the Philippines, and general thought, under a point 4 program, for several other areas. Next, they realized that in Asia as well as in Europe economic aid must be supplemented by military assistance. So, plans for such aid, with thought especially of the Bao-dia government in Indochina. All the while, however, a studied insistence that China, including Formosa, not be included.

Was it not and is it not patent that the more the Communists gain in China, the stronger would be Russia's over-all strategic position and the greater the risk feature of the investment, under the Marshall plan, in aid to and for western Europe? Could it not be seen, be foreseen, that if communism gains undisputed control in and of China, the initiative, in the struggle in the Far East between communism and democracy, will thereafter be overwhelmingly at the disposal of the Soviet Union and any likelihood of firm resistance by indigenous governments or populations to Communist pressures against or within the areas peripheral to China be greatly diminished? Could it not be seen that no Asiatic would believe that American capacity to spend was so limited that we could give aid in Europe but could not give aid both in Europe and in China; that every Asiatic would note that discontinuance of American support of China's Nationalists and the rise to power of China's Communists had taken place in that order; and that politically minded Asiatics, no matter what their principles and preferences, would be skeptical of the enduring reliability of proffered American support? Could it not be foreseen that with a Communist domination of China we would stand to lose all that we had with a century of effort gained—not only in China but at other, or at all, points in the Far East; that the relief which we had gained at a great price from the threat to our security which had all along been implicit in Japan's policy of expansion by force would be gone; more, that our losses might easily become the Kremlin's gains and the whole of our investment in the Far East, before and in World War II, be turned against us?

The Kremlin-planned and Russian-supported invasion of South Korea is a sample of the fruit to be expected from a policy of first letting a middle and key area go by default and then hoping that a modicum of aid to weak peoples in scattered peripheral areas will suffice as a quarantine.

The whole question of what the United States could afford was and is a question of relative evaluations. We must, of course, at all times consider our national economy. But in war we spend freely in order that we may save. Now the simple fact is we have been at war with Communist totalitarianism for a longer while than we were at war with Nazi and Fascist totalitarianism. We have talked of "cold" war. But our policy makers have shown little awareness of the fact that war, whether "cold" or "hot," is nevertheless war and calls for planning and action accordingly. Compared with the expenditures that our people are now demanding be made, and which no one now says we can't afford, in response to a top-level decision to support resistance to Communist aggression in Korea, the cost of an aid to Nationalist China such as we gave to Greece would have been a small amount indeed. We could not afford it because the people who said we could not were the same people who said we should not. They were at outs with China's Nationalists because the Nationalists had declined or been unable to adopt and implement a program for China which they had prescribed. They believed that, as Stalin had said, China's Communists were "not real Communists." They believed that democracy and communism could exist and be at peace side by side. They refused to believe that a Communist domination of China could have serious—to say nothing of tragic—implications in regard to our policies and our position in the cold war which they expected to win by giving much economic and some military assistance to a few countries in western Europe and in western Asia. They insisted that the issue between communism and democracy was one of ideologies. They reasoned that we could check and roll back the tide of communism by showing some peoples and telling all peoples that our democratic way of life produces a better standard of living and general welfare than does the Russian Soviet way. They simply did not understand the Communist, the world Communist, movement. They did not and they would not see that Soviet Russia is, as was Tzarist Russia, expansionist minded, bent on conquest, a moral and ruthless. "We must not support a 'corrupt' government in China. We must not intervene (though we already had intervened) in a 'civil conflict' in China. If China's Communists won in that conflict, we can thenceforth give them economic and cultural assistance, enroll them on the side of democracy, and see them become a thorn in the side of Soviet Russia."

One year ago, in August 1949, the Department of State, in the white book, declared China's National Government bankrupt. It said that the Communists had won and that nothing that the United States had done or had not done could have changed that result. At the same time it declared itself at last awake to the fact of Soviet Russian imperialism, and it admonished China's Communists that an attempt on their part to engage in aggression against China's neighbors would be an affront to the United Nations.

At that time China's Nationalists still had a government, they still had armies, they still had a treasury, they still had bases, they long had been and they still were resisting the armed advance of militant communism, and they still were hoping for American assistance. Moreover, what remained of the Nationalist organization was the hard core of the Kuomintang and its armed forces. What they most lacked were the very things which but for the United States the Greeks also would have lacked, the things but for which Greece would have been overrun by the Communists. Yet our Government all but crossed them off, and perhaps worse, told them and the world that we were doing so. Today, a year after that cross-off, those Nationalists still carry on. They have better political and military assets than they had then.

When China's Communist leaders created a government in Peking and proclaimed that government the Government of China, the Kremlin and all of its satellites promptly accorded that government recognition. Our policy makers, along with those of Great Britain and of several other non-Communist countries, gave favorable consideration to a plan which, had it been fully implemented, would have brought about recognition of that government by the United States shortly after recognition by the United Kingdom, India, and others. Popular opposition in this country, aroused by observation of the treatment accorded American interests in China by the Communist regime, spared us the making of that mistake.

Meanwhile China's Communist government talked of and went ahead with preparations for invasion of Formosa and liquidation of the National Government. With that the number coming up on the Communist timetable, our Department of State, at the end of December 1949, issued a memorandum instructing its officers in the Far East to portray Formosa as an area of no strategic importance.

Three weeks later, in January of this year, 1950, after ex-President Herbert Hoover had suggested that the United States Navy be used, if necessary, to keep Formosa from falling into Communist hands, our policy makers caused the President of the United States to announce, unnecessarily and to the world on January 12, 1950: "The United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa."

In the course of the past 2 years our Government, impelled partly by dictates of a "Europe first" strategy, partly by a belated realization that economic assistance without military assistance is not only a risk but a risk which invites aggression, and partly by a feeling of alarm born of communism's gains in Asia, has entered into arrangements for mutual defense between and among the free peoples of western Europe and ourselves. We are giving to the North Atlantic Pact countries economic assistance and moral support and weapons and military collaboration. All to the good—in principle—but it does not go far enough.

The North Atlantic Pact and the military aid program may have strengthened us in one theater, but they could not and cannot give us security, all theaters considered. Strength and vulnerabilities have to be considered together. In today's world, security is, as is peace, indivisible, a condition for all or a reality for none. There can be no real security in the North Atlantic area, none in Europe, none in Asia, none, in fact, in America—no real security anywhere—so long as it is left possible for communism or any other "ism" or system to impose itself or be imposed anywhere by force.

American support of China's Nationalists having been ruled out by our policy makers, and American support of China's Communists having been ruled out by the acts of those Communists themselves and the reaction of the American public thereto, American official thought turned to the idea of "containing" communism in eastern Asia by giving support to governments of countries peripheral to China—Indochina, Indonesia, Malaya, Siam, Burma, the Philippines, Korea: "Concede China to the Communists but let them have nothing more." And there came also emphasis on point 4 and new emphasis on the Voice of America. Communism, however, is making clear that it does not intend thus to be contained.

On June 24, 1950, Korean Communist armed forces in North Korea marched against the Korean Republic in South Korea, a peripheral area state for the birth of which the United Nations was partly responsible and to which the United States had given and was giving assistance. The United Nations, on United States initiative, at once declared this an act of aggression, called upon the North Koreans to withdraw, and called upon its own members to go to the assistance of the resisting South Koreans. On July 27 President Truman announced that he had ordered the United States air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and support; that the attack on Korea makes it plain beyond all doubt that communism has passed beyond the use of subversion to conquer independent nations and will now use armed invasion and war; that it has defied the orders of the Security Council of the United Nations; that in these circumstances the occupation of Formosa by Communist forces would be a direct threat to the security of the Pacific area and to United States forces in that area; that accordingly he had ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa and was calling upon the Chinese Government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland; that he had directed that military assistance to the Philippine Government be accelerated; that he had similarly directed acceleration in the furnishing of military assistance to the forces of France and the Associated States in Indochina; that the United States will continue to uphold the rule of law; and that he had instructed Ambassador Austin to report these steps to the Security Council.

With those developments and what has transpired and what has been disclosed since, all here present are familiar.

In relation to United States interests, objections, over-all policies, and facing of realities, the decision which President Truman made regarding Formosa was soundly complementary to but more bold and more significant than his decision regarding Korea. In the case of Korea, there was no question of an inconsistency with previous decisions; there was present the mandate of the United Nations; there was the compelling consideration that between the alternatives of committing or not committing the United States to prompt physical support of the South Koreans there really was no choice; we had to act, affirmatively and at once; and it apparently was assumed that the commitment could be easily implemented a police action. In the case of Formosa, there was recent previous inclination to the contrary; there was no mandate from the United Nations; the considerations of sound strategy, political and military, which underlay the inclusion of this commitment would be little appreciated in some quarters; and it had to be presumed that implementation might not be easy.

Obviously, President Truman perceived, as many others had not, and some haven't yet, that the decision taken regarding Korea made essential a tightening up of the whole line of resistance to the onward march of communism, and that resistance at the ends of a crescent peripheral to China calls for a resistance in the middle of that line. Success for our side in Korea would be more difficult, and, when achieved, would be more than offset, to our loss, if in the interval the Communists took Formosa. And he probably sensed that there may come a time when China's Nationalists and bases held and provided by them will again be an asset in a common cause, as they were in World War II.

In that context, there persist a number of serious questions to which, brushed off or answered indifferently during recent years, renewed attention must now be given:

Can we afford to abandon a friendly government, to the fashioning of whose predicament we have contributed, while that government still lives and still is resisting a common enemy?

Could be afford to add, by such an act, to the doubts regarding our standards and our reliability which already exist in the minds of various governments and peoples whom we exhort to stand with us in a common effort to combat communism and produce conditions of national and international security?

Can we afford to accept—by facilitating a completion of the Communist conquest of China and a consolidation by the Communists of their position in that pivotal and crucial area—the increase which will inevitably result therefrom of Communist pressures upon and against other areas in the Far East in which we have interests and involvements, especially Japan and the Philippines?

Could we afford to accept by default the loss of the advantage which it might be to us to have remain alive in China at least a nucleus of organized resistance, some element allied with us in the common cause of resistance by freemen and peoples to the armed advance of communism?

Formosa is an island a hundred plus miles off the coast of China, southwest of Korea and of Japan, and directly north of the Philippines—area about that of Maryland and Delaware combined, larger than Haiti, more than three times that of Puerto Rico. Population, slightly greater than that of Virginia and North Carolina combined, about that of Australia; by race almost all Chinese. Ceded to Japan in 1895; surrendered, in keeping with the Cairo and the Potsdam declarations, to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek in 1945; now the seat of the National Government and the headquarters and base of Nationalist resistance to China's Communists. Richly endowed and practically self-sustaining as regards production of foodstuffs. Little industrialized. On Formosa there are in and with the National Government a large number of men and women who, from all parts of China, have been educated in Occidental schools and colleges, in China or abroad, most of them Americans. There are Nationalist armed forces numbering from 350,000 to 700,000 men, with reasonably good equipment, including artillery, tanks, aircraft and some naval vessels. As these are expended, they can be replaced only by importation from foreign sources. Most of the energies of the population are devoted, currently, to the training and maintenance of the armed forces and corollary activities related to preparation to repel an invasion. The coast lines on the west have been heavily fortified.

Formosa has been since 1948 literally the lifesaver of Nationalist China. It has provided not only a refuge but a base for reorganization. Some of the ablest of the younger men of the Kuomintang have been effecting reforms—administrative, social, and military. Chiang Kai-shek now commands there land, sea, and air forces, composed largely of veterans who, although they were defeated in battles on the mainland, did not succumb to the blandishments of Communist propaganda and who, if assured of adequate munitions, can be expected to put up a stiff resistance to further Communist attack. He has been able to offer to the United Nations for use in Korea a contingent of troops numbering more than have thus far been offered by all the other members put together.

Formosa, were it taken by China's Communists would become, to communism, a valuable asset. Who can say that, held by the Nationalists, it may not some day be more than that to the free peoples in the global effort which will have to be made first to contain and ultimately to roll back the forces of Communist aggression?

In the light of the Communist invasion of South Korea and the action to which he was on June 27 committing the United States toward physical support of resistance to that act of aggression, President Truman at the same time committed the United States to a dual undertaking in reference to Formosa: that of preventing any attack by the Communists upon Formosa and, as a corollary, that of causing the Chinese Government on Formosa to desist from air and sea operations against the mainland. "The Seventh Fleet will see that this is done." By the terms of that decision, the announcement of it, and action promptly taken in accordance with it, the United States became very definitely committed to the objective of keeping Formosa out of the hands of the Communists. That objective coincides with the foremost of the immediate objectives and preoccupations of Chinese Government and people on Formosa. Question arises: Do we intend, toward implementing this commitment, to cooperate with and have the help of the Chinese on Formosa, or do we intend to discharge our obligations under it all by ourselves? If the former, we shall have to revise our official attitude and some features of our earlier policy regarding the National Government. If the latter, we may find ourselves inviting the very act of aggression which we have said we "will" prevent.

In a Department of State publication, in its issue of August 11, there appears, in the account of that day's press conference, this statement: "Asked if the United States policy on Formosa leaves room for further military aid to Generalissimo Chiang, the Secretary (Mr. Acheson) replied that it does." (Wireless Bulletin, No. 194, August 11, 1950, p. 13).

The over-all purpose of the decisions announced on June 27 was, of course, to make resistance to Communist aggression. The method, initially: (a) to give support to Governments in Korea, in the Philippines and in French Indochina toward making resistance in those areas and (b) to deploy United States naval forces to prevent further hostilities between the Communists on mainland China and the Nationalists on Formosa. There comes then this question: Is the conflict between China's Communists and China's Nationalist a civil conflict or is it a local part of the world conflict wherein the Kremlin and communism are making war on democracy?

Communist propaganda long has declared the conflict in China to be strictly a "civil conflict." The American Government has for several years taken and expressed the same view of it. But now, a similar conflict having developed in Korea and the Communists (witness Mr. Malik) declaring this conflict strictly a "civil conflict," the American Government and the United Nations say: "No. This is a case of Communist aggression, Russian inspired and Russian supported. It must be stopped." (Witness, the recent discussions and the resolutions adopted at Lake Success.) "Even if it were merely a civil conflict, where there is a danger to world peace it is a right and may be a duty of the United Nations to intervene." (Witness, Sir Gladwin Jebb, on August 11, 1950.)

No matter what may have been before 1946, the character of the conflict between China's Communists and China's National Government, that conflict has been since that year a conflict the fundamental characteristics of which have been and are Communist aggression and Russian support. What has been going on in China since 1946 differs little from what has been going on in Korea since June 24, 1950. In both cases communism, engaging in armed aggression, has been on the march. In China, Chinese Communist armed forces have overrun the country; in Korea, Korean Communist armed forces have overrun the country. In both, there has been Russian inspiration and support. The American Government and the United Nations are right in declaring the developments in Korea a case of Communist aggression and in giving support to South Korean resistance thereto.

They would have been right had they so done in regard to the conflict in China. They would be right were they to do so now. President Truman was right when in March 1947 he said: "I believe it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures." He is right now in coupling with United States action toward resisting Communist aggression by armed Koreans, United States action toward resisting Communist aggression by armed Chinese. The conflict in Korea is not a civil conflict. The conflict between China's Communists and China's Nationalists has not been and is not a civil conflict. The attacking forces in both cases bear a made-from-and-for-Moscow stamp.

A policy of resisting aggression by giving support to resistance to aggression calls for action not only toward repelling aggression but toward preventing aggression. Our operations toward repelling a Communist aggression in Korea would be jeopardized if currently therewith there occurred a Communist attack on Formosa. Success for the United Nations in Korea would be a hollow victory if at the same time communism made gains in Formosa or in the Philippines or in Indochina. President Truman doubtless took all these considerations into account in the making of the decisions which he announced collectively and in combination on June 27. He gave us, for the region involved, a coordinated program toward comprehensive resistance to an enemy which, unfortunately, is in position to strike at any one or several of many points.

In a leading role as we are in this third world conflict, involved as we are in an operation of armed resistance to Communist aggression in one region, and perceiving as most of us now do that communism may attack and we be compelled, along with other peoples, to make armed resistance elsewhere, it behooves us to do, without delay and with all our might, two things: (a) tie tighter the cords of our helmet, gird on our full armor toward preventing more and greater attacks, and, if such are made, defeating the aggressor; and (b) make friends and give support wherever possible toward the same ends.

The question of making friends brings us back again to the question of relations with China. There has been in this country and elsewhere an advocacy of an idea of making friends with China's Communist regime: "Be nice to them, recognize them, give them the seat on the Executive Council of the United Nations which is now that of China's National Government; they are only superficially and temporarily allied to the Kremlin; they would, of their own volition and in gratitude for favors received from and expected of us turn against the Russians, become friends with us, and be on our side in the world conflict."

I have discussed some aspects of that subject in another form. There remains no time for discussion of it here. Let me say only that in my opinion the most stultifying action that the United States could take now would be to give any form of political encouragement or support to the Communist regime in China or to any advocacy, no matter by whom, of such course. That regime cannot be won over to, nor will it come over to our side. Mao Tze-tung may, as Tito has done, quarrel with Stalin; but neither is Communist China nor is Communist Yugoslavia likely to side with us and democracy against communism's imperialism. And, in my opinion, the most stultifying thing that the United Nations could now do would be to take from China's Nationalist government and give to China's Communist government China's seats in the Executive Council and elsewhere. The Soviet authorities could be appeased only by a total surrender, and the Chinese Communist authorities are almost as hostile to the democracies as is the Kremlin. In the practical politics of international relations, the eyes, the ears, the voices and the acts of nations are, at any given moment or period, those of their own governing authorities. This is especially true where peoples are ringed 'round by iron curtains. We cannot now reach and make friends of the people in Russia or the people in Communist China. Nor can those peoples deviate.

On the other hand, China's Nationalists have been our friends, still wish to be our friends, and are committed even more firmly to resistance to communism than we are. We can influence them and, through them, China. Both the United States and the United Nations should take full stock of those facts and make the most of them.

No country in Europe, no nation in Asia has been won over to communism by communism's idealogy. None has been saved from communism by democracy's idealogy. But 12 countries have been subjugated by Russian manipulation of the forces and resources, including manpower and arms and propaganda, which communism has put at the Kremlin's disposal. Others are in jeopardy—and we are in danger. As Sir Gladwyn Jebb said on Friday last (August 11, 1950) at Lake Success, "Whatever their (Europe and Asia's) relations in the past, they are likely both to be lost unless they both realize the danger and concert to meet it. For this purpose, what has happened in Korea must not be allowed to occur again."

For our own good, toward defense and survival of our country, our democracy, our own and other peoples rights to freedom and security, we need to prepare now, to the maximum of our ability, to discourage aggressors, to prevent attacks, to support those who resist attacks and, if we are attacked, to defend our own soil and from it, with help from others, whom we may have helped, put an end to agression. The Communist attack is global. We cannot all by ourselves meet it on every front. But it must be met. We need friends and our friends need friends. We should think of China in that setting, and of Nationalist China and Communist China in terms of relative potentialities. In a world three ways divided, the free peoples and those who seek freedom must stand together or, failing that, be one by one destroyed.

The Improvement of the Snake River To Bring Tidewater Navigation to the Confluence of the Snake and Clearwater Rivers at Lewiston, Idaho

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 29, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important inland navigation projects in this country to be undertaken by the Federal Government is the improvement of the Snake River in Washington and Idaho to bring tidewater navigation to Lewiston, Idaho. The Congress in recognition of this project has authorized the construction of four multipurpose dams on the Snake River, and the Bureau of the Budget has approved the appropriation of $4,000,000 to start work on the Ice Harbor Dam, the first of the series of navigation and multipurpose dams to be built on the Snake River.

The House Appropriations Committee included the item for Ice Harbor in the 1950 appropriation, only to have it dropped out in the Senate on the plea that no provision had been made for the migration of fish past the dam. This item has again been approved by the Bureau of the Budget for the 1951 appropriation bill, but was dropped from the bill by the House Appropriation Committee.

I have endeavored to have the appropriation restored by the Senate Appropriations Committee in a personal appearance before the committee, when the importance of the Snake River navigation in the upbuilding and economy of our country was presented in the following statement:

STATEMENT OF HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF IDAHO

ICE HARBOR DAM PROJECT, IDAHO

Representative WHITE. I wanted to address myself to the appropriation for Ice Harbor Dam.

I have a map here that we have prepared to better illustrate the situation.

Chairman MCKELLAR. You may tell us what you wish.

Representative WHITE. This map was used when we obtained the authorization to build the dams on the Snake River from the confluence of the Columbia and Snake Rivers, near Umatilla and Pasco, and is one of the most important navigation projects remaining to be constructed in the United States. I have no hesitancy in saying that. We have navigation in high water on the Snake up to Lewiston in Idaho, at the confluence of the Snake River and the Clearwater River, and that is nothing new. They have been hauling wheat by boats in high-water stages for years, and I have pictures on this map of the tugs and the barges navigating the Snake River. There are a number of pictures of boats going up under the drawbridge at Lewiston in high water.

Now, the Congress has already authorized the construction of the dams on the Snake River to bring tidewater transportation on the Columbia and Snake Rivers all the way up to Lewiston, Idaho. Ice Harbor is the first dam on this authorized project.

Now, just to illustrate to you gentlemen how important this navigation program is, and what it means in the development of the United States, we are in the initial stages of bringing in the great Columbia Basin project of 1,200,000 acres bordering along the Snake River and the Columbia River. The towns and communities are all to be built; the homes are to be built with streets and concrete sidewalks. Buildings and communities will be constructed all over the big project.

Chairman MCKELLAR. Who is going to pay for that, Congressman?

Representative WHITE. The cost of the irrigation project is reimbursable to the Government. The farms, homes, towns, and communities will be built and financed by private enterprise. We have already built Coulee Dam and we are in the process of bringing water to the Columbia Basin. Canals are being constructed and millions are being spent to develop the Columbia Basin, which will be one of the fruit and breadbaskets of the whole United States when it is finished. We have already demonstrated that at Yakima on one side and Wenatchee on the other, trainloads of grain and apples are rolling out of that section now.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROJECT AREAS

When this semiarid country is brought under water, and it soon will be, we are going to build a new section of the United States. The material needed to build that is up here in Idaho. We have the biggest white pine sawmill in the world in Lewiston. Lewiston is a beautiful, thriving city, as it shows in this picture, at the confluence of the Snake and the Clearwater Rivers. The railroads are in there, the country is now in big production, and it is one of the great wheat centers of the Northwest [indicating on the map] besides cattle and farm produce. There is timber and building material of all kinds and look at the tremendous country.

Now, there are a number of tributaries upstream to the Snake River. There is the Clearwater, that drains a great amount of undeveloped country, and the Salmon River, a big stream that drains another big country, these two big rivers join the Snake River and converge on Lewiston, and flow on down to Pasco, where the mighty Columbia comes in.

We already have navigation from the tidewater with the tugs and barge lines that are bringing material in all season of the year up to Umatilla, taking oil in and bringing wheat back.

Now, this dam project is a part of the navigation plan by building this Ice Harbor Dam you will carry forward the program of bringing tidewater navigation up to the Lewiston area where you have all of these vast resources of material, raw material, and manufactured lumber, navigation on the Snake River is an important thing and it is going to be needed to transport the material used to build that great Columbia Basin project.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINERAL DEPOSITS

Now, as I have indicated, this is an old map. The Bureau of Mines, has gone into this immense country in central Idaho and tested out the metal deposits with a diamond drill. At Stibnite, Idaho, they bored into the veins and discovered tungsten that was worth $2 a pound. It was a godsend to the Nation in the last world war emergency. Tungsten is an alloy for steel and the Japs had cut off our supply that we were getting from China. Lo and behold we found this indespensable alloy metal in central Idaho.

Fortunately the Bradley Co., a big mining organization with all of the capital needed and all the resources required to bring these deposits into production mined the metal discovered by the Bureau of Mines and saved the day in the war.

But that isn't all. We have all kinds of resources locked up in central Idaho. It is one of the greatest underdeveloped sections of the United States. When I say that I am using the words of a former head of the Bureau of Mines, Dr. Finch.

As I said before, there is in northern and central Idaho the biggest stands of white pine timber in the United States. Much of it is being manufactured in Lewiston, and that is not saying anything about the vast stands of other varieties of timber, much of it needed downstream to develop this great Columbia Basin project that we have already invested two or three hundred million dollars into now.

Dr. Raver, what did the Grand Coulee cost?

Mr. RAVER. About $169,000,000.

Representative WHITE Dr. Raver, as to these big canals that they are building into these reservoirs, and the reservoirs that have been built there to store the water and get it out to the land, what did that project cost?

Mr. RAVER. The total project, including the canals and the generators and the dam, cost about three-quarters of a billion dollars.

Representative WHITE. You see, gentlemen, there is a three-quarters of a billion dollar investment that we have here.

RESTORATION OF HOUSE REDUCTION

You have the lumber and an abundance of lime and material for a cement plant right up there at Orofino, Idaho, just above Lewiston and there are iron and mineral deposits of all kinds to be mined, processed, and floated down this river to the local market in the Columbia Basin and on out to world market by seagoing navigation via Portland. And to think that some little selfish interests in this country would pull a string to block this development, after the project has been authorized by the Congress, after this item was put in the budget and somebody—some Member made an objection and said that it was going to interfere with the migration of fish. They knew very well that the fish are going through the great Bonneville Dam, and they know the plan contains two fish ladders here. That was just a flimsy excuse and, gentlemen of this committee, I do hope that you will restore that $4,000,000 and let us start with this great navigation project that will mean so much in the upbuilding of the Northwest and the whole United States. We have a tremendous interest in the development of this country. If any foreign nation wanted to come in here and take over any of this land, we would stop them with the last drop of blood we have, and yet we stop the development of this great Northwest country with some little quibble over an imaginary barrier to the migration of fish.

I know that fish are important, but they will be taken care of here, and I do hope that you gentlemen will restore this project.

Chairman MCKELLAR. Did the House pass this one?

Representative WHITE. The House did not pass it; they did not have a chance to vote on the appropriation. It was dropped in the committee. It seems the committee took out Ice Harbor on the same old excuse about the fish. That part of the project has all been taken care of. The practicability of fish ladders has been tested by the Army engineers.

Here we have a bird's-eye view of the beautiful city of Portland, right down on the Columbia River, and I also have pictures of boats, navigating the Snake River, actual photographs, gentlemen of the boats going under the drawbridge at Lewiston. We have a picture here of the grain pouring down from the elevators along the river near Lewiston into the boats for transportation down river. They can do it in the high water—let us make it so they can do it all the year around, and at the same time get a multiple use from the dam that will give power where it is needed. You have transportation, power, and flood control—what better investment could we make?

Chairman MCKELLAR. Was there a vote in the House?

Representative WHITE. They did not get a chance to vote this item in the appropriation at all, it was excluded from the bill in the committee. But the House has previously authorized those dams, and this is the map I used before the House and before the committee, to show them what we have at the Columbia Basin—1,200,000 acres of land to be brought in to build up and condensed with communities, and we have you know, our ex-servicemen waiting to get on this land.

Let us lose no time in making the Snake River navigable to get the material down there that we need to build with: Lime, building stone, lumber, and everything that is needed, can be floated right down to the threshhold of the Columbia Basin project at Pasco and Wallula.

Chairman MCKELLAR. I want you to refresh my memory. I have been out there to Seattle and in that country. How far is it from Lewiston to Salem or Portland?

Representative WHITE. It is just an overnight ride by train. It is about 300 miles.

Once that navigation is started, once that material starts to move, the railroads will be the last people who will want to block it.

Chairman MCKELLAR. Are they opposed to it now?

Representative WHITE. I think they are opposed to any competition. They are opposed to building navigation facilities. But it will mean so much to the railroads, because it will develop all of this country and they will get so much more tonnage to the eastern markets out of the Columbia Basin.

Chairman MCKELLAR. I will say this to you, Congressman: We started the same at Muscle Shoals when you were a boy, about 50 years ago. The railroads were very much opposed to those dams, and opposed that very vigorously. In later years, I think due to the building of dams, they have found it very profitable.

Representative WHITE. When you go through Pittsburgh and see the Ohio River and the iron ore and coking material moving to those foundries and realize the commerce the railroads are getting by the manufacture of this raw material, you can see what navigation of the Ohio River means to the railroads.

If you were to stop navigation on the Ohio River today it would ruin the railroads in that area.

NAVIGATION ON COLUMBIA RIVER

Senator KILGORE. Would that be navigable from the mouth of the Columbia River clear up to Lewiston?

Representative WHITE. It would be, and I think the Army will bear me out on that.

Senator KILGORE. I thought there were some terrible falls in there.

Representative WHITE. There is a place we call The Dalles. I do not want to take the time of the committee with a lot of history on this, but I have lived on the upper Columbia all my life. When the great Oregon Trail movement started, and people went into Oregon, about that time they discovered gold in California, and the people with covered wagons settled on the land of the big red apples or went down to dig gold in California. As those countries began to settle up and they needed flour and grain, settlers at Walla Walla and along the river found it was possible to raise wheat by dry farming and they began to raise it. The only way to get their grain to market was to haul it by wagon down to the Columbia River and there they stacked it in sheds along the shore and the boats came along and loaded it to go out to this wonderful market down in Oregon and on down to San Francisco, and that's the way the grain business in this country was started.

They improvised a wooden railroad around the barrier to navigation at The Dalles, and later the Government built Celilo Canal, so that the boats could go through. For years there has been a large amount of traffic on the Snake River in high water, and all we need to do is improve the river for year-round navigation.

I think, gentlemen, if this Congress fully understood the situation it would certainly put in and restore that $4,000,000.

That is all I have to say about that project and I do hope the gentlemen of the committee will give it favorable consideration.

Chairman MCKELLAR. Thank you, Congressman.

The New Dealers, Fair Dealers, or Double Dealers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the New Dealers, Fair Dealers, or double dealers have never yet plugged a leak in any dike. Instead, the New Dealers have opened the floodgates of the Treasury to the whole world. The security of the American citizen is running out in a flood of subsidies and political hand-outs. Under leave to extend, heretofore granted, I am inserting the following editorial in the RECORD:

OUR GREAT DIKE CAN HOLD TOO, IF THE LEAKS ARE PLUGGED NOW

By plugging a small leak in Holland's great dike with his finger until help came, little Peter became a national hero. Had the hole grown larger, the sea wall would have crumbled. Angry waters would have swept over Holland.

America, too, has a great dike which must be held. The dike which protects your security, your savings, your insurance, your comfortable living, and the welfare of your children. We cannot afford leaks in that dike.

AMERICA'S GREAT DIKE IS HER FINANCIAL SECURITY

Even a country as great as ours can spend only what it can collect in taxes. Or what it can borrow on its promise to repay in the future from future taxes. And it can keep on spending only as long as it can keep on taxing and borrowing.

Taxes are already high—today about one-fourth of the average American citizen's income goes for taxes, both direct and hidden. And we've already borrowed so much that our national debt has reached the staggering figure of $258,000,000,000—about $1,700 for every person in America.

WE MUST SPEND FOR PROTECTION

Now we must spend new billions of dollars for building our military might to inspire respect, and, if necessary, fear among those who must be held in check if America and the world are ever to enjoy freedom, security, and peace. We must spend to hold back the spread of communistic dictatorship which means poverty and slavery wherever it prevails.

BUT WE MUST NOT SPEND FOR WHAT WE CAN DO WITHOUT

For truly vital needs, we must spend freely with no thought but final victory. All the more reason, then, to stop the leaks of needless and wasteful spending. Economy need not deprive us of essential services. In fact, it has been estimated that we can save four to five billion dollars a year, just by cutting out the overlapping of governmental departments.

MILLIONS FOR DEFENSE, BUT—

When you, Mr. and Mrs. Citizen, have a big bill to meet you go without luxuries for a while. You practice sensible economy. So there is nothing unpatriotic at a time like this in asking your Government to do the same. Spend to help pay the big bill for defense and the preservation of freedom, but, in all else, economize. Plug the leaks now and help America's great dike of national security to hold firm.

The Three Keys

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, it was in the free state of Trieste a few years ago that I first had the pleasure and honor of meeting Maj. Gen. Bryant E. Moore.

At that time, General Moore was in command of the 5,000 American troops stationed there. Those troops, though mere boys, were among the best our Committee on the Armed Services ever have inspected in any place all over the world.

In spite of their youth, they were highly trained and well disciplined, with the lowest percent of veneral disease of all our troops. They were tough and fearless soldiers, but they were also kind and Christian gentlemen. Their appearance and their conduct were a high compliment to the splendid patriotic officers in their command.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following brief article which appeared in yesterday's This Week Magazine, written by Maj. Gen. Bryant E. Moore, former commander of our troops in Trieste and now Superintendent of the United States Military Academy.

Indeed we are fortunate, as a nation and a people, to have such a man to supervise, train, and direct the efforts of our American youth.

THE THREE KEYS

(By Maj. Gen. Bryant E. Moore, Superintendent, U. S. Military Academy)

In these days, every school—including West Point—has a double duty. One is to train the minds of its students; the other is to help form their character. As knowledge expands that becomes a difficult task. The sheer effort of mastering many complicated subjects tends to crowd out everything else.

That is why we are grateful for the coat of arms of the Military Academy. The motto emblazoned on the scroll consists of three words: Duty, Honor, Country. These are the three keys of character, and for the West Pointer they are an everlasting reminder of the other side of education, a reminder that, in life, a man without character, however clever, is nothing.

Duty, Honor, Country. These are simple, elemental words. They need no interpretation.

Duty goes farther than mere obedience to orders. It implies willingness, loyal execution and the sacrifice of personal interest, if necessary.

Country means more than display of patriotic sentiment. It calls for devotion, whether in the tedium of unspectacular service or the mortal struggle of the battlefield.

Honor is the central and highest word on the scroll. It is the keystone of the arch; for without it, all principles, ideals and beliefs will surely fail.

This trinity of principle is the heritage of the American people. West Point received it from the founders of the Republic—Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson and Monroe—who were also the founders of the Academy. It has been tried in the fire of experience and found equal to the test. It guided West Pointers in war and peace for a century and a half. Grant found in it the key to victory, and Lee the strength to turn bitter defeat to the service of a reunited country. Pershing, Eisenhower and MacArthur drew their power from it.

Duty, Honor, Country. Here are three words to guide both soldier and citizen in these troubled times. They are words to live by.

Investigation of Adequacy of Fuel Supplies in Northeastern States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday I filed House Resolution 851 which would authorize and direct the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, to conduct a full and complete inquiry into the adequacy of fuel supplies in the Northeastern States now and for the coming winter.

The resolution calls for a report of the committee findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem advisable, to the House at the earliest practicable date, but not later than December 15, 1950.

When I filed the resolution, I was aware of the proposal in the other body for such an inquiry by its Select Committee on Small Business, but confined to New England. I also knew that that proposal carried authority to employ on a temporary basis technical, clerical, and other assistants as the committee deemed advisable, and that it provided for the payment of expenses not to exceed $10,000.

It will be recalled that in 1947, and particularly in the early months of 1948, the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce conducted an extensive series of hearings and studies with reference to this same subject matter. These hearings were the logical results of the existing jurisdiction of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of its prior efforts in this field. It led to a very comprehensive report. All of this would obviously serve as a sound foundation upon which to base the suggested inquiry.

It seems to me entirely unnecessary to spend any additional funds in making the inquiry. The committee's staff is thoroughly familiar with this problem and entirely able to assist in developing facts in cooperation with well-informed representatives of the industry and responsible Government departments and officials.

It seemed clear to me that the inquiry should be broadened to at least the question of the adequacy of fuel supplies in the Northeastern States since their problem is very similar to that in New England and the situation in any one of the Northeastern States can very easily reflect itself promptly in the rest of them.

I think it is obvious to all of us that the requirements for our National Defense Establishment can easily bring about a situation which would be most serious so far as the domestic supply of fuels is concerned. In that connection, I wish to include a news account from the Journal of Commerce of September 15 which bears directly upon this problem. It is as follows:

MORE, BETTER GAS, LESS FUEL OIL DUE IF NEW WAR COMES

(By W. M. Jablonski)

ATLANTIC CITY, September 14.—In the event of another world war, civilians can expect more and better quality gasoline than they had during World War II, but will see "deep cuts" in the availability of kerosene, home heating oil and Diesel fuel.

This was indicated here today by a panel of military and industry experts who analyzed the effect of war requirements on petroleum fuels at the National Petroleum Association's forty-eighth annual convention.

AVIATION GASOLINE NEEDS

Members of the panel cautioned that supplying war needs for high quality aviation gasoline, jet propulsion fuels and Navy Diesel oil would pose difficult and complex problems and would require rationing of civilian use of gasoline, heating fuels, and other oils.

"If an all-out war comes," said C. M. Larson, chief consulting engineer of Sinclair Refining Co., "constructive controls will be needed to avoid chaotic scarcity of oil products."

He said that war needs for large quantities of jet fuel would "bite deeply" into kerosene, range oil and No. 1 fuel production—affecting not only the quantity but the quality of fuel available for space heaters, Diesel engine and farm tractor users.

DIESEL FUEL SUPPLY

City Diesel powered busses, for instance, will have to learn to use higher end point Diesel fuels even though the exhaust smoke level does go up slightly, he observed. As for the large need for light distillate type farm tractor fuel, gasoline will have to take its place.

The Sinclair official also noted that some homes would probably be converted to gas, though he said this probably would not offer a large avenue for oil saving.

GASOLINE OUTLOOK

A much rosier gasoline outlook was painted by both industry and military representatives. Officials of Ethyl Corp. and E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.—the Nation's two manufacturers of tetraethyl lead—reported that production capacity of this antiknock motor fuel compound has been boosted 75 percent since World War II, and that further expansion was under way.

"It is clear," said Dr. Graham Edgar, vice president of Ethyl, "that any military needs will be easily taken care of, and that the capacity available for use in civilian gasoline will be several times that which was available in World War II. A substantially higher antiknock quality can, therefore, be expected for civilian gasoline than in World War II * * * and probably quite adequate for the great majority of cars."

CIVILIAN OCTANE CUTBACK

Concurring with this view, J. R. Sabina, technical manager for du Pont, said that even maximum military aviation gasoline demand would only cut back civilian gasoline some 4 octanes because of the greater lead available. This, he pointed out, would merely mean a rollback to the octane levels of civilian gasoline of a few years back.

Dr. Edgar expressed doubt that military demand for tetraethyl lead would exceed that of World War II in view of the increasing importance of jet fuels which do not require this compound. A relatively small war, such as that in Korea, has hardly a measurable effect on the civilian supply situation.

Col. Ray W. Whitson, chief of the technical branch of the Munitions Board petroleum committee, said his board estimated that the lowest civilian grade gasoline would drop in a war would be to 74 octane motor method and 76 octane research method. This compares with 78.8 octane motor method and 84.3 research method for regular grade motor fuel at present and to 70 octane in the last war.

These estimates, the colonel reported, call for the use of the maximum allowable of 3 milliliters of lead per gallon, about 11 percent of catalytic cracked stock, and the remainder straight run, thermal cracked and natural gasoline. Present regular grade gasoline includes 2.1 milliliters lead and 28 percent catalytic cracked stocks, while premium includes 2.4 milliliters lead, 59 percent catalytic stock and 2 percent alkylates.

AVGAS PROBLEM

Contrary to popular impression the "No. 1 problem on the priority list will be high octane aviation gasoline," not jet fuel, T. L. Apjohn of Socony-Vacuum Laboratories told the meeting.

"Reciprocal engines are a long way from being obsolete," he pointed out, "while both the quality and quantity of high octane fuel will be higher than in the last war because of the use of larger and heavier planes."

One barrel of 115/145 grade aviation gasoline now being used requires twice as much alkylate as the 110/130 grade used in the last war, he explained. Alkylate is already critically short.

Mr. Apjohn listed problems facing the industry in also supplying aromatic blending components and other feed stocks for aviation gasoline and outlined various steps that would have to be taken to meet these needs.

JET FUEL NEEDS

He admitted that supplying any large quantities of jet fuel would also present tough headaches, but pointed out that these did not include any "major processing problems."

"Supplying the Air Forces will be the chief difficulty," the Socony official noted. "Demand from the ground and sea forces probably will be only nominally greater than in the last war and we should be able to take care of these needs with the refinery capacity added in the past few years."

Dr. Gustav Egloff, director of research, Universal Oil Products Co., emphasized the importance of the oil industry being advised of the military's needs as promptly as possible.

"There is no question that the industry will cooperate with the military as successfully as in the last war when all our Armed Forces' needs were met on schedule," he said. "But we cannot simply push a button and have tailor-made products rolling in a day if we have no advance information of what will be needed."

I am also including a news account in the same issue of the Journal of Commerce with reference to the admirable and entirely proper appeal by the Navy for a foresighted and constructive policy as to meeting its requirements. Certainly the responsible committee in the House should be equally alert to the probabilities of the requirements not only of the armed services, but of the industrial production which is vital to victory, and to those of the civilian economy.

NAVY ASKS PREPAREDNESS FOR ITS FUEL OIL NEEDS

ATLANTIC CITY, September 14.—The Navy appealed today to all oil refineries to be prepared to manufacture fuel oil meeting Navy specifications.

Capt. W. C. Lathrobe of the Standards and Specifications Division, Bureau of Ships, told the National Petroleum Association meeting here that in the last few years many refiners have indicated they no longer have a fuel oil meeting the Navy's approved list.

I feel that it should be a part of your policy to be abreast of the requirements for stable, compatible boiler fuel at all times; particularly during these troubled times.

This is an appeal.

I want to make it clear that I would have no objection whatever to broadening the area of the inquiry if my colleagues from other sections of the country feel it would be desirable to do so.

Sees Truman To Blame for More Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, Frank R. Kent is one of our greatest political and economic writers. He is not without interest in religion and things spiritual.

For years Frank Kent has been one of our leading columnists for the Baltimore Sun and the Washington, D. C., Evening Star. He has been a Democrat most of his life but long ago saw the political trickery, economic fallacy and spiritual decay of the Democratic Party.

Without venom or revenge, but with a desire to tell the truth and speak objectively, he comments on the great issues that confront the American people.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following enlightening article which appeared in yesterday's Washington (D. C.) Sunday Star:

TRUMAN TO BLAME FOR MORE INFLATION

(By Frank R. Kent)

The White House attitude toward inflation, which many feel to be our most dangerous enemy, is not such as to inspire confidence. The acts of the administration not only clash with its words but seem clearly designed to promote rather than restrain inflation. In addition, they certainly have a high political flavor.

In a time of national peril, this is a serious charge. But the apparent intention of Mr. Truman not to use—at least until after the election—the great powers which Congress has given him to keep prices down seems to leave no other possible conclusion. A review of the facts makes this plain. In the first place, the President did not ask for the full powers voted him. He got them not because he wanted them but because in his remarkable illuminating statement before a Senate committee, B. M. Baruch not only made clear the frightful consequences of uncontrolled inflation but again reiterated the obvious and uncontrovertible facts that prices cannot be controlled unless food costs, profits, and wages are controlled at the same time.

It is, he pointed out, absurd to deal with inflation piecemeal. Ceilings must be put over everything—and without delay—to be effective. Failure to deal firmly with wages had added a hundred billions to the cost of the last war, prolonged it by 6 months and greatly increased our casualties. No one—not even Mr. Truman's Council of Economic Advisers—disputed Mr. Baruch's facts, and they made so deep an impression on Congress and the country that by an overwhelming vote the former passed the bill giving Mr. Truman full powers to do what clearly should be done. Never before has the Congress voted a President comparable powers without being asked. Never before has a President had such powers forced on him. Never before has Congress shown more eagerness than the President for the imposition of economic controls in a crisis. Never before has the country evinced a greater desire to be put under economic control than the President proposed.

Why, then, is the accusation now made that the President does not intend to use these powers until after the election—if then? Why is it charged that politics is influencing the President's course?

Primarily, this is because of the extraordinary way in which Mr. Truman avoids any save the vaguest mention of wages in his talk about controlling inflation. Not once has he said a single, firm, unequivocal word about wages; not once did he suggest to Congress that he wanted authority to deal with wages, as well as other things.

The Presidential shying away from this vital subject is given added significance by four things: (1) The absolute unity among the labor bosses in opposing any wage control of any kind at this time; (2) their equal unity in pressing for further wage increases before the election; (3) Mr. Truman's frequent conferences with Jack Kroll, head of the CIO's political-action department, and his recent off-the-record dinner meeting with some 50 of the labor bosses; (4) the almost complete dependence of the Democratic Party on the organized-labor vote—New York is the most notable example—and the consequent subserviency of the national Democratic leaders to the labor demands; (5) the militant prounion attitude of the Secretary of Labor.

Considering all this, the present conviction that Mr. Truman will do little, beyond making gestures, to combat inflation in the next 2 months is not surprising. The new law ties prices and wages together and requires control of both. If, as is evident, no move is to be made to control wages, then both will be postponed. In a recent issue the authoritative United States News asserts that "the decision appears to have been reached to permit inflation to run a full new round before setting up any real resistance." "A full new round of wage rises," it declares, "is to be permitted before any controls are clamped upon wages and prices. This will carry retail prices up by 10 percent." Considering the heights which these have already reached, this is a rather appalling prospect.

Justice Douglas in Iran

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Washington, D. C., Star of Sunday, September 17, 1950:

JUSTICE DOUGLAS IN IRAN

If reports from Tehran are accurate, this country is being poorly served by the Iranian peregrinations of William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. Further—again if the reports are accurate—it seems fair to say that he would be displaying more common sense than he appears to have been displaying if he stopped making speeches over there, put a halt to his vacation travels and headed back home without further delay.

For Justice Douglas, according to a dispatch to the New York Times, has been doing anything but making friends for the United States among the Iranians. To begin with, many of the country's newspapers (not just the leftist ones) apparently feel there is considerable truth in the Soviet canard that his visits to the provinces are part of an imperialistic American plot in which he is stirring up trouble and intrigue among the tribes. So a lot of editors are angrily inveighing against him in a way that hardly reflects credit on his qualifications to play the role of a good-will ambassador.

Of course, nothing could be sillier than the idea that Justice Douglas is engaged—as the Moscow propagandists say—in an international conspiracy. Nevertheless, even to those Iranians who realize the absurdity of that charge, the statements he has been making over there must be more than a little irritating. Thus, for example, in a speech at Tehran, he seems to have taken it upon himself, in what sounds like a patronizing manner, to lecture the country with such gemlike remarks as these. "Iran should work out its destiny according to its own genius, perhaps 10 percent communism, 15 percent capitalism and 75 percent something else. In an agricultural land like Persia you can guarantee men the right to work. It is simple. All you have to do is to make the peasant the landlord."

In connection with these remarks, it should be observed, as the Times dispatch reports, that the question of land reform is about the hottest and most complex political issue now troubling Iran. Needless to say, therefore, Justice Douglas must have rubbed a great deal of fur the wrong way with his somewhat know-it-all statement that the "simple" solution to it, and to the Communist threat, is to make every peasant a king by making him a landlord. Even if the problem were as easy as that—which is not the case—a member of our highest court is speaking out of his province in telling the Iranians how to mind their own business.

It is not a completely rare phenomenon for average American tourists, when they toss care to the winds in foreign lands, to do and say things that are occasionally less sensible. That is to be expected. But when the traveler is a member of the Supreme Court of the States, his host country cannot be blamed if it takes a dim view of the kind of injudiciousness that has been attributed to Justice Douglas. In Iran, according to the Times story, "his visit has created considerable ill-will." If so, the sooner it ends, the better.

Distribution of Surplus Food Commodities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 14, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, the remarkably sudden developments before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with reference to H. R. 9313 on Friday constitutes an interesting chapter in the effort to see that the surplus food commodities, now stored in gigantic quantities by the Federal Government, threatened with spoilage, and costing the taxpayers more than $60,000 a day for unnecessary carrying charges, are turned over to people who could eat them but who cannot afford to buy them.

On September 1 I wrote to the President and to Secretary Brannan, urging that each take the most vigorous kind of action to insure that the bill which the House passed unanimously on August 22 was brought before the Senate promptly for action there. I placed copies of those letters in the Appendix of the RECORD at page A6319.

On Friday I was shown a copy of a letter that the President sent to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and I want to make it readily available to all my colleagues who have shared in this effort. It is as follows:

SEPTEMBER 14, 1950.

DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: Under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, this Government has made certain perishable surplus commodities available to public and private welfare agencies at home and abroad. Dried milk, dried eggs, cheese and butter acquired under our price support program and not salable on the open market, have been offered to these agencies without charge, in order to forestall spoilage and waste.

We have done this because it makes no sense for the Government to store surpluses which cannot be sold and will surely spoil, while there are people in our own country or overseas who badly need the food.

Unfortunately, the welfare and relief organizations to whom we have offered these surpluses have often been unable to pay the cost of transporting the food from Government warehouses to distribution and shipping points. Transportation within the United States has been a particular problem for relief agencies overseas. As a result, our gifts have been refused in many cases, and the Government has had no choice but to continue to store the food.

In order to remedy this situation, the House of Representatives recently passed a bill, H. R. 9313, which is now pending before the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee. This bill would authorize the Government to pay costs of transportation in cases of this kind from storage to central distribution points for domestic use and to ports for shipment overseas. The appropriate public and private agencies would be expected to pay for further shipment and handling.

The school-lunch program and the Federal Government's other welfare activities would be the first to benefit. State, local, and private relief organizations would also be assisted. The agencies of the United Nations and the many private groups contributing to the welfare of those in need abroad would be helped greatly. This will not be a costly program. It is no more expensive to ship dried eggs and milk, for example, than to carry them in storage for months on end.

We have a statute on the books permitting us to give these perishable foods to those in need. We ought at once to take the necessary steps to put this authority into effect and get these surpluses where they will do some good. As I recall, you were the principal sponsor of this program of surplus disposal. I hope it will be possible for your committee to follow up on the original law by reporting H. R. 9313 to the Senate in time for final congressional action at the current session.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

Mr. Speaker, although I had not received any acknowledgment of my letter of September 1 to the President, I felt it would be advisable to write to him with reference to this letter and to again urge the speediest possible action in making certain that this bill becomes law in the very near future. That letter reads as follows:

SEPTEMBER 15, 1950.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You will recall that I wrote you on September 1, 1950, urging that you request the proper persons in the Senate to bring about speedy action on H. R. 9313 and on the same date I wrote to Secretary Brannan requesting the same action. Although I have not received any reply, I was delighted today to read a copy of your letter of yesterday to Senator THOMAS and to learn this morning that Secretary Brannan would appear before the Senate committee.

As you know, I have repeatedly pointed out that it makes no sense for the Government to store surpluses which cannot be sold and will surely spoil while there are people in our country or overseas who badly need the food I have also called your attention many times to the obvious fact that it is no more expensive to ship dried eggs and milk, for example, than to carry them in storage for months on end. This applies equally to butter, cheese, and other commodities which the Federal Government is storing in inconceivably large quantities. According to reports of the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Federal Government has wasted a total of $21,088,580.40 for unnecessary carrying charges on 16 food commodities between February 2, 1950, when I introduced H. R. 7137 upon which H. R. 9313 is based and June 30, 1950.

I was delighted to learn this noon that the Senate committee has reported favorably on H. R. 9313. I hope you will continue to extend every effort to see that this bill becomes law immediately.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. HESELTON

Mr. Speaker, while it was impossible this afternoon to obtain definite information as to the final congressional action on this bill, I do hope that efforts will be made by all who are interested to bring that about.

Frank Pace, Jr., Secretary of the Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON
OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 18 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in times of crisis such as these it is inspiring and encouraging to find young men of ability and capacity serving the Nation in positions of great responsibility.

One of the most effective young men in public life today is the Secretary of the Army, Frank Pace, Jr. Those who have had an opportunity to observe Secretary Pace's work, especially in recent weeks, have been inspired by the high caliber of his performance, the breadth of his vision, and the efficiency of his administration.

The New York Times magazine of Sunday, September 17, presented a very fine report of Secretary Pace's service during the past few years. I ask unanimous consent to place this article in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AND NOW IT'S PACE OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY

(By Megruder Doble)

WASHINGTON.—If the Soviet Foreign Office ever holds a post mortem to determine why the United States reacted with such unexpected speed and firmness to the invasion of South Korea it may well take note of an informal dinner party held in the Georgetown section of Washington on the night of June 24, 1950. Among the guests were Assistant Secretary of State Dean Rusk, who specializes in far-eastern affairs, and handsome, 38-year-old Frank Pace, Jr., of Little Rock, Ark., the new Secretary of the Army.

Dinner was over. The men had finished their brandy and cigars and were about to join the ladies when the State Department duty officer called Mr. Rusk to the telephone and read the historic dispatch from Ambassador John J. Muccio, in Seoul, Korea. Mumbling apologies to their host, Rusk and Pace grabbed their hats and tore down to the State Department. Pace thought for a moment of continuing across the river to his own office in the Pentagon. But the b'g news was coming in at State. For the time being, at least, military action would follow diplomatic developments.

A man who saw Pace swing into action as soon as he reached a State Department phone said later that the Secretary grabbed the responsibility of getting our military machine into gear without orders from anyone. He contacted the Army for corroborating evidence of the Korean attack, then telephoned Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson, the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the offices of the Secretaries of the Navy and Air Force. The Army put through its first call to General MacArthur, and the machine began to roll.

In the days that followed, Pace attended the Blair House conferences which led to the President's decision to fight for Korea. Mr. Truman relied heavily on his protege, Frank Pace, who had worked so closely with the President when Pace was Director of the Bureau of the Budget. Pace, in fact, emerged as the unofficial chief liaison man between the White House and the Pentagon, and his private line to the President's office became one of the busiest in Washington.

During the first few weeks of the Korean crisis the Army held its telecon conferences with General MacArthur in a well-guarded room in the Pentagon at 2 o'clock in the morning. Pace attended the conferences regularly. Sometimes he caught a few hours of sleep after dinner, after which he would return to the Pentagon for the conference and then work right through the rest of the night. At other times, he would not leave his office until after the conference. He needed every moment he could spare to direct the mobilization of an Army saddled with a job for which it was unprepared. Six weeks after the war began Pace finally took a few hours off, remarking to a friend that this was the first time he had not spent almost the entire day in his office.

By now, the Secretary's schedule has settled down to a 10- or 12-hour stint, with an occasional break at lunch for a quick game of tennis. The outer offices of his Pentagon headquarters bustles with unceasing activity. Lights flash. Telephones ring. A squawk box sends out a call for an Assistant Secretary. Gen. J. Lawton Collins, the Chief of Staff, pops in from his adjoining office with a sheaf of top-secret papers under his arm. A major arrives with a carefully folded chart of Korea, ready to brief the Secretary on the latest front-line developments. An Air Force captain, just back from Korea, comes in with instructions from Air Force Secretary Thomas K. Finletter to give Mr. Pace the latest reports on tactical air support. Secretary Johnson's office calls to remind Mr. Pace of an important meeting at 4:30.

"We've got the toughest job in the Pentagon," says an officer on the Secretary's staff. "We've got a million people, uniformed and civilian, to look after, and billions of dollars in equipment, supplies, and services. Besides fighting, we have to know procurement and transportation, storage, distribution. Our management and accounting procedures are more complex than those of the largest industries. We run probably the biggest educational system in the world. We keep tabs on our own medical and hospital system, our own police, our own court system and worldwide communications network. We are swamped with occupation responsibilities to the east and the west. We even run our own railroads—and, as of now, other people's too."

The officer paused for breath. "But don't think we're complaining," he added. "We've got the hottest administrator in Washington working for us now. Our boss is really a 'wheel.'"

The Secretary of the Army, even if he is one of the most energetic, is not the youngest to hold the job. John C. Calhoun was only 35, John McAllister Schofield was 36, and Robert Todd Lincoln, 37. But Pace looks even younger than his 38 years. He has a lanky, athletic build, dark hair, a rather long face with clean-cut features and slightly protruding ears. In the Washington heat, when his seersucker suit is mussed, when his straw hat is pushed to the back of his head, and his Arkansas drawl drags a bit more than usual, Pace could pass for a wide-eyed tourist from his home town of Little Rock. In the cooler months he wears expensive, well-tailored clothes. The stamp of his Hill School-Princeton-Harvard background is unmistakable. He is suave and assured. He has charmed many a hostess at Newport and other fashionable resorts with his smooth southern manners.

Pace was never in better form than when he was sworn in in April with the usual ceremonies at the Pentagon. He took the oath in a loud, clear voice, then turned to his friends and delivered exactly the kind of speech which most public officials dream of making in such circumstances, but seldom do.

He spoke of his affection for President Truman and promised to give "unstintingly of whatever competency I possess." He ended with a perfect tribute to his wife, the former Margaret Janney, of Philadelphia, acknowledging that everything he was he owed to her. Spoken by a less skillful orator this statement might have sounded a bit "corny." Frank Pace said it just right.

When the show was over the officers and civilians who work in the Army Secretary's office agreed that their new boss had plenty of polish. They wondered what sort of administrator he would make.

They received their first hint a few days later when a colonel on the general staff asked for 30 minutes of the Secretary's time to get his decision on a complicated aspect of a reorganization plan. With due consideration for the fact that he was addressing a newcomer to the Pentagon, the colonel began slowly, patiently sketching the background of the plan.

"I don't want to interrupt your story," Pace broke in with a smile, "but I remember something about this plan from hearings at the Budget Bureau."

The Secretary then gave an accurate and comprehensive résumé of the project, listened briefly to the wide-eyed colonel's recommendation, and made his decision. The colonel had his answer in 8 minutes instead of 30.

Near the end of his first week in office, work piled up faster than Pace could handle it. By lunch time he was swamped with papers and problems, and at 2 o'clock he was scheduled to address another indoctrination course for visiting VIP's. Under similar circumstances many an executive would have foregone lunch and plowed ahead, trying to think clearly with a clouded brain. Frank Pace grabbed his hat, hurried over to the tennis courts at the Army-Navy Country Club and played two fast sets of singles. He was back in the Pentagon, munching a sandwich, when his press officer came dashing up with a batch of warmed-over speeches for the Secretary to choose from before addressing the VIP's. Pace waved the speeches aside. Promptly at 2 o'clock he stood up before his audience and gracefully ad libbed without a break.

Close teamwork exists between the Secretary and his chief of staff. After a meeting of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Collins usually gives the Secretary a detailed briefing of what transpired. In turn, Pace, who maintains close liaison with Congress, the Budget Bureau, the Navy and Air Force Departments, and especially the Secretary of Defense's office, keeps his chief of staff informed as to what the civilian heads are thinking and doing.

The Defense Secretary's office is approximately a fourth of the distance around the Pentagon Building from Pace's office. Pace made it a practice to see Louis Johnson, who, as Defense Secretary, was his boss, at least once a day and often lunched with him and other Pentagon officials.

Pace had met Johnson at the White House and Budget Bureau on frequent occasions before coming to the Pentagon. The two men also shared an interest in the legal profession. Pace called his former boss "Louis"—in fact, he calls almost everyone by his first name.

The President once said that anyone who could master the Budget Bureau job could hold any post in Washington. Pace more than mastered it. He made some lasting contributions toward doing the job more effectively. He published the first Budget in Brief which condensed the meat of t' e regular 400-page budget document into a 44-page pamphlet, written in layman's language and illustrated with understandable graphs. He tightened the liaison of divisions within the bureau, implemented his predecessor's policy of interesting young men in budget work, pushed reforms outlined by the Hoover Commission, and traveled around the country to address clubs and schools on the need for clearer public understanding of the administration's fiscal policy.

Old friends who have known Frank Pace since he went tearing through the streets of Little Rock in one of Eddie Rickenbacker's high-powered autos contend that the Budget Bureau job was the first one into which Pace threw all of his energy and talent. Previously, his friends say, he had divided his time about equally between work and play.

He graduated from high school in Little Rock at 14 and went on to Hill School. At Princeton he was a promising golfer, a rather indifferent student, and an unsuspectingly skillful bridge player who financed several trips to Bermuda with his bridge earnings.

Pace graduated from Harvard Law School in 1936. He pleaded a tax case before the United States Supreme Court when he was only 27 He lost the case, but favorably impressed Chief Justice Hughes, who called him "my dear young Senator." Before the Arkansas supreme court pace won 20 out of 21 cases.

The war interrupted Pace's legal career. He entered the Army as a first lieutenant and came out a major. He spent most of his time in desk jobs for the Air Transport Command and was in Washington when the war ended. He stayed on, first as a special assistant in the Department of Justice, and then as assistant to the late Bob Hannegan at the Post Office Department.

While running political errands for the Postmaster General, Pace made a favorable impression on James E. Webb, who was then Director of the Bureau of the Budget and was looking for an understudy. Webb offered Pace a job, provided he agreed to curtail his extensive social and athletic activities and immerse himself in the anonymity of the Budget Bureau.

The new Secretary of the Army is an excellent golfer and shoots in the low 70's. He once qualified for the national amateur championship, and has twice been low scorer in the Government officials' class at the National Celebrities Golf Tournament in Washington. He has won the National Press Club tennis tournament—although this feat hardly qualifies him for national ranking. He has played in national squash tournaments. Until recently he carried a small rubber ball in the palm of his hand which he squeezed to develop his arm muscles. He does not smoke or drink coffee, but keeps a jar of hard candy in a drawer of his desk.

The fact is, whatever Frank Pace does, he does well. Even on the rare occasions when he falters, he falters gracefully.

While serving as Budget Director, Pace, in the interest of economy, proposed that medical care for dependents of service personnel be curtailed. He also advocated reduction of the number of veterans' beds in hospitals. The Army, Navy, and Air Force howled with indignation. These proposals were not forgotten when Pace moved over to the Pentagon, but he parried questions with a neat little speech to the effect that his views as Budget Director no longer applied and that he came to the Army with no preconceived notions as to how it should be operated.

In 1947, when he was with the Post Office Department, Pace headed a delegation of postal officials to the Universal Postal Conference in Paris. As usual, he spurned a written speech when he left his hotel to address the delegates in the Grand Palais. However, just before entering the hall Pace was informed that all speeches were to be given in French.

The future Secretary of the Army had not encountered the French language to any extent since leaving high school in Little Rock. But he struck out boldly, waving his long arms in expressive pantomime when his limited vocabulary failed him. After he finished the delegates applauded heartily and pressed around to offer congratulations. A Canadian was the first to pump his hand.

"Frank, you were magnificent," the Canadian said. "Your French was so atrocious we listened to every word."

Military Preparedness—Report of Special Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a very able article entitled "An Example of Congress at Its Best," written by Arthur Krock and published in the New York Times of September 19, 1950. The article deals with the very fine work of the Johnson Committee on Military Preparedness.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN EXAMPLE OF CONGRESS AT ITS BEST

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, September 18.—In the rush of dramatic events not very much attention has been paid to the first report on preparedness made by a group of seven Senators under the chairmanship of LYNDON B. JOHNSON of Texas and the guidance of Donald C. Cook, chief counsel. Yet this report is a model of its kind in that (1) it is unaffected by partisan or political considerations; (2) goes to the heart of the subject of military surplus disposal and rubber stockpiling; and (3) gives specific instances of sleeping bureaucracy and the successful methods employed to awaken it to the fact that the cold war ended June 25, 1950, with the invasion of South Korea by a Russian-trained satellite army equipped with modern Russian arms.

The seven Senators, a division of the Armed Services Committee, are all practicing politicians. Four are Democrats and three are Republicans. But in this first report of activities patterned on those of the special committee which, headed by the then Senator Truman, watchdogged our military-production program during the Second World War, there is not a trace of the political animation by which, for example, democratic executives are taken care of by democratic legislators and their lapses are magnified by Republican legislators.

The subcommittee found, in effect, that the vast organization dealing with surplus disposal, rubber production and other matters made critical by the Korean war was proceeding at certain points on the continuing basis of the postwar policy of general demobilization. It began to prod, inquire, complain and then demand changes in this policy and reversals of acts accomplished or projected. And its accomplishments as set forth in the report are both real and substantial.

CREDIT TO THE MINORITY

A striking illustration of the nonpartisan thinking of the subcommittee with its Democratic chairman and majority was given by the following section of the report:

The subcommittee's interest in this matter [disposition of Government-owned industrial plants and other property as surplus] was in many ways the outgrowth of the interest which Senator BRIDGES * * * had displayed in the subject prior to the organization of the subcommittee. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Senator BRIDGES had been disturbed by a request for appropriations for items by one agency without any check as to whether at the same time such items were in surplus in the hands of other agencies

He told the subcommittee that various surplus items were being offered for sale at a time when it appears that their productive capacity was necessary for the use of the Government.

These items ranged from industrial plants and their facilities to unused airplane motors and like material. The subcommittee followed a number of such trails—important among which was one pointed out by a constituent to Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia—and reported them to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the National Security Resources Board, the Munitions Board, the three armed services, Secretary of Defense Johnson, and many others. When it did not get action, or was not informed of action that had been taken, the subcommittee got out its prod, sharpened the point and plunged it into the seat of bureaucracy.

THE MUNITIONS BOARD

One of its principal targets was the Munitions Board, whose Chairman's resignation today was made immediately effective by the President. The Board was commissioned by the Secretary of Defense to pass on all sales of property in the national industrial reserve (plants and facilities essential to military preparedness), and to determine whether to keep, change, or in any instance remove the national security clause which guarantees that anything sold will remain available for national defense. "Since the Korean attack," the subcommittee reported, "at least five properties in the reserve have been sold or have been in the process of sale, one of them without even a national security clause. * * * The subcommittee will likewise investigate the basis for a declaration of the Munitions Board that it believes in continued sale of Government-owned industrial plants in these times so long as there are provisions for Government use of the property if needed."

Secretary Johnson, Chairman Symington of the NSRB, and Hise, of the RFC, and other officials bombarded by the subcommittee were credited with prompt and effective cooperation. And it may well be that some of those criticized have a better case than appeared to the subcommittee. But more important is the demonstration that it has fixed on sound objectives and is pursuing them diligently, logically, and without political concern.

Here are some of its maxims:

"Our vision must extend beyond Korea. It must be realized in all disposal and planning programs that we face the distinct threat of a war of attrition, in which the total resources and the total productivity of the Nation must be kept constantly available. The sale of Government property as surplus cannot be countenanced if it is usable in our preparedness effort. We cannot with good sense continue old demobilization activities while at the same time undertaking a great new mobilization effort. We believe there is sufficient organizational ability and imagination in this country to prevent the Government from buying and selling the same commodity at approximately the same time."

The Senators From Wyoming

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "An Example of Teamwork," written by R. F. MacPherson and published in the Wyoming Eagle, of Cheyenne, Wyo., on September 15, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

According to press reports, the United States Senate has feuds comparable to that of the Hatfields and McCoys in Kentucky.

In contrast to this bickering and backbiting, Wyoming provides a shining example of teamwork. No two United States Senators work together as consistently and harmoniously in behalf of their State as do Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY and Senator L. C. HUNT.

Two years ago Senator HUNT in his campaign stressed the benefit that would accrue to Wyoming by having two Senators of the same political faith who would cooperate—quite a contrast to the conditions that existed for 6 years when one Senator voted with and associated with the eastern old guard.

On one or two occasions the Wyoming press as well as Republican leadership in this State have cited instances where the two Wyoming Senators voted differently on two or three measures. They play these votes up as something sinister, almost a national disaster. Apparently they think Wyoming should be represented by two "yes" men, two puppets who think alike, look alike, and act alike.

A man qualified to occupy a seat in the United States Senate should have a mind of his own, forming his own opinions, making his own decisions, and voting as his conscience dictates. Wyoming now has two Senators of that type. So it is remarkable, almost miraculous, how frequently these two men agree, how rarely they appear on opposite sides of the many matters with which they have to deal.

Generally speaking, Senator O'MAHONEY and Senator HUNT have voted on 100 bills and amendments. Yet they did not differ on more than four or five. And on matters affecting Wyoming, and much vital legislation affects this State, they invariably agree. And when one Wyoming Senator encounters lassitude or opposition, making it difficult to attain the desired results, the other Wyoming Senator, who probably is extraordinarily busy with other matters, comes to his aid and between the two they get the job done.

In all essential matters there is cooperation. Wyoming furnishes the Nation a sterling example of teamwork in the United States Senate.

American Dollars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY CORDON

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a most pertinent and common-sense editorial written by Albert S. Goss, Master of the National Grange, entitled "Dollars," and appearing in the National Grange Monthly. The editorial warrants the attention of all thinking people. As Mr. A. W. Prescott, of Warrenton, Oreg., said of the editorial, "It's a corker."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOLLARS

(By Albert S. Goss)

All the world is trying to earn American dollars. It was generally assumed that when Europe could return to normal production, trade would pick up, and by exporting their products to America, European nations could secure dollars with which to buy American goods. The first efforts of the ECA, therefore, were devoted to restoring production. These efforts have been extraordinarily successful. Most of the European industries are now producing at substantially above prewar level. The United Kingdom is close to 40 percent above prewar level and just about everyone in England is busy.

There are ample markets in sterling-bloc countries, but British manufacturers are finding it very difficult to invade American markets and earn American dollars because their production costs are too high.

The Socialist government which started out by promising everyone more income for less work has found that less work increases costs, and more income at government expense increases taxes, both of which lead to less work has found that less work increases the difficulties of earning dollars by selling goods to America. This was temporarily met last year by devaluing the pound from $4.03 to $2.80, but this provided only a temporary respite. It has meant lower standards of living and the people have demanded more pay to maintain the artificial standards inaugurated by the new government. Gradually the government is coming to grips with the problem, but as people begin to realize that they have been duped, the government's control becomes difficult to maintain. A recent majority of one vote in Parliament saved the government from falling.

In the meantime the government is still promoting its program of austerity in the hope that the people will come to learn that sooner or later they must earn what they get. A recent example of the type of austerity is the increase in the gasoline tax to 42 cents per gallon which became effective June 1. Sometimes a commonplace item like that brings home to the American people what the people of the United Kingdom are going through better than by reading some learned economic analyses. Why so many people in America want to follow the same route still remains a mystery.

Justice for Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, at the request of my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, remarks on the subject of Justice for Poland, transcribed by him for a radio program sponsored by the western Massachusetts branch of the Polish American Congress, Inc.

Mr. President, so thoroughly do I concur with my distinguished colleague that I desire to be associated with all that his message implies.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUSTICE FOR POLAND

(By Senator H. ALEXANDER SMITH)

It is a real privilege to be invited by the Western Massachusetts Branch of the Polish American Congress to talk to you briefly about Justice for Poland. It is especially significant, I think, that so many of our distinguished citizens of Polish extraction are determined to acquaint their fellow Americans with the free, cultural, and political background of Poland. Many people in America are inclined to take for granted the basic principles of freedom and justice on which our democratic form of government is based and without which it cannot survive. There never was a time in the history of the world when it was more important for those who enjoy the fruits of freedom to assume their God-given responsibility to prevent that freedom from being destroyed.

No country has suffered more for the cause of freedom than has Poland. The Polish struggle for independence has always been characterized by fierce determination against tremendous odds. This struggle is continuing today against the most dangerous threat to freedom the world has ever known—world communism as interpreted by the Kremlin. It is vitally important, I think, for us to understand the reason why there is no freedom in Poland today, and to see clearly what the Polish fight for freedom means to people all over the world.

On September 1, 1939, just 11 years ago, the Nazi army launched its brutal invasion of Poland from the west. Then on September 17, in accordance with a secret German-Soviet agreement, the Russian Army invaded Poland from the east. The Polish people fought fanatically for their freedom, but they fought alone. Within a few days the Russians stood at the gates of Warsaw while the heroic defenders of the city were wiped out by the Nazis. The two invaders promptly and brazenly divided Poland between themselves in the fourth partition of that unfortunate country that has occurred since 1772.

It is well for us to remember why it was that Poland had to stand alone and hopelessly outnumbered in 1939. Subsequent to the First World War the League of Nations had been established for the peaceful solution of world problems. But for all practical purposes, the League of Nations had already died by 1939. Because of its failure to take effective action in Manchuria, in Ethiopia, and in Spain, it had completely lost the confidence of its members. International cooperation to prevent aggression through the League had been discredited. The United States had not yet awakened to its responsibilities as a world power and a defender of freedom. And so it was that Hitler and Stalin were able to carry out their diabolical plot against Poland while the rest of the world stood helplessly by and watched a noble, freedom-loving people bludgeoned into submission.

Of course, the subsequent defeat of Germany in World War II did not bring relief to stricken Poland. The world was told that Poland would once again be free and independent. But it has been perfectly clear for some time that the Russian promises to allow the inclusion of democratic elements in the Polish Government, and to guarantee free elections and freedom of the press, were empty and cynical pledges which they had no intention of fulfilling. Under Russian rule Poland has remained a land of lingering fear and slavery, drained of its strength by its Soviet masters, crippled by purges and tyranny.

This tragic story of Poland should constantly remind the freedom-loving world of two very important lessons. First, it should impress upon our minds the necessity of international cooperation and action through the United Nations to prevent aggression and to protect the independence of small nations. And it should also be an everlasting reminder that when the Russians speak of democracy and promise freedom they are in reality thinking of tyranny and promising slavery.

Many noble Polish patriots died to teach us these lessons. Certainly the Communist aggression in Korea has reiterated them, and, I hope, indicated clearly that we have finally learned them.

Let us consider for a moment what would have happened in Korea if there had been no United Nations. Any action taken to prevent the aggression by the Communists would have necessarily been unilateral action by the United States, or, at best, joint action by the United States and a few of our allies. Under these circumstances, I doubt very much if such action would have been taken. We know now that without help Korea would have been completely subjugated within a matter of days, since the South Korean army was totally unprepared to combat the heavy armament that the Russians had given to the Communists and trained them to use.

If they had gained a quick and easy victory in Korea, the Russians would undoubtedly have followed up this success with similar aggressive moves all over the world. When the other nations finally awoke it would have been too late.

And so it seems particularly appropriate that we recall today the reasons for the success of the Nazi-Soviet invasion of Poland, and the tremendous change wrought by the creation of the United Nations and by our determination and the determination of the freedom-loving nations of the world to act with courage and with speed through the United Nations to prevent aggression.

The people in Poland and in other countries behind the iron curtain are given new hope by the action of the United Nations in Korea. These people will not submit to enslavement and brutality forever.

We in America have learned to appreciate the courage, the devotion to freedom, and the high ideals of the Polish people not only through our knowledge of the many battles they have fought for their own freedom and independence, but also because of the great contribution they have made to our country. Among our American citizens are thousands of people of Polish extraction who have played an important part in the growth of a progressive and democratic America in peace and in war. Even before we had gained our independence, when we were fighting for our own freedom, numerous Polish volunteers fought heroically in the American Revolutionary Army.

I would like to pay special tribute to one of these volunteers because I think he well represents the enduring spirit of a free Poland, and because we in New Jersey are particularly grateful for the skill and bravery he displayed in Revolutionary campaigns conducted in our State.

It is perhaps ironic that Count Casimir Pulaski was forced by Russian oppression to leave Poland as an exile in 1777. He landed in Marblehead, Mass., in July of that year, and went directly to the headquarters of Gen. George Washington. Pulaski's reason for devoting himself to the American cause is clearly described in a letter he wrote to Congress in which he said:

"I could not submit to stoop before the sovereigns of Europe so I came to hazard all for the freedom of America."

The hazard was, indeed, a real one. After brilliant service with the American Revolutionary forces he died in 1779 as a result of a wound received in battle.

I am sure that many of you have driven over the bridges of the great Pulaski Skyway, which spans the heart of industrial New Jersey, and reminds thousands of our citizens daily of the contribution made by this great citizen of Poland to the cause of freedom in this country and in the world.

The forces that have enslaved Poland today are more dangerous and more powerful than all of the European sovereigns of Pulaski's time. The atheistic, materialistic concept of world communism has succeeded in breaking the bodies of millions of men and is trying desperately to subjugate their minds and spirits as well.

We know that Poland has been fighting for her freedom for centuries and that Poland will never cease that fight until her freedom is secured. We pledge to Poland that her struggle for independence has not been and will not be forgotten. We shall not waver in our determination to build a United Nations devoted not to peace alone, but to peace with justice—to the kind of peace that allows small nations throughout the world to work out their destinies according to the desires of their peoples. We do not expect this to be an easy task, nor do we expect to accomplish it overnight. But, with God's help, we shall succeed in establishing His principles of justice and freedom as the fundamental principles for peace and human progress in the world.

Red Channels Becomes Best Seller

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article from the Christian Science Monitor discussing the newsletter entitled "Counterattack" together with some comments of my own.

There being no objection, Mr. MUNDT's statement and the article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR KARL E. MUNDT, OF SOUTH DAKOTA

The following descriptive news story written by the United Press and appearing in the Christian Science Monitor of September 14 provides an interesting report on how four former FBI agents have launched a Nation-wide crusade against the financing and subsidizing of Communist dupes and agents by American industrial corporations, business interests, and advertising agencies. It is a crusade in which every courageous and loyal American can participate. If communism is to be repelled in this country it must be remembered that freedom is everybody's job.

The highly readable, interesting, and informative newsletter issued by Ted Kirkpatrick and his three associates is called Counterattack and either the newsletter or its now nationally famous guidebook called Red Channels can be secured by addressing requests to Counterattack, 55 West Forty-second Street, New York City (19). Those who value freedom, individual initiative, and private enterprise sufficiently to fight back against the forces which would destroy these priceless American heritages now have a way in which to make themselves effective.

If every American who opposes Godless, aggressive, totalitarian, collectivistic communism would resolve to strike back against those who espouse or endorse this menace to our freedoms, we could have our home front in America safeguarded against this vicious conspiracy by the time our servicemen in Korea complete the victory which they are now pursuing against communism there. It will avail us little to defeat communism in Europe and/or Asia unless we measure up to the challenge it presents at home and see to it that gullible and selfish Americans no longer support and finance those who promote and protect the Communists within our homeland.

Fortunately freedom still flourishes in America sufficiently so that those who disapprove of communism or who would resist the march toward collectivism in this country have the opportunity—if they have the energy—to take effective action against those who pound the tom-toms for the Communists. We are still free enough so that we can write a letter, send a telegram, or put in a long-distance telephone call advising the sponsors and purveyors of programs utilizing talent which is ashamed of its Americanism or affiliated with communism that we will refuse to buy their products or attend their theaters or listen to their broadcasts or to tune in their television shows.

We are still free enough to strike back against those who would chisel away our freedoms by carefully avoiding the purchase or use or patronage of any merchandise or entertainment which utilizes un-American talent or individuals in its promotional campaigns. They can try to feed this red-tainted material to the American public but if we have courage enough to deserve to remain free we can refuse to eat it, or wear it, or buy it, or listen to it, or to part with our hard-earned capitalistic coin to buy tickets to see it portrayed on stage or screen.

Just as soon as good Americans and supporters of free enterprise cease being all-American suckers to the current extent wherein they spend their money to support the advertisers, the entertainers, the columnists, the commentators, and the publications that are slyly and coyly trying to undermine free enterprise, private initiative, and individual freedom and to substitute some form of communism or collectivism in lieu thereof, we can be sure that the battle against totalitarianism in America will start producing victories for freedom. Until then, perhaps we do not deserve to win.

The following article from the Christian Science Monitor suggests one way in which your letters, your telegrams, and your support can help dry up the fountainheads of communism in America:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of September 14, 1950]

RED CHANNELS BOOMS INTO BEST-SELLER ROLE

A paper-bound booklet is a current best seller in the radio offices of mid-Manhattan and the advertising agencies of Madison Avenue. Its title is "Red Channels," and its subject matter is one of the most controversial topics of the day in the radio, television, and advertising offices.

In the booklet the authors present a list of persons reported to have affiliations with Communist or Communist-front organizations. The public heard little of it until recently when television actress Jean Muir was dropped from the cast of the Aldrich Family. The ban on Miss Muir by the National Broadcasting Co., and by her sponsor, General Foods, followed a number of protests by persons who complained because her name was in Red Channels. So are the names of 150 other actors, writers, musicians, producers, and persons connected with show business.

TO BE USED IN SCHOOLS

Another of those listed is actress Gypsy Rose Lee, scheduled to appear on a new American Broadcasting Co. television show. A former commander of the Illinois American Legion protested to ABC that Miss Lee's name is in Red Channels. The broadcasting and television company replied with a sworn denial from Miss Lee that she never had been a Communist or a Communist sympathizer and asked the legionnaire to produce any evidence to the contrary.

The superintendent of the Newark, N. J., public schools brought the booklet further attention by disclosing that it will be distributed in the schools as a reference book for principals and teachers.

In the Muir case some organizations and individuals protested that the ban posed a serious threat to American liberties. Others applauded the action.

And the uproar over the Muir case focused attention on Red Channels and its publishers—four former Federal Bureau of Investigation agents whose organization is known as American Business Consultants, Inc.

Their aims, they say, are to protect industry from the Communists and to protect radio and television artists from being duped by Communists. Sometimes artists lend their names or talents to Communist fronts without realizing the nature of the organization, they say.

"COURT" TAG DENIED

One of the four former G-men is Theodore C. Kirkpatrick. He made it clear in an interview that his agency does not pass judgment on the persons listed in Red Channels. The list, he said, is made up of information culled from public records of the House Un-American Activities Committee and such other public sources as court records, letterheads of organizations, and newspaper items—including those of the Communist Daily Worker.

He protested some reports that the agency had set itself up as a private court with self-imposed power to clear persons of alleged Communist leanings by removing their names from Red Channels, if they could prove they had no Communist sympathies.

Mr. Kirkpatrick said, however, that anyone who thinks the agency has treated him unjustly can come in and ask for advice. The Red Channels publishers will tell him how to go about clearing his name.

They did that, he said, for the Negro folk singer, Josh White. They suggested to Mr. White that he go before the House Un-American Activities Committee and tell his story. Mr. White testified that he had been duped into entertaining Communist groups before he knew their politics.

OVERT ACT

Mr. White's appearance in Washington was what the Red Channels publishers call an overt act by a person to prove that he is not a Communist or a Communist sympathizer.

Although satisfied by Mr. White's overt act, Mr. Kirkpatrick said his name would not necessarily be removed from Red Channels.

However, he said Mr. White's name would be eliminated from any future editions or, if included, would include a notation of his overt act.

Mr. Kirkpatrick said his agency was formed because while they were FBI men during the war its four founders "saw the dangers of communism."

"When we left the FBI after the war, we decided that we probably could do something about it," he said.

First they formed a nonprofit organization financed with their own money. But after 6 months they had no members. Then, they decided to form a profit corporation. They began the publication of the newsletter Counterattack, which is received by more than 2,000 subscribers each week for a $24 annual subscription fee.

FEES FOR SPECIAL JOBS

In addition to what it gets from the newsletter subscriptions, the organization collects fees for special jobs performed for the subscribers.

One such job was the preparation of a brochure for the AFL Retail Clerks International Association in a recent attack on another union. Another brochure, prepared by the publishers of Counterattack, was distributed by the Prudential Insurance Co. of America to expose some officers in a union.

As for Miss Muir's case, Mr. Kirkpatrick said:

"There is no reason why she should have to come to us (to clear her name) and make peace with us. If she is against communism, she can demonstrate this in a number of ways."

Four named have called personally on the agency, and two have written to it, he said. These included Mr. White.

Another was Roger de Koven, stage and radio actor, who signed a statement given heavy play in Counterattack along with a statement that he had impressed the group with "his sincerity" and an expression of pleasure in being able to "clear De Koven's name of any unjustified suspicion of pro-Communist sympathy or activity."

Mr. Kirkpatrick is a graduate of Earlham College, Richmond, Ind. He was with the FBI from 1942 until late 1945. His associates are:

John G. Keenan, a New York lawyer, who resigned from the FBI in 1945 after 4 years' service to become a partner in a law firm founded here by his father.

Thomas A. Brady, also a lawyer, who was with the FBI from 1942 until 1947, when he resigned to resume private practice here.

Kenneth M. Bierly, the third lawyer member of the agency, who was with the FBI from 1941 until 1946

Mr Kirkpatrick is the only nonlawyer in the group. All quit the FBI of their own volition.

Airline Pilots Say S. 450 Jeopardizes Air Safety

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, this morning because of my objection, S. 450 was prevented from being passed on the Consent Calendar and was later taken up under a rule. I had intended to be present to raise some questions about this bill relating to commercial airlines safety, but unfortunately because of a misunderstanding was not notified in time to be present when it came up for consideration under the rule.

I am a little surprised that a measure vigorously opposed by the Airline Pilots Association passed both the committee of the Senate and the committee of the House with no opposition from any Members, so little discussion, and with no formal hearings whatever. I know that the membership of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has some of the ablest men in this House, and possibly they gave the measure all of the consideration that it deserves, and all of them are satisfied of its merits. It is my understanding that it clears up the legality of a practice which has been followed for some time by the CAA in the delegation of its authority. However, to keep the record straight, and to make it plain that my objection to this bill going through on the Consent Calendar was not a trifling objection, I wish to place in the record the telegram I received today from Mr. David L. Behncke, president of the Airline Pilots Association. This telegram, I think, and the opposition of the airline pilots, should be a red light to those who are interested in the safety of commercial aviation.

It will be observed that Mr. Behncke urges that air-safety regulations should be turned over to an independent air-safety board and not left in the hands of the airline companies as he contends it is today. Legislation is now pending for the creation of an independent air-safety board, and I trust that this entire subject matter will be reviewed when that legislation is brought to a hearing. Defeating S. 450 or delaying its enactment I presume would not change the present practice and certainly would not bring into existence the independent air-safety board Mr. Behncke contends is necessary.

It should be remembered that the airline pilots have a more vital—and personal—interest in air safety than any other people I can think of. Their recommendations in connection with legislation of this character should carry great weight. I insert the following telegram which I received from Mr. Behncke, president of the Airline Pilots Association, as a clear expression of their views in this instance:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 18, 1950.
HON. CLAIR ENGLE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The airline pilots who fly our Nation's airlines both continentally and internationally and who are best acquainted with our air-safety problems are against the CAA-sponsored S. 450 for which there isn't the slightest need, and if passed will usurp and destroy the authority given to the Civil Aeronautics Administration by Congress and turn it over to the airlines and aviation companies. The air-safety situation on the airlines is anything but good. In the weeks just passed there have been two more fatal accidents and two potentially fatal, and the death toll has been 72 with 7 injured. Even now present air-safety regulations are waived far too often and changed by the CAA and CAB all against the best interests of air safety without public hearings or consultation with the pilots and others including the public all vitally interested. Now this same governmental agency, the CAA and its Administrator, Mr. Rentzel, are sponsoring still another move the effect of which will be to turn over the safety regulation of the airlines and civil aviation generally to the airline companies except for some loosely knit second-hand supervision by the CAA that the airline pilots are certain will not be effective. Instead of turning the regulation of air safety over to the companies the trend must be in the other direction and air-safety regulations should be turned over to an independent air-safety board and not turned over to the airlines by the passage of S. 450. It is a bad bill and should not be passed. We must not forget that since the independent air-safety board was abolished approximately 10 years ago there have been 1,310 fatalities and 270 injuries on the airlines, a record that is a black page in the history of our country's airline and civil flying that is undeniable. It is an experience high-priced in life and millions of dollars by which we must benefit or all these lives will have been sacrificed in vain. Your cooperation to defeat this measure in the best interests of the safety of the air-traveling public and in the public interest generally will be deeply appreciated by the men who fly the planes. We understand another bill is coming up in Congress today, S. 3504, which as presently written is also a bad proposal and which unless properly amended should not be passed.

DAVID L. BEHNCKE,
President, Airline Pilots Association.

Listen, America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLENN R. DAVIS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in order that it be available to my colleagues and to others who have access to the RECORD, I insert herewith a stirring editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of September 10, 1950:

LISTEN, AMERICA

Tell me, Americans, as the cooling winds of approaching autumn brush over your ripening fields and your fragrant hills, what you are thinking of.

Are you thinking of your sons, young and strong and brave, who are dying for you in distant Korea?

Or are you thinking of maintaining "life as usual" for yourselves?

Are you thinking of what you can do to fill the life or death needs of the boy from your block who is fighting for this country in the mountains and rice paddies of a strange land around the world?

Or are you thinking of profits as usual, or better than usual? Or the higher wages that a national emergency might bring if exploited?

Are you thinking of the neighbor boy who mowed the lawn, or delivered your paper, and is now marching down the streeet on his way to a bestial war?

Or are you thinking of how you can cram your locker, your freezer, or your shelves with hoarded goods so that, come what may, your stomach will be full?

Are you thinking of what you can do to help in community efforts to protect yourself and your neighbors in event of a bomb disaster that could come with all-out war?

Or are you indifferent to these vital moves and concerned only with your golf, your canasta, or your next vacation?

Are you thinking of the awesome problems that confront your Nation and how you can help to elect men this fall who have the ability, the will, the integrity to solve them? Or is your attitude that of so many politicians—we don't care what we say, or what its effect is, just as long as our side wins? Or are you simply indifferent?

Are you thinking of helping—just in your casual conversation, if no other way—in the attempt to build a United Nations that can effectively combat aggression and assure peace?

Or are you cynical and antagonistic to the most hopeful attempt that mankind has ever made to assure a world of peace?

Listen, America! The hour of your rendezvous with history is here. The foe, powerful, unprincipled, dedicated to the destruction of what you love and believe in, is pounding at the door. The struggle ahead, be it hot war, police actions in half a dozen Koreas around the globe, or simply armed vigilance, will be long and costly and exhausting. There will not be life as usual. There will be a time of trouble and only national unity, personal sacrifice and persistent courage will see us through victoriously.

Awake, slumbering giant. There is no time to lose.

Civil Defense Progress in United States Cities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following report from the president of the All America Defense Association, Mr. Robert K. Christenberry, on Civil Defense Progress in United States Cities:

CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRESS IN UNITED STATES CITIES

(By Robert K. Christenberry)

SUMMARY

A welter of conflicting and confusing stories has confronted the public in recent weeks regarding the state of preparedness for civil defense of America's larger cities. In order to discover just what the situation is and what is being done the All America Defense Association research staff conducted a survey of this problem in all cities of the United States having more than 300,000 population. While other available sources of information were used, the chief means was a questionnaire sent directly to the mayors of those cities. Results of this survey are outlined in this report.

In order to avoid divulgence of any information which might be prejudicial to security of the areas themselves, the names of cities in which little or no preparations have been made will not be given.

On the basis of the survey, the following conclusions are drawn:

1. In nearly all cities, the local authorities have taken the initiative in civil defense planning and are doing the best they can while awaiting issuance of the National Security Resources Board's master plan.

2. Every mayor who reported feels that civil defense planning is his own responsibility, not that of some higher authority.

3. The mayors feel their people are neither unduly excited nor apathetic toward the need for civil-defense preparations. The extent of activity has been directly proportionate to degree of public demand.

4. Most cities have a survey under way and are working out a plan, but only four cities have completed such plans to date.

5. Three-fourths of the cities reporting are proceeding with full-scale organization of civil-defense agencies. Of the remainder, half feel it is sufficient to lay the plans "on the shelf" until further need arises.

6. Only two cities have actually begun a program of physical defense preparation, including provision for emergency supplies and bomb shelters.

7. The cities accept the responsibility for civil defense planning but will expect money from the Federal Treasury to finance operations in time of war.

This report is not intended to cover progress of civil-defense planning on the national or State levels. Nor is it intended to enter the still-unsettled controversy over whether national civil-defense policy should rest in military or civilian agencies.

While direct replies were received from only half the cities queried, independent checks reveal that progress in the remainder has been proportionate to those which did report—some are proceeding rapidly, others have done nothing at all.

THE SURVEY ANSWERS

Following are points covered in the survey, with answers as received from the mayors and gathered by AADA staff:

1. Need for civil defense: Some of the Nation's headline writers are more excited about civil defense than most of the people responsible for it. In contrast to the scare stories published in many magazines and newspapers, not one mayor felt the people of his city were unduly excited about it. One mayor answered that only a few were interested in the subject. The rest said folks were "thoughtfully concerned" and proceeding calmly. (No reply was received from Los Angeles, where civil defense responsibility has been a highly controversial issue.)

2. Responsibility: Seventy percent of the mayors believe that responsibility for civil defense planning and organization rests primarily on their own shoulders. Twenty percent said the responsibility rested with State officials, the remainder divided it between State and local authorities. None thought it belonged either to the Military Establishment or a Federal civilian agency.

However, the survey revealed a sharp conflict in municipal circles as to who should pay the cost of civil defense activities. On the one hand, most mayors reporting to AADA agreed with Seattle's William F. Devin that it is totally a local responsibility, for which municipal officials cannot pass the buck to higher authority. On the other is the apparent attitude of the United States Conference of Mayors. In the August 15 issue of that organization's bimonthly News, editor Paul V. Betters says the idea of local responsibility is "all well and good insofar as community organization and operation of civil defense is concerned. But when it comes to financing the tremendous cost, this is clearly and completely a Federal responsibility."

Apparently, in the eyes of the mayors' conference leadership, Federal cooperation is spelled "m-o-n-e-y."

Interestingly enough, the conference organ goes on to insist that the Federal Government's leadership consists of "more than just to issue a few booklets," and states that if the NSRB's plan is not immediately followed up with Federal appropriations, "then the cities will know that neither the President nor the Congress takes civilian defense too seriously."

Whatever the degree of its validity, this attitude is in strong contrast to the controversy which arose over the ill-fated Hopley Report. (Civil Defense for National Security by Russell J. Hopley, written for Secretary of Defense Forrestal in 1948.) Criticism of that work was based almost entirely on its purported policy of concentrating civil defense authority in the Federal Military Establishment.

The NSRB's Office of Civil Defense Mobilization has leaned over backward in trying to be helpful to States and cities without dominating them--and has had little thanks for its efforts. Stalemated for more than a year by a lack of a clear mission (chiefly because the National Security Resources Board has no active chairman until W. Stuart Symington took over this Spring) the Civil Defense Mobilization staff has combed the field of available experience and suggestions and should be in a position to bring out a fairly complete and constructively flexible plan in its September report. Even so, the agency's officials already are stressing that this will be no stiff "blueprint" upon which all local civil defense organizations can be based. Each local plan must be tailor-made to the peculiarities of the area and the special problems there confronted.

The question of financing has been handled in a number of different ways. In the Nation's Capital, District of Columbia commissioners have asked Congress for a special appropriation of $290,000 to finance a newly authorized civilian defence agency. The House of Representatives slashed this to $60,000. In virtually every other city, operations to date have cost a fraction of that amount. In St. Paul, one of the first actions of the (volunteer) civil-defense committee was to conduct a drive for dollar contributions to finance its operations.

3. Relative danger: The difference in approaches to the finance question is only one indication of an even greater problem: City officials don't know how big a civil-defense program to adopt because more than half of them have not been informed by the military as to the relative danger their towns face of being subjected to sudden attack.

Obviously, the extent to which local agencies should be organized can be determined only if they know how great is the danger. Some of the larger cities are known to be relatively less important as targets for atomic explosions than some smaller ones. The officials of municipalities are reluctant to embark on extensive programs of relocation of facilities or shelter construction unless they have reason to believe they would enjoy high priority on a potential enemy's list. This information vacuum has occasioned a good deal of political demagogy since it is impossible to prove whether a local official's performance has been sufficient or lacking.

4 Legal authority: The NSRB has reported that only 21 States have passed necessary laws to carry out minimum civil-defense programs. Only 60 percent of the mayors said they had sufficient legal authority to cope with civil emergencies. The others said they had asked their State legislatures and Congressmen to help provide needed authority. Several States have merely revived civil-defense laws passed during World War II, usually with amendments based on experience from those years.

Areas which are organized under voluntary programs are less dependent upon legislation for their activities-- but must rely almost entirely on voluntary compliance with hazard-removal and damage-limiting regulations.

5. Local leadership: In the absence of any standard pattern, localities are divided almost equally between those which have centered civil-defense matters in volunteer committees and those which have turned the problem over to existing municipal agencies. Several cities have combined the two methods.

Some cities have called on retired military officers to head civil-defense organizations, among them San Antonio, Tex., where Gen. Walter Kreuger, South Pacific Ground Forces commander during World War II, has taken on the job. Gen. Lucius D. Clay, recently retired as Military Governor of the United States zone in Germany, is chairman of the New York State Civil Defense Commission.

In other cities, men who directed civil defense during World War II have been called back to service. These include Lewis G. Hansen, of Jersey City, N. J., where the program is just getting under way.

Wherever voluntary committes have been formed, only the clerical staff are reported to be on a paid basis. All cities reported they had no trouble securing voluntary planning assistance. However, there are reports from several cities that many of these "volunteers" expect paid jobs when the agencies become active

6. Survey and tentative plan: Most of the cities reporting were still working on the basic survey of civil defense needs and tentative plan of operations. Only four cities had completed their plans. One, a seaport city on the Atlantic coast, had not even started such a survey. Of those under way, half expected plans to be completed within 60 days; the others were less definite.

7. Mutual assistance: Two-thirds of the reporting cities have already begun to work out mutual-assistance plans with neighboring communities. This is especially important in the eastern industrial area, where cities are close together. In several areas, such as New Jersey, Maryland, and the New York port area, civil-defense districts crossing State lines are being organized to facilitate joint action. However, this work is proceeding slowly and not without an expected amount of friction.

8. Organization: In contrast to great progress being made in civil-defense planning, not one city is reported to be fully organized for action. However, three-fourths of those reporting are undergoing full-scale organization. Three cities were content to place the survey and plan on the shelf for future use.

9. Municipal agencies: All except three cities reported they had already begun to train employees of their police and fire departments, utilities and health agencies for their roles in case of attack. Recent release by the Atomic Energy Commission of books on the effect of atomic warfare has enabled the cities to make these training programs more practical. One city, Baltimore, even reported that its utilities were ready as of now.

10. Physical actions: The really expensive and difficult task in civil defense is that of physical protection and dispersal of vital facilities. Only two cities reported they had actually begun programs of this type—St. Paul and Pittsburgh. Several others, including Seattle, San Antonio, and Baltimore, were drawing plans for execution when the need becomes more apparent.

Among activities contemplated in this regard are dispersal of vital community facilities (such as making sure the telephone center is not next door to the gas works), provision for emergency water, power, medical and food supplies, construction of bomb shelters or conversion of existing structures into shelters, mass evacuation plans, and the like. In most cities, the cost of such actions is considered near prohibitive.

CONCLUSION

All in all, the survey indicated that officials of the big cities of the United States are doing their best to provide necessary civil-defense programs for their communities. They have been handicapped most of all by lack of reliable information on the nature and extent of the danger against which they should prepare. The National Security Resources Board has passed on a great deal of advice and technical information. Its master plan, expected this month, is being put together in record time but should have been started a year earlier than it was (this is not the fault of present NSRB officials).

Most important of all, the general public have been complacently unaware of the need for civil-defense mobilization. The current controversy on the subject should serve to stir all concerned to greater and more definite action.

Because of the many complicated problems involved and because of the necessity for developing an adequate but reasonably balanced civil-defense program in each community, members of the All America Defense Association are urged to take an active personal interest in the civil-defense planning and organization in their own cities.

Rustling of Iron Curtain Portends New Aggression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article from the Washington (D. C.) Star of September 17, 1950, by Constantine Brown, one of America's ablest and most fearless correspondents or commentators on foreign affairs:

RUSTLING OF IRON CURTAIN PORTENDS NEW AGGRESSION—SOVIETS REPORTED READYING SATELLITES FOR EARLY PUSH AGAINST WEST GERMANY

(By Constantine Brown)

For the last 12 months an almost impenetrable curtain has been lowered around the Soviet-controlled areas of the Baltic Sea, extending from Tallinn, the capital of what used to be the Republic of Estonia, to Wismar, near the frontier of the British occupation zone in western Germany.

It is in this area that the Soviet is making the most formidable preparations for aggression against the west. The few natives who have been allowed to remain in their old homesteads no longer are permitted to leave. Even a 5-mile trip is subjected to the most rigid control by Soviet and east German secret police.

The natives are branded like cattle so there can be no doubt that they belong to these provinces and no outsider has a chance to enter the prohibited zones without quick detection.

Finnish, Swedish and Danish ships which occasionally have to put into the many ports of this area must follow strict regulations. They are allowed only to enter harbors and can have no contact with people ashore.

There have been some persons—but very few—who have escaped recently from the top secret zone, particularly Russian officers who have had enough of the Communist paradise. They have surrendered to western Allied guards and under friendly and skillful interrogation revealed a few of the secret preparations Moscow is making there.

They spoke about the new improved guided missile platforms, the strength and intensive training of the new German Army, whose officers corps is composed largely of Nazi elite corps officers, and of many other matters which are being kept secret by their interrogators.

All this information and more, obtained at great risks, shows clearly that the Kremlin has speeded up the tempo of preparedness of the satellite forces in eastern Germany. They also show that Moscow is ready to give full support to these troops when they are ordered to overrun western Germany.

APPRAISALS FAULTY

These revelations have prompted many military men of the west to conclude that we may be faced with an aggression of the Korean type in Europe sometime in the next few months and not later than the summer of 1951.

The requests from France and from the Bonn government that more American troops be made available for the defense of western Europe have sprung from the belief among the nations which are most directly menaced by Russia that a show-down is inevitable, regardless of how optimistic the diplomats at Lake Success and Washington may be.

These officials have been wrong in their appraisals of the international situation since the end of World War II. They have failed to heed the storm warnings in Korea. There is no reason to believe now that they are right about conditions in Europe. The news from the East is factual; the hopes of the diplomats are based on wishful thinking.

The request for more help from the United States, in the form of five more American divisions, has fallen on friendly ears in Washington. President Truman has replied that we would not shirk our responsibilities, but insisted that our efforts be matched by those of the defenders of western Europe.

The fact is that at the present time we do not have even one division available for the European theater. It is also a fact that the members of the Atlantic Pact do not have the necessary manpower to organize a force to meet a Soviet-backed attack within the next 12 months. And here we come face to face with the madness of allowing sentimental and emotional factors to outweigh dire military necessity.

For more than a year military men in America, Britain, and France have quietly urged their governments to bring into the European defense system all the nations which are willing to offer full cooperation against the Russian threat. While some of the British and French made certain definite restrictions in regard to Germany, they all agreed that Spain, which has never been a threat to western Europe, even in the days when Hitler was conquering Europe and offered General Franco Gibraltar and a large slice of the French African colonial empire, should be accepted as a full-fledged partner.

ALLIES WORN OUT

Field Marshal Vicount Montgomery came to Washington last winter. He urged openly that Spain be associated with the common western defense. He told officials in Washington that he had pleaded with Foreign Minister Bevin to bury the ideological hatchet and made the same plea here. The blunt fact is that without the inclusion of western German and Spanish manpower in the western defense system the chances of saving Europe are, to say the least, extremely limited.

The Atlantic Pact nations, with the exception of America, are worn-out, war-weary countries which cannot be expected to make any large contribution of manpower. This is not said in a critical spirit. France has been bled white in two world wars and has on its hands a colonial war in Indochina, to which she has committed the bulk of her best troops.

Italy, also, is tired out and incapable even of defending her own borders, to say nothing of sending troops for the defense of other countries of the western coalition. Belgium, Holland, Denmark, and Luxemburg are small nations with no military potential. Norway may be able to resist a Soviet onslaught for a few months if she is properly supported by American and British air and naval forces.

Britain is about as tired militarily as France, although she is expected to make another real effort if war comes and her government decides to join the fray with everything it has in its power. Portugal, a small country in the extremity of southwestern Europe, cannot be considered a military power and has been made a member of the Atlantic alliance only out of courtesy. She has some strategically important islands, such as the Azores, which are essential to the American and British Air Forces.

In addition to these material conditions there is a political factor which must not be overlooked. There are strong Communist movements in most of the continental European countries, particularly in France and Italy. While the Communist Parties have been losing ground for 2 years, they still have several million active members and a large number of associates.

SPAIN'S POTENTIAL VALUE

The Communists have been carrying on tremendous propaganda against the warmongering United States and its puppets, the Paris and Rome governments. The peoples of France and Italy are so war-weary that nobody should be surprised if a large portion of the non-Communist population agreed that it would be better to accept honorable neutrality to the devastations of another war.

Thus from the viewpoint of available manpower and from the psychological point of view, it is doubtful that the European countries which are the pillars of the Atlantic Pact will be willing to fight when the showdown comes, unless they are strongly supported by other armies.

We are engaged in a bitter campaign in the Far East. It will be essential for some time that we send across the Pacific whatever troops are available to us at the present rate of mobilization of our Armed Forces.

How, then, can we fulfill our commitments to western Europe in the near future?

If it is true that manpower alone does not make armies these days, it is equally true that military equipment alone is not sufficient unless you have men behind the guns and in the tanks. And only few men are available among the members of the present coalition in western Europe.

After a good deal of bickering the powers which occupy western Germany have agreed to permit the recruiting of 60,000 Germans for service in a police force armed with tanks and all the other paraphernalia of modern warfare. It is hoped that this decision will be put into effect at the earliest possible moment and that the necessary equipment for such German troops can be found readily.

But it is Spain which can be of utmost importance to the defense of the west. There are today some 450,000 men under arms in the country. Another 500,000 trained reserves are immediately available. The Spaniards have not fought a foreign nation, except the United States, since the days of Napoleon and then their role was limited to the old-type guerrilla warfare. The civil war fought between 1936 and 1939 does not give any indication of the ability of the Spanish forces.

JOINT CHIEFS PUZZLED

Of all the countries of western Europe, however, Spain is not contaminated in the least with Communist ideology. Quite the contrary. The Spaniards are all determined anti-Communists, regardless of whether they are Falangists, Royalists, Socialists or anarchists.

The present world conflict is, among other things, an ideological conflict. Russian propaganda has succeeded to a remarkable degree in camouflaging its aims of world conquest with an ideology which has sucked in millions of dreamers or power-hungry demagogues. There is no doubt in the minds of those who have looked into conditions in Spain that the country would be of utmost importance as an ally against the Russian steamroller.

Yet, in Washington everything is being done to prevent Spain from fulfilling its role in the struggle against the evil forces of Moscow. The State Department and the White House, which alone oppose any steps to include the whole Iberian Peninsula in the forthcoming struggle for survival, have placed every conceivable barrier in the way of Spain's participation.

The stated reason is that General Franco is a dictator. But so is Tito, and a Communist to boot. That, however, does not impress our foreign-policy makers. They do not admit that the policy of expediency as it is applied to Tito should also be applied to the Communist-hating Spaniards.

President Truman has gone to greater lengths than any of his predecessors in thwarting the efforts of those who realize that Spain's military support is essential to the defense of Europe.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff, who are reliably reported to have urged in the National Security Council that Spain be included in the defense of western Europe, are puzzled. Their views are being ignored because the State Department insists that such a move would offend the Socialists in Britain and France.

Printing of Return Addresses on Envelopes by the Post Office Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. WALSH
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the printers of this country are the victims of unfair competition, not from their brother printers, not from foreign lands, but from their own Government.

The local printer, frequently also the publisher of his home-town newspaper, is a resident of his community, a taxpayer, a substantial citizen. Yet, on one important potential source of income and service, the imprinting of return addresses on envelopes, he finds himself bucking the Post Office Department. For the small-town merchant can purchase from the Post Office Department envelopes imprinted with his own corner card at a fraction of the cost the home-town printer would have to charge.

The Post Office Department advances many excuses for thus not only underselling but in many cases actively soliciting, business which the print shops, especially in smaller communities, badly need.

They claim that it encourages small-business men to use return addresses and that its low price is a service to the people. This same Department recently cut its genuine service, the rapid delivery of the mail, in two.

The Department claims that private printers cannot match its mass-production price. That may be correct. The independent printers can hardly present the taxpayers with their deficit.

Now, why do the printers of the United States want to have Post Office Department printing of envelopes banned?

The first reason is the most obvious and there is no reason for the printers being bashful about expressing it. This is business taken from them, business they should have, business they can perform at a just price.

The Government's low prices, according to the Publishers Auxiliary, are aggressively advertised by eager postmasters seeking increased revenue for themselves and give an erroneous impression of all private printing-plant prices. This is especially unfair. When the Post Office does it so cheaply the customer is apt to think all private printing prices are out of line.

Printers resent an obvious intrusion on free enterprise.

Printers contend, their opinion based on National Editorial Association surveys, that the current Government customers would continue to use corner-cards, even at advanced price. And that advanced price, let me reiterate, would be only a fair one. The printers are not looking for a gravy train. They only ask a fair deal.

The major objective claimed by the Post Office Department is that of securing wide use of printed return addresses on the part of all businesses. Can we not assume that private printers would, in their own interest as well as that of the Government, work toward that objective?

There is the question of price. The Post Office Department probably fears that patrons will complain because the private printing concerns cannot match the low, mass-production cost. Printers will readily admit they cannot match the current price, but if every printer had more envelope business, the price would obviously come down. These local print shops have no desire to gouge the public. But on the other hand, if all Government departments set up similar programs for the production of consumer goods, eventually not one private concern in the Nation could do business.

The Post Office Department's argument just does not hold water.

If the Post Office Department got out of this business it would mean increased revenue of more than $2,500,000 annually to the legitimate printers. How could we attempt to justify the local post office selling groceries or hardware or sporting goods, on the grounds that it wanted to increase the public's use of these products and could sell them cheaper than a retailer? Where is the principle different?

Why then try to justify this unholy condition?

I say to you, in all earnestness, there is something wrong with the thinking of the Post Office Department.

To digress—we have all learned how they pay full freight rates on empty mail cars.

We have watched them, this year, slice mail deliveries and other service which they should be trying to improve instead of eliminating.

We have seen faithful, loyal employees terminated in some sort of an economy drive—while service was retroacted to pre-1910.

Yet the Department hangs on like a dog to a prize bone, to this antiquated and unfair service which robs our printers of legitimate revenue and may even make them appear in a bad light to the fellow townsmen.

Mr. Speaker, if the solution to this unfair situation must originate here—let us go to work.

Behind the Front Page

OF
HON. WALTER B. HUBER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Robert H. Stopher and James S. Jackson, from the Akron Beacon Journal of September 17, 1950:

BEHIND THE FRONT PAGE

(By Robert H. Stopher and James S. Jackson)

BOW BRUISED

After what happened to Frank T. Bow in Washington last week, Representative JOHN MCSWEENEY, of Wooster, Democratic Congressman from the Sixteenth Ohio District, suddenly began to look like a cinch for re-election.

Bow, a Canton lawyer, is the Republican nominee and until last week had been regarded by fellow Republicans as an even bet to unseat MCSWEENEY. Even some Democratic leaders were willing to concede privately that the district could swing the other way.

But then Senator ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL, Kansas Republican, got himself into a jam with a Senate speech which hinted broadly that Secretary of the Interior Oscar Chapman had been chummy with Communists. When the speech backfired, SCHOEPPEL said he had got his material from his legislative assistant—Bow.

Then it was Bow's turn to take a whipping. He spent a bruising day before the Senate's Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, with Senators MURRAY, of Montana; LEHMAN, of New York; and O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, all Democrats, taking turns at the lash. LEHMAN made one of the milder statements of the day when he said Bow's charge against Chapman was based on absolutely nothing except innuendo.

By the time the Sentors had finished they had succeeded in painting Bow as something of a minor league MCCARTHY in the matter of making charges that don't stand up.

O'MAHONEY summed up after the Bow testimony by calling the Bow-inspired SCHOEPPEL speech "one of the most infamous libels ever uttered against an honorable man."

M'SWEENEY MUM

Representative MCSWEENEY took pains to give the Senate committee hearing a wide berth and refused to be prodded into commenting on Bow's part in the affair.

"I'm telling you honestly," MCSWEENEY told a reporter, "I don't know a thing about the man or his activities."

If MCSWEENEY doesn't know Bow, maybe some other readers of the Beacon Journal don't either.

Max Abelman, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES J. HEFFERNAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HEFFERNAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an article about Max Abelman, of Brooklyn, N. Y., which appeared in the Long Island Press on September 3, 1950:

WHEN IT COMES TO FUND DRIVES, MAX ABELMAN IS THE MAN TO SEE

(By Joseph O. Hatfield)

When two Brooklyn charity executives argue about ways to raise money they usually end up saying "Let's talk it over with Abelman."

Max Abelman has urged the citizens of Brooklyn to voluntarily cough up over $100,- 000,000 during the past 40 years. He is considered one of the country's leading fund raisers, and a large part of the success of modern Brooklyn charity drives can be attributed to him.

Abelman, who lives at 311 Beach One, Neponsit, is at present working on plans to combine Brooklyn and Queens charity drives.

During the panic of 1907 Abelman went broke in the construction business. A newlywed, he needed a job badly, and after being turned down by dozens of construction companies, department stores, and manufacturing concerns, he finally secured a position as a $50-a-month clerk with the Brooklyn Federation of Jewish Charities.

Since 1907 raising money for organized charities has been Abelman's business.

"Raising money is like being a salesman," he says. "You've got to have a good product. Then if it's well advertised, selling is easy."

In 1920 the Brooklyn Federation of Jewish Charities needed $1,000,000 for a special building program. Every possible resource had been tapped in another drive, and nobody knew how to raise the money.

Max Abelman was consulted.

"A million dollars," Abelman said casually. "I can raise that in one night."

To his face, the prominent leaders who had consulted him said, "Fine, go ahead. We'll help you."

Behind his back, they said, "Abelman thinks he can raise any amount of money. Now he'll learn not to talk so big."

Abelman raised the money in one night.

Although Jewish charities are his specialty, Abelman has a remarkable record as a fund raiser for Catholic, Protestant, and nonsectarian causes.

"When I set out to get money for a charity," says Abelman, "I usually get it. Sometimes I have to hit the big givers over the head, but finally they all come through."

Abelman first made his name as a money raiser during World War I when he sold $49,000,000 in liberty bonds at one meeting at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. This was the most successful bond sale meeting of the fifth liberty loan drive.

In 1932 Abelman became secretary of the Brooklyn Jewish Hospital where his particular interests have been fund raising and publicity.

Just before World War II Abelman heard a report that some of the youngsters in the children's wards were exceptionally melancholy.

"If I had to look at white plaster walls all day, I might get a little melancholy too," he commented.

A few minutes later, after a brief conference with the hospital's president, Abelman was telephoning to Albert Cugat, the artist brother of the bandleader Xavier Cugat.

Cugat agreed to do the job and there are now 16 children's wards in the Brooklyn Jewish Hospital with names like Snow White, Pinocchio, Red Riding Hood, Goldilocks, Alice in Wonderland and Humpty-Dumpty.

When these rooms were completed Abelman did not overlook their fund raising possibilities. He arranged to have murals autographed by notable national and international figures, and each time a celebrity came to the hospital, its fine work got front page publicity. Some of the autographers have been Wendell Willkie, Eleanor Roosevelt, Lord Halifax, Thomas Dewey, Herbert Lehman, Leo Durocher, Eddie Cantor, Myrna Loy, Joe Medwick and Generals Bradley and Marshall.

It is inevitable that a man whose fame rests on successful charity campaign dinners should regularly be called on to help promote testimonial dinners. Abelman has helped arrange over a hundred testimonial dinners.

Although Abelman has always avoided partisan political activity, it is because of men like him that democracy continues to flourish. Freedom flourishes where there is religious tolerance, community spirit, privately supported charities and each man is aware of his duty to his brother. These causes have been Abelman's life * * * a life that has been both vital and creative.

Navy Veteran 100 Years Old Offers To Serve

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, time brings its changes, but time has not lessened the desire of Dr. George C. Lippincott to serve his country. With the same spirit of loyalty that has always characterized him throughout his entire life, Dr. Lippincott, although 100 years old, has offered his services in the present war emergency, as a medical doctor, to the Navy Department.

The news article appearing in the Courier-Post newspaper of Camden, N. J., issue of September 18, 1950, gives in full the interesting details of the previous service of Dr. Lippincott and his willingness to again serve his country. It reads as follows:

THANKS, BUT NOT THIS WAR—NAVY VET, 100, OFFERS TO SERVE; SALEM TO HONOR DR. LIPPINCOTT

SALEM, September 18.—Dr. George C. Lippincott, retired naval lieutenant, today offered his services to the Navy Medical Corps.

The Navy, however, politely declined the doctor's offer. Instead, Dr. Lippincott was presented with a letter of congratulations from Secretary of the Navy Francis P. Matthews.

And no wonder.

Today Dr. Lippincott is observing his one hundredth birthday anniversary.

The oldest living member of the naval service on the retired list, Dr. Lippincott has been out of service since 1886. But when he recognized the needs of the Armed Forces for medical services, the Salem physician, despite his age, volunteered to serve.

The observance of his century mark is not being passed unnoticed. A birthday party, arranged by the Salem Citizens Committee, is being held at his home, 271 East Broadway.

The committee, headed by the Reverend Thomas Wingate, rector of St. John's Episcopal Church, and William DeLong, of the Salem Chamber of Commerce, arranged a party that is complete with birthday cake and presents.

And to show the feeling of the community for the physician, there were messages of congratulation from residents of Salem where Dr. Lippincott was born and has spent most of his 100 years.

Congratulations from Secretary Matthews and the Navy Department were delivered by Capt. Lyle J. Thomas, Fourth Naval District medical officer.

Dr. Lippincott was commissioned in the Navy in 1875, shortly after his graduation from Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia. His first duty was aboard the Vandalia for a cruise to the West Indies, returning to Philadelphia in July 1876, for the Centennial Exposition. In September of that year the Vandalia sailed for Gibraltar, a 50-day trip.

During the Russian-Turkish War in 1877 Dr. Lippincott served at Constantinople, then was granted 6 months' leave to visit Paris and London.

Returning to the Vandalia in December 1877, Dr. Lippincott had as fellow passengers President of the United States Ulysses S. Grant and Mrs. Grant, who were touring Egypt, Palestine, and Greece.

From 1879 to October 1880 Dr. Lippincott was on duty in the Navy Department bureau of medicine and surgery, then went aboard the Galena for 3 years' sea duty and a 6,000-mile cruise. While on the cruise Dr. Lippincott witnessed at close hand the British bombardment of the fort of Alexandria held by Arabi Yaski. He was at Chios during the destructive earthquake of April 1881, and remained there for several weeks attending the wounded at an improvised hospital.

In December 1886, Dr. Lippincott was retired from the naval service, suffering from rheumatism and malarial fever incurred while he was on duty in the Mediterranean area.

I am proud of the fine spirit of loyalty that has been shown by Dr. Lippincott. It should be an inspiration to all of us. I trust that he may have many more years of health and happiness.

Bible Can Give All Answers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, September 17, 1950, the Reverend Dr. J. Walter Carpenter, pastor of the Metropolitan Baptist Church, here in Washington, delivered a most impressive sermon particularly appropriate during these serious times. The Times-Herald in its Monday issue carried the following story regarding this great sermon. I am happy to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include the excerpt from the press:

BIBLE CAN GIVE ALL ANSWERS, SAYS PASTOR

The Bible can supply the answer to every need of the heart and life and soul of man if he will but listen, the Reverend Dr. J. Walter Carpenter, pastor of the Metropolitan Baptist church, said yesterday.

"Our modern world today is crying out in need of the Lord," Dr. Carpenter said. "His way of life is the only way, His teachings are truth undefiled, His atoning death for our sins has made possible life abundant for all mankind both in this world and in the world beyond.

TENSION RELIEF OFFERED

"Our modern lives are so filled with tension and confusion. Our homes have tensions, our offices, factories, and stores are filled with people whose nerves are ragged and whose lives are frustrated. People crack up in the business world and many marriages end in the tragedy of divorce.

"All of this could be avoided if only men would come to Jesus and trust their lives and souls to Him," he declared. "One of the most tragic sayings of our Lord was, 'Ye would not come to Me that ye might have life.'"

Dr. Carpenter then cited the case of the disciples of Jesus, who, after enduring suffering and confusion at His death on Calvary, felt they were ready to conquer the world for God when they saw Jesus alive again and risen from the dead.

THEY NEEDED TESTING

"But Jesus knew they were not yet ready," the pastor said. "The Kingdom of God demands that its leaders be men of stable faith, unmoved by the confusion and disappointment of their earthly lives.

"Each of these disciples of our Lord became a great and mighty leader," he said. "But how were their lives so changed and transformed that the unbelieving world looked at them and was so reminded of Jesus that people nicknamed them 'Little Christs,' or 'Christians,' a name that still today describes a true believer of Jesus?

"First, Jesus made certain that each of His disciples was a true believer in His deity and lordship. Judas, the renegade, had died a traitor's death, Paul, the great apostle to the Gentiles, was soon destined to take his place in the apostolic band."

SPIRITUAL POWER IS KEY

"But faith in Jesus is not enough," he said. "Scripture tells us that 'the devils also believed and trembled.' One of the last words of Jesus to His disciples was given just before His body ascension from this world. 'Tarry ye * * *,' He said, 'until ye be ended with power from on high.'

"The power that Jesus referred to was Holy Spirit power. When will is frustrated, weak men learn what scripture so plainly teaches: 'Not by might, not by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord.'

"Holy Spirit power comes only to those who have been 'born again.' As Jesus spoke to Nicodemus of old, so He speaks to every man today, 'Except a man be born again (i. e. born from above) he cannot see the Kingdom of God,'" Dr. Carpenter said.

If We Must Have UMT, Do It Without Waste

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I call to the attention of Members of the House of Representatives a thought-provoking editorial on the subject of universal military training; this editorial being written by Mr. Paul G. Norris, Jr., publisher of the Marshalltown (Iowa) Times-Republican, and published in the columns of that newspaper on September 15, 1950.

Mr. Norris makes no profession to being a military expert; neither does he attempt to write legislation. He does recognize the corrosive effects of military conscription as practiced through the years by foreign countries and he offers suggestions through which some of these effects may be avoided.

Following is Mr. Norris' editorial:

This newspaper has never been in favor of adopting the European idea of universal military training in America, because so far we haven't been convinced it is the answer to our defense problems. But since the Korean war broke out, agitation for universal military training has been revived and it may be that we will be forced by world events to adopt some kind of general military training.

But if we are forced to come to universal military training to save ourselves, let's not rush into it without every effort to prevent waste of time, money, and manpower.

The whole idea of universal military training is repugnant to most of us; many of our ancestors came to this country for the sole purpose of escaping it in Europe. Furthermore, universal military training failed to save France or Italy and it made a militaristic nation out of Germany that twice lost a major world conflict.

However, our unpreparedness for Korea must force us to the conclusion that our present defense program is inadequate. We have two alternatives for the future, either a huge standing army, or a powerful conscripted reserve that will be immediately ready for combat on mobilization. Most Americans would prefer the latter.

But we still don't think that calls for 2 years of active military service on the part of all able bodied young men, or even for a full year. Basic training should be given under Regular Army supervision, of course, but that is compressed into 3 or 4 months in wartime, so there is no reason why it couldn't be done in peacetime.

Here is our suggestion: That the summer after a youth graduates from high school, or after he reaches 18 if he drops school, he be drafted for 3 or 4 months of intensive basic training under professional instruction; then transfer him to a National Guard or active Reserve unit to continue his training at home through age 25.

If he could afford to go to college, he might qualify for an ROTC unit with the Government paying only for his officer training. Each summer he might be subject to a few weeks of intensive field maneuvers as long as he remained in the active Reserve.

In the end we should have a Reserve that is constantly at full strength, always young and vigorous, and whose training is kept up to date. At the same time our young men's civilian careers would not be disrupted except by actual war.

There may be some "bugs" in this idea, for this editor is not a military man. But we would prefer to see it tried than to waste time, money, and manpower on military training that may be outdated when we need it.

The Associated Press News Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have observed tremendous interest by Members of Congress in the Associated Press news printer located in the Speaker's lobby. A great amount of favorable comment also has reached me about the usefulness of this service in keeping Members informed of top news developments in Washington and throughout the Nation and the world.

Because of this interest, I have asked the Associated Press for some details about the compiling and transmission of its Washington news service.

I have learned that the news we read here is the cream of more than 1,000,000 words transmitted daily by the many wires of the Associated Press—tailored swiftly and carefully by a staff of editors in Washington to include those items of most interest to Members of Congress and others in Washington who need to be continuously informed on the latest news.

The Associated Press gathers and distributes news in every one of the 48 States and in almost every one of the nations of the world. The specialized news report we see in the Capitol is culled from the best that this outstanding news service has to offer.

The main purposes of the Associated Press Washington wire are these: To report the details of newsworthy events throughout Washington; to report news from all parts of the Nation which is of particular interest in Washington; and to report the latest top news from the rest of the world, including news from the battle fronts of Korea.

Much of the material which you see on the teletype nearby is gathered by the Associated Press staff in Washington—the largest news staff in the Capital.

This Associated Press service certainly is one of the most important aids we have to keep us abreast of the news—and as a result, to enable us to do a more intelligent and more efficient job. Without such a service, we would in many instances have to wait until the late afternoon or evening to hear of events or actions which bear on many of the measures we are considering.

Because of the value of this service, I am convinced that similar Associated Press teletypes should be located in strategic spots in the New and Old House Office Buildings, so that Members could be close to reliable news outlets throughout the working day. Moreover, the Associated Press informs me that this service can be extended to the individual offices of the Members of Congress if they desire.

I recommend these possibilities for your consideration in this day when the complexion of the news changes by the hour—even by the minute.

Hon. J. Hardin Peterson, of Florida

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. FERNÓS-ISERN
RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. FERNÓS-ISERN. Mr. Speaker, before the Congress recesses and we all set our respective courses for home grounds, there is still one important piece of unfinished business we should attend to. I might say it is also a pleasant and yet a sad one. That is extending sincerest thanks and Godspeed to one of the outstanding public servants in the House of Representatives. The distinguished gentleman of whom I speak, is, of course, our colleague, J. HARDIN PETERSON.

Mr. PETERSON is returning to private life after 18 successive and successful years of serving in Congress the people of Florida, whom, I am sure have never been better represented in the House of Representatives. I wonder whether the people of Florida realize how well their interests and the interests of the Nation have been represented here by Mr. PETERSON. We, who have seen him in action on the House floor, in committees, or in his office, are well aware of his effectiveness here. Always in regular attendance and invariably in command of the salient points of the legislation at hand, he has been a vigorous and participating Member.

During this Congress, especially, in which he was chairman of the Public Lands Committee, was Mr. PETERSON exceedingly busy. I can say it was a pleasure to serve under him as a member of that committee. However demanding the tasks or however numerous or diversified, J. HARDIN PETERSON always found time, somehow, to give the other fellow's problem courteous and unselfish attention.

I particularly appreciate this quality in our colleague, since the people of Puerto Rico depended upon his committee and his chairmanship in no small degree. The people of Puerto Rico, as well as those of Alaska and Hawaii, look to the actions of the Public Lands Committee as exceedingly important to their political and economical lives. For the Public Lands Committee has jurisdiction over the organic legislation governing the offshore areas. Mr. PETERSON'S cooperation and sympathetic understanding of Puerto Rico's problems were both steadfast and magnificent.

As his service here draws toward its close, and he prepares for a well-earned rest before, I understand, returning to his private practice of law, the people of Puerto Rico join with the people of Florida and the Nation in expressing their warmest thanks and best wishes to Mr. J. HARDIN PETERSON.

What Depleted Companies of (Negro) Twenty-fourth Have Done

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, the fighting tradition established by the Twenty-fourth Infantry in the days of Teddy Roosevelt's charge up San Juan Hill in the Spanish-American War is being carried on today in the Korean war. The following article which appeared in the September 12 issue of the Boston Daily Globe brings this out clearly and marks another instance of distinguished action in the record of this famous Negro regiment. The article follows:

WHAT DEPLETED COMPANIES OF (NEGRO) TWENTY-FOURTH HAVE DONE

(By Stan Swinton)

ON THE MASAN FRONT, September 11.—The Army is checking into the combat performance of the Twenty-fourth Infantry Regiment, oldest Negro fighting unit in the American Army.

It is generally believed that the survey will result in a decision on integration of both Negro and white troops in the regiment. Such integration is favored by both white and Negro officers in the field.

While neither white nor colored officers like to discuss the matter on the record, privately it is conceded that the inspection was touched off because the North Korean break-through September 1 on the Twenty-fifth Division front was made through the Twenty-fourth Regiment.

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—The Twenty-fourth Regiment was among the first American units to see action, hence has been fighting longer than most other troops in the line.)

This break-through followed the see-saw struggle for Battle Mountain 2 miles west of Haman, which the Twenty-fourth Regiment captured, lost, and then retook a half dozen times.

Some officers felt that other troops might have held.

The regiment's new commander, Lt. Col. John T. Corley, Brooklyn's famous "Fighting Irishman" of World War II, made his feelings known today with a general order to all his troops shortly after an Eighth Army inspector visited to check into the Twenty-fourth combat record.

Corley said:

"To the fighting Twenty-fourth United States Infantry: In 60 days of continuous combat you have withstood a roughness of battle which I had not seen in five campaigns in Africa, Sicily, and Europe with the First Infantry Division.

"You have held ground against superior odds. You have lived up to the regimental motto of Semper Paratus (always ready).

"The first United States victory in Korea was your action at Yechon. It has been noted in Congress. The people back home cover in detail your efforts on Battle Mountain, west of Haman, Korea.

"Other units have been unable to accomplish what depleted companies of the fighting Twenty-fourth have done. I am proud of the 'Blockhousers.' (The regimental nickname comes from a blockhouse the Twenty-fourth captured in the charge up San Juan Hill in the Spanish-American War."

After the Negro infantrymen lost Battle Mountain last week, a full white battalion regained the position but was unable to hold it. The scarred high point now is in North Korean hands.

Negro officers concede that combat efficiency of the Twenty-fourth Regiment has dropped as its experienced, noncommissioned officers, officers and soldiers became casualties.

Negro officers say 80 percent of their men favor integration.

Secretary Chapman Upheld

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to have inserted what I consider to be a truly excellent editorial from a Republican paper of New York State, the Watertown Daily Times, relative to the recent discredited charges against Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman. That editorial of September 7, follows:

ATTACKING SECRETARY CHAPMAN

Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman is the latest victim of a wild loyalty attack. Senator SCHOEPPEL, of Kansas, has charged the Cabinet officer with being associated with Communist front groups in the Senate and now must ensue an inquiry which will in the end clear Mr. Chapman although he may suffer personal harm.

The line of Senator SCHOEPPEL runs something like this: Chapman is in favor of statehood for Alaska and Hawaii and should that statehood materialize, he recommends that they be brought within the province of the Department of the Interior. Since the Alaskan Governor, Ernest Gruening, has hired a former public-relations counsel for Communist Poland to publicize the desirability of Alaska becoming the forty-ninth State and since it is the ambition of Governor Gruening to have the Interior Department direct the affairs of Alaska in its prospective statehood; therefore, all who favor this are Communist fronters. There seems to be no recognition of the fact that Alaska, the nearest point to Manchuria and the Soviet, is the one area which the Russians would object to as an American State.

Probably what is behind this attack on Mr. Chapman is his abilities not only as the Administrator of the Interior Department but also his abilities as a politician. The Interior Department has for many years been at the forefront of all programs working for the preservation of the American resources whether land or mineral or forests for the American public. In seeking this objective, the Department comes against many private interests, many of whom can be quite vocal and very critical. Mr. Chapman is also a politician and is pretty competent as demonstrated by the way he organized the last tour of President Truman to the west coast and back. That trip occurred late last April and in early May and the best judgment of all who watched the tour was that it was the best political trip the President ever made.

If the President's campaign trip in October of 1948 was the difference between his victory and Governor Dewey's defeat in the Presidential campaign, the tour of 1950 preserved and enhanced the political popularity of Mr. Truman. Senator SCHOEPPEL, a Republican, naturally does not want Mr. Chapman in any position in Washington which would permit the organization of another such tour, particularly as 1952 rolls around.

Mr. Chapman has made an excellent record for public service since his first arrival in Washington in 1933. He served as Assistant Secretary of the Interior from 1933 to 1946. He had had some political experience before that, having managed the senatorial campaign in New Mexico of the late Senator Edward Costagin. He was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in 1932 and he managed another campaign in Colorado for a victorious Democratic senatorial candidate in 1932. President Roosevelt appointed him as the Assistant Secretary of the Interior in May 1933, under Secretary Ickes. Even after Secretary Ickes left the Interior Department, Mr. Chapman stayed on and served as Under Secretary for Captain Krug. Upon Krug's retirement in 1949, Mr. Chapman moved up to the top job in the Interior Department. Mr. Chapman has been at the front of the campaign to assist the American Indian in getting fair treatment. He has been for the admittance of Hawaii and Alaska for statehood since 1948 when he first testified in their behalf. He has long been a supporter of the St. Lawrence seaway and has so spoken on many occasions.

It seems fairly clear that it is not Mr. Chapman's loyalty that is under fire but rather his progressive views and his abilities as a politician.

Red Drive for Western Europe Grain Markets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including herewith an article which appears on the front page of the Wall Street Journal for Monday, September 11, 1950. This article, written by Edward Hughes, staff correspondent for the Journal from Geneva, Switzerland, recites the efforts which are being made by and through the Economic Commission for Europe, a United Nations agency, by which our grain exports to western Europe will be supplanted by exports from the Communist-dominated countries behind the iron curtain.

If the program inaugurated by this United Nations agency is carried out, it will have some important and far-reaching effects. In the first place, any steps to supplant American outlets for wheat in western Europe will vitally affect every American wheat farmer. Our present farm program as related to wheat is based upon exports in excess of 300,000,000 bushels per year, most of which must go to European countries. To the extent that these markets are lost, it means one or two things, either that our surplus will greatly increase or that American farmers will be compelled to substantially reduce their acreage and production.

Furthermore, if this proposal is carried out it could disastrously affect the present international wheat agreement to which this country is a party. This agreement, which has been entered into by more than 30 of the leading importing nations of the world, is based upon a series of maximum and minimum prices. Should Russia dump large quantities of wheat into the western European countries, which are the largest importers under this agreement, it could very easily break the entire price structure of the agreement, something which would be very costly to the Government of the United States, because sales under the agreement are subsidized and the lower the world price the greater the subsidy which must be paid. In fact, the entry of Russia into this field might very well result in destroying the wheat agreement altogether.

But this proposal has other and far-reaching implications. If western European countries are going to purchase Soviet grain, they will have to give something in exchange. Russia will drive a hard bargain. What she wants is critical materials and machine tools to assist her in building up her war potential. Can we afford to have the nations of western Europe, with whom we are now allied in a military way, and whose defense systems we are building up with large expenditures of American money, contributing to the expansion of Soviet military might? I am bringing this proposal to the attention of Ambassador Harriman, the President's assistant in foreign affairs, and the State Department, and I am urging that efforts be made to protect the vital interests of this Nation in connection with this matter. The newspaper article follows:

RED'S GRAIN—WEST EUROPE WILL TAP IRON CURTAIN COUNTRY BINS—IF STALIN ASSENTS—UN AGENCY THINKS THE DEAL COULD BE STARTER FOR AN EAST-WEST TRADE REVIVAL—WILL KANSAS FARMERS LOSE?

(By Edward Hughes)

GENEVA, SWITZERLAND.—The nations of western Europe want more Russian grain in their daily bread.

If they get it, it will make a big difference to United States wheat farmers from Texas to Kansas to Montana.

Britain and major grain-importing countries on the Continent have notified the Soviets they're ready to sit down and bargain for large additional supplies of the wheat, rye, corn, oats, and barley they need to feed their human and animal populations.

Concrete estimates of their requirements have been handed to the Russians, through the Soviet diplomatic mission in Berne, not far from here. If Stalin and the Politburo decide to go ahead, it will be the signal for a large-scale grain conference—possibly within 30 days.

SOME UN SPONSORSHIP

The negotiations are being sponsored by the Economic Commission for Europe, an agency of the United Nations which maintains headquarters in the vast white-marble Palais des Nations here. Back in June, ECE chief Gunnar Myrdal approached the Russians with a proposal that the traditional east-to-west grain movement be revived. If such could be accomplished, he argued, it might rejuvenate over-all east-west trade, which has dwindled since the war.

The Russians grabbed the grain suggestion in an unusual display of interest. They told Myrdal: Bring us some concrete purchase offers from west Europe and we might talk turkey. Within weeks, a team of ECE dignitaries was speeding across the Continent, interviewing top economic officials in countries which might be interested in buying more Russian grains.

The ECE grain mission recently returned to Geneva, with portfolios crammed with bushel-and-ton figures on possible purchases by the west. "If the Russians want to sell, we've got them some customers," says one expert. He adds: "We found an enthusiastic interest in our project."

FIGURES STILL CONFIDENTIAL

ECE is keeping its newly gathered figures confidential for the moment, but one top official claims west Europe had offered to buy "a very considerable quantity of both bread and coarse grains" from Red-run east Europe, to supplement currently available supplies.

Russia would have much to gain by enlarging her westward sales of grain. Her current orders for western finished goods indicate a continuing desperate need for all sorts of machinery—and for the foreign exchange with which to buy this industrial equipment.

But more important, it's believed the men in the Kremlin might have more subtle political and economic purposes in mind. One of the most important bonds cementing western Europe to the United States politically is the continuing trade dependence on America fostered by the Marshall plan. Experts here think Russia may hope to weaken these political ties by a return to commerce on a sizable scale between Red Europe and the rest of the Continent.

PRICE-HAVOC PLOT?

Another attraction for the Russians, as seen by some experts here, is the possibility of wrecking havoc in the west's price structure by injecting large additional supplies of grain into the world's commerce.

More than 30 nations, for example, are tied to the United States, Canada, and Australia as major sources for their wheat supplies under the 4-year International Wheat Agreement—which Russia recently tried unsuccessfully to enter. This pact involves a specific guaranty on the part of exporters to sell portions of their wheat at prices within a fixed range.

So far, exporters have been able to hold purchase prices under the agreement at or near the top of this price scale. But with world supplies of wheat at postwar peaks, there's new pressure building which threatens to send pact prices crashing to the floor levels provided under the agreement.

Given that situation, what if Russia decided to start selling large quantities of wheat in European markets? United States wheat officials bravely insist they're all for a revival of this east-to-west trade, but they admit it might be all that's needed to break the price structure of the present agreement.

COULD COST THE UNITED STATES

Such a development would be extremely costly to the United States. That's because Uncle Sam subsidizes all sales under the agreement. The United States pays American farmers the difference between going market prices and sales prices for export under the agreement. This gap is already wider than expected, with the resulting expenditures by the Government now running into millions of dollars annually to pay the subsidy.

What's more, if Russia comes into the European markets in a big way, it would likely mean American farmers would be selling much less wheat abroad. As it is, United States sales under the wheat pact lagged well below the quota last year, because of a natural tendency on the part of importers to seek nondollar wheat.

American growers of other grains would face the same prospect if Russia started pouring rye, corn, oats, and barley into western Europe.

With cost-free Marshall-plan grain beginning to dwindle, there's no question that west Europe would jump at the chance to procure large amounts of nondollar grain. The ability to buy Russian wheat, for instance, would solve western Germany's greatest single dollar-gap headache. Much the same goes for Britain, which is frantically seeking as much wheat as possible from nondollar Australia, but must spend much of her dollar fund for United States and Canadian grains.

GRAIN-TRADE HISTORY

The east-to-west grain trade since the war has followed the general downward pattern of over-all commerce between the two political spheres. Back in 1938, shipments of grains comprised nearly 25 percent of the total value of $1,213,000,000 worth of a score of the most important food and industrial items exported from east Europe to 11 western European nations. They were the largest single item on the list.

What's that picture these days? In 1948, this over-all list of commodities in the east-to-west commerce was valued at just $393,000,000. Bread and coarse grains were still the most important shipments, valued at a total of $143,000,000, a substantial quantity, but less than half the 1938 grain-trade value Last year, there was some recovery toward the prewar level, but shipments remained relatively small.

Moreover, as the political winds shifted, bringing the formerly independent eastern European countries under the Communist wing, long-range prospects for expansion of this east-west trade grew slimmer. Russia and her satellites began insisting that western payment in return for eastern raw materials be in finished commodities which were being kept out of Soviet hands for strategic reasons.

MORE MOSCOW TIRADES

When the question of east-west trade came up at ECE meetings, it became the habit of Russia's delegate to take the floor to launch a political tirade against the United States charging that Uncle Sam was blocking western Europe's trade with the east in order to protect his own markets for the Marshall-dumping plan.

That's why it came as something of a surprise to ECE officials when Russia stopped hampering ECE proceedings long enough to promise a modicum of cooperation in the new grain-trade development scheme.

Just how much additional grain can Russia supply the west? The answer to that question is a mystery outside the iron curtain. Statistics on production, supplies, and exports for Russia and the satellites are few and far between. Even UN experts have been able to put together only a fragmentary picture of the situation. But, whatever the supply position of the Reds, experience in the 1930's shows that they're willing to go to any lengths to export if the political or economic situation requires it.

RUSSIA CONTROLS BREADBASKET

With her new control over the valuable east Europe grain region, Soviet Russia is in a much stronger position to coordinate sales of grain to the west—providing there's grain to export. It seems safe to say that grain production in the European grain area still lags behind prewar average output, but indications are that the Russian grain crops have already topped prewar levels. In 1949, according to the United Nations experts, Russia's output of all grains was about 124,500,000 tons That would be about 8,000,000 tons above 1948 output and about 4,000,000 to 6,000,000 tons above 1940 production.

There is little definite that can be said of this year's grain crops east of the iron curtain. Earlier in the season prospects were for bumper crops of both bread grains, like wheat and rye, and coarse grains, like corn, oats and barley, which usually are used for livestock feeding. Now, however, reports from the Danube basin indicate that protracted dry weather in recent weeks has caused extensive change in all grain harvest prospects.

The corn crop is said to be especially damaged. The well-informed British trade publication, "Corn Trade News," reported a few days ago that Rumania's corn crop may actually fall below last year's harvest, from which nothing at all was exported. There's been severe damage in Hungary also, says the publication, concluding that "the evidence seems to suggest forcibly that no supply of any importance will be available from this year's crops" in the Danube area of east Europe. Other reports say the dry weather has reached into Russia's Ukraine, too.

WANTS LONG CONTRACTS

But, if Russia sits down with western Europe at a grain parley, chances are she'll be trying to commit importers to contracts extending over a period of several years. And, says the UN, chances are Red-run grain producing areas will be turning out larger exportable supplies in the next few years. Despite an apparent reduction in investment in agriculture, eastern Europe plans a 20 percent increase in bread grain production over prewar levels by 1953. Says an ECE expert: "It appears reasonable to suppose that these nations could supply out of this production a volume of exports amounting to the 1934–38 average."

The outlook for exportable supplies of coarse grains, like corn, oats, and barley, isn't as good. Because of a planned reduction of acreage of coarse grains in favor of bread grains and other crops, it appears that exportable supplies won't exceed 60 percent of the 1934–38 level in eastern Europe, in the next 3 years.

There's no way to be certain, but Russia seems able to do better than that herself. In 1934–38, she exported an average 750,000 tons of bread grain annually as well as a yearly average 400,000 tons of coarse grain. There are indications she can supply twice that amount to foreign nations now. It is recalled, for example, that during her recent futile attempt to join the International Wheat Agreement, she demanded an annual export quota of 2,000,000 tons of wheat.

Foot Soldier Still Tops in Modern Warfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of my colleagues and the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to an editorial published September 8, 1950, in the Karlstad Advocate, of Karlstad, Minn.

Published by Dane H. Nordine and L. Curtiss Lindberg, the Karlstad Advocate is one of the finest weekly newspapers in Minnesota.

Comprehensive in its analysis and practical in its conclusions, the editorial drives home a very important point—the poor, bloody infantry has been the queen of battles in Korea.

The Advocate publishers pay fitting tribute to the finest and most reliable weapon the American Nation will ever have—GI Joe, our foot soldier.

The editorial follows:

In the light of current events, it is interesting to look back about a year, to the time when the headlines were largely occupied over what kind of weapons we needed, and how the next war would have to be fought. The star of the Air Force was then in its ascendancy, and its more extreme partisans were arguing passionately that the airplane—and most especially jet fighters and the huge intercontinental bombers—could do practically all of the job. The Navy, the argument ran, would in the future be only a minor, auxiliary service, and should be deprived of most, possibly all, of its own planes and carriers. The tank was obsolete, or nearly so, because new weapons had made it practically as vulnerable to fire as a jeep. And the role of the foot soldier, always paramount in past wars, would be relatively a minor one next time.

In this war, the biggest bombers have hardly been used, nor are they likely to be used to any extent. They are adapted to global, all-out war, in which they would carry A-bombs to vital enemy targets thousands of miles away from their bases.

The Air Force has performed splendidly in Korea, and has inflicted heavy damage on Red forces. But reports from the front have said time and again that the jet planes in this type of campaign, have been a disappointment. Valuable as they are in air combat, they are too fast, and too limited in the time they can stay aloft, to operate as well in close support of troops as piston-engined planes.

Navy air, once written off as an obsolete weapon, has proven enormously vital. A traditional Navy dominates the sea lanes and the harbors.

The most dramatic example of the worth of an old weapon is found in the tank. It was the greatest single factor in making possible the North Korean drive.

Finally, the role of the foot soldier has again been all-important. Despite all the new and revolutionary concepts yet uttered, the "poor, bloody infantry" has been the queen of battles in Korea.

It may be that in the future, and in another kind of war if it comes, those new concepts may find some justification. They have not so far, and it is evident that it would be disastrous folly to accept them at theoretical value.

Let's Keep Him on the Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN PHILLIPS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 13, 1950

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, like almost all of us in the House of Representatives, my colleague, Representative HUBERT B. SCUDDER, of the First California District, is asking the people of that district to reelect him to Congress in November, on the basis of the excellent record he has made here. He and I served together in the State assembly. When the distinguished and beloved dean of the California delegation, Clarence F. Lea, retired in 1948, HUBERT SCUDDER was asked by his people to run for that office and was elected by a pleasing vote. He is a member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, an important committee to my State. He has worked hard and successfully for his district and for California and for this Nation in a critical period of its history. He brought to Congress the experience he had acquired in previous legislative and administrative work. The results speak for themselves. His constituents will do well to send him back and so take advantage of the experience and the seniority he has here.

Evidently that is what the people think in the first district. Under permission to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Petaluma Argus-Courier of September 9, under the heading "Let's keep him on the job":

LET'S KEEP HIM ON THE JOB

"He is tailor-made for the job."

That is what we said of Hubert Scudder during his first campaign for Congress in this district.

We made that statement because we knew from his record as assemblyman from this district and later as real-estate commissioner for the entire State that he had proved himself as a capable legislator and administrator.

Now that he has served us for the greater part of one term, we are more convinced than ever that he is tailor-made for the job.

His record entitles him to another term and as many more terms as he may wish to serve.

He knows this congressional district better than any man we know of. He has served it better than any man we know of could have served it during his first term of office.

Every important interest in his entire district has had his earnest attention when there was especial need for it. That he will continue to give that kind of service, regardless of his political affiliations, is a foregone conclusion. For this reason alone, we should keep him where he is.

He is a Republican. That is important because we must have a balancing of power in the national legislative chambers to prevent the avid seekers for power from taking advantage of the present world crisis to further their efforts toward the welfare state, the socialistic state, the state that considers itself above the individual and seeks to retain its power by handing out special privileges to pressure groups.

We need him to preserve that essential balance between the urban and rural sections. He is well grounded in the needs of the country districts as against the special mass interests of the city districts. He is not opposed to legislation that is for the benefit of the urban sections, but he is more zealous than a city dweller could be for the preservation of the integrity and influence of the rural areas.

Every county in his congressional district needs that vital protection against the policies advocated by the masses of the more thickly settled portions of our State, against the masses that are swayed by the blandishments and promises of the demagogue.

He is firmly grounded in the belief that private enterprise must be protected against the further encroachments of the Federal Government.

He believes in preserving the rights of the States and of the local political entities so that we shall not be governed by bureaucrats centralized in Washington, unfitted for Government and bent on preserving their power by whatever means they may think will win the votes of an unthinking majority.

He is broad minded to the extent that he will go along with the administration in Washington in the prosecution of a war that is almost certain to engulf us in the most titanic struggle we have ever had. Yet he will not hesitate to prevent, as far as possible, a rooting of trends that will turn the United States into a totalitarian state just because its war powers have been so great and so devastating to the democracy we love.

We cannot take chances on a candidate who promises pieces of cheese from the moon, who has had little, if any, experience in political office, who has advocated policies that will, if put into effect, lead us further into the clutches of the welfare state.

We still believe that Hubert Scudder is tailor-made for the job. Let's keep him in it.

Go down to the American Legion Hall next Tuesday afternoon at 3:15 and hear him speak in his "Washington Report." You will be more convinced than ever that we should retain his services as Congressman from this district.

Truman Pays Off Labor Leaders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, when President Truman fired Robert N. Denham, general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, he was paying off a debt or a promise to Phil Murray, of the CIO, and Bill Green, of the American Federation of Labor, either for past favors or favors to come—who knows. As part of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I am including an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post on September 18 which is pertinent to this subject. It follows:

PARTIAL PAY-OFF

President Truman has asked and received the resignation of Robert N. Denham as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

That, coming just ahead of the congressional elections, is an obvious pay-off to Philip Murray, William Green, and other union leaders for their political support, given in the past and avidly desired in the future, of the President and his branch of the Democratic Party.

It is, to be sure, only a partial payment. Mr. Truman has not been able to deliver on his promise to bring about repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

That's what the union leaders really want, and want more than ever just now, since it would restore their power to enforce legalized closed shops and impose compulsory union membership on present and new workers in expanding defense industries.

AFL craft unions, in particular, used such power ruthlessly to enrich themselves in World War II. They exacted outrageously high fees and dues from workers seeking jobs on defense projects—workers who, in countless cases, got only what amounted to temporary work permits and never were given the real or theoretical benefits of full union membership.

But Mr. Truman has failed to convince many Democrats and most Republicans in Congress that the Taft-Hartley Act is as bad as he and the union leaders say. He could have had it modified, to meet reasonable objections, but he could not get it repealed and the biased Wagner Act restored.

So, as the next best thing, he has ousted Mr. Denham, whom the union leaders denounce as an "enemy of labor." He tried unsuccessfully to do that a few months ago, by asking Congress to abolish the independent office of general counsel to the NLRB, in the name of "Government reorganization." Now he has done it on the theory that the general counsel must be someone who will work in "harmonious relationship" with the NLRB's members.

When the Taft-Hartley Act became effective in 1947, Mr. Truman appointed Mr. Denham and the NLRB members and told them that, much as he disliked the new law, he wanted them to enforce it as written and as Congress intended.

Mr. Denham and the members have differed, frequently and at times bitterly, as to how the law should be enforced. The relationship, certainly, has been far from "harmonious"—but whether that was the fault of Mr. Denham or of the Board members is a quite different question.

This newspaper believes that Mr. Denham tried conscientiously and courageously to enforce the law as Congress wrote and intended it, and a preponderance of court decisions seems to support that belief. What results from harmony between a new general counsel and the Board may please the union leaders, and enhance their power. How well it will please rank-and-file union members and the general public remains to be seen.

Practice Before Federal Administrative Agencies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address made by me at the American Bar Association convention:

I

Mr. Chairman, and ladies and gentleman, I am glad of this opportunity to appear before the section of administrative law of the American Bar Association and to discuss the pending legislation to regulate practice before the Federal administrative agencies.

It is now evident that the Congress will not be likely to enact legislation upon this subject during its present session. Furthermore, it is perfectly apparent to those of us who have been working to secure a needed law to regulate practice before Federal administrative agencies that, if a law dealing with the situation is ever enacted in the immediately foreseeable future, it will only be brought about by the united efforts of every person who recognizes the need for such a law.

Opposition to any law dealing with practice before Federal administrative agencies is fairly widespread. I think that, in large measure, most of the opposition is due to a lack of understanding of the purposes of such legislation.

It is fitting, therefore, to review with you the history of the efforts which have been made to date to secure what many of us feel to be much-needed legislation in this field. It is my hope that this discussion will contribute to a deeper understanding of the problem.

II

Let us begin our consideration by a review of the objectives of the latest bill upon this subject, which is H. R. 8201. This bill is designed (1) to impose standards of professional or ethical conduct upon lawyer and nonlawyer practitioners before Federal administrative agencies; (2) to provide a centralized system for the licensing of lawyers, permitting the several agencies to license nonlawyers, as the agencies are now permitted by law to do; and (3) to establish a needed statutory system for disciplinary proceedings relative to lawyers and nonlawyers. The bill is also designed to clarify the circumstances under which former Government officers and employees may practice before Federal administrative agencies.

Thus, H. R. 8201 deals with several distinct problems. While all of these problems relate in one way or another to practice before Federal agencies, separate circumstances have given rise to the need for the several provisions of the bill.

1. From the standpoint of lawyers, perhaps one of the most troublesome features of practice before Federal agencies is the necessity for a lawyer to qualify separately before each of the several agencies with which he may have occasion to do business. Under our system of government and law, it has long been customary for the States to issue licenses to persons found to be competent and qualified to practice law. In a great majority of instances, the highest courts of the States (and I include the United States District Court for the District of Columbia insofar as lawyers in the District of Columbia are concerned) supervise the admission to practice of lawyers. Moreover, lawyers are subject to the ethical standards which prevail generally in the legal profession, and they are subject to disbarment by State courts in appropriate instances.

Notwithstanding the qualifications and competence of a lawyer, as determined by the State which licensed him to practice, such a lawyer is not now entitled to practice before many Federal administrative agencies unless he meets the special qualifications of a particular agency.

Many of you must have personally had the experience of coming to Washington to represent a client only to find that you were not qualified to practice before some particular agency, and that it was necessary for you to apply to that agency for permission to appear before it.

The situation is made more difficult, from a lawyer's standpoint, because, even after a lawyer qualifies to practice before a given agency, he is not entitled to practice before another Federal agency. In short, each agency is presently privileged to impose its own requirements upon persons who appear before it in a representative capacity.

Of course, not all agencies have requirements, and there is a great deal of variation among the requirements of agencies which do regulate the persons who appear before them as lawyers or otherwise. One agency may, for example, enroll the name of a lawyer to practice before it upon application of the lawyer and a statement by him that he is qualified to practice law in a given State. In another case, the agency may require a certificate from the clerk of the highest court of the State in which the applicant is licensed to practice.

The full absurdity of the situation is demonstrated by the fact that some agencies will not accept the certificate of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States as evidence of a lawyer's qualifications, but insist upon a certificate from the clerk of the highest court of the State wherein the lawyer is licensed to practice, notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States itself, as a preliminary to admission to practice before it, requires the lawyer to furnish a certificate from the clerk of the highest court in his State. Still other agencies do not require the furnishing of a certificate from any court, but require a sworn statement from a lawyer who desires to practice before it stating that he is licensed to practice before some State or Federal court.

Finally, it may be noted that at least one agency, the Patent Office, requires lawyers to demonstrate a special technical competence apart from other legal training before admitting lawyers to practice.

The sheer difficulties arising from the minute differentiations in procedures for admission to practice relative to the different agencies creates useless obstacles to lawyers without any corresponding benefits to the public or to anyone else.

The conditions which I have just outlined have resulted in the proposal, now incorporated in H R. 8201, to provide a centralized system for the licensing of lawyers. Basically, the idea is to make it possible for a lawyer who has already been authorized to practice by the courts to go before a central Federal credentials committee and to secure a permit or a license which will entitle him thereafter to practice before any Federal administrative agency.

There does not seem to be much objection to this particular feature of the proposed legislation. As can be readily seen, it is a matter of primary concern to lawyers, and almost everyone who has considered the problem recognizes the merit of the proposal.

The principal opposition to H. R. 8201 arises because of other features of the bill growing out of still other conditions, which I shall now discuss.

2. Unlike the situation which prevails in courts, the Federal agencies now permit nonlawyers, as well as lawyers, to practice before them. Certified public accountants regularly appear before such agencies as the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Also, lay rate experts, sometimes known as traffic managers, may appear in a representative capacity before such agencies as the Interstate Commerce Commission. Many of the agencies, by rules, separately provide for the admission to practice before them of such nonlawyers. Moreover, these nonlawyers may now appear in proceedings required to be conducted pursuant to sections 7 and 8 of the Administrative Procedure Act. Consequently, they may appear in proceedings the records of which subsequently are subject to review by the courts.

While these nonlawyers must meet the requirements of particular agencies before practicing before such agencies, they are not, with some notable exceptions, subject to any professional or ethical standards similar to those which govern the conduct of lawyers. Many people feel that modern government is so intricate that no man should be permitted to hold himself out as a professional unless he has met professional requirements. In saying this, I do not mean for one moment to disparage the nonlawyer specialist. Rather, it is my intent and that of those of similar thinking to place the nonlawyer specialist upon a real professional footing. The public is entitled to representation by persons not only of good moral character, but equipped with the necessary technical skill and understanding of professional responsibilities. Practically all of the States already have legislation upon this subject for the better security of the people against incompetency and dishonesty.

At all events, there are many people who feel that, in these days when administrative agencies have taken over much of the work formerly left to the courts, it is timely that there be regulation of all practitioners before such agencies, just as there has long been the licensing of lawyers by the courts. Regulation which has been found advisable for lawyers should surely apply as well to others who undertake to perform similar functions. The lack of an effective counterpart to the professional and ethical requirements governing lawyers among nonlawyer specialists in the administrative field tends to undermine the application of standards of conduct to any practitioner, whether he be lawyer or nonlawyer.

It is out of the foregoing considerations and conditions that it is proposed, in H. R. 8201, to require the agencies to license nonlawyers.

3. Another condition which has contributed to the proposal for a Federal licensing system with respect to lawyers and nonlawyers is the fact that, whether we like it or not, Washington appears to be the gathering place for some persons who, back in their home communities, have dubious professional reputations. In many cases, persons on the verge of being disbarred move to Washington and hold themselves out as practitioners before administrative agencies. It is not possible, under the present system, for the agencies themselves to screen all applicants in such a manner as to weed out the unfit and incompetent. Indeed, as I have previously pointed out, many of the agencies do not require any showing, and some agencies which do require a showing only require that the applicant prove that he holds a license to practice in a particular State, and do not require him to show that he is presently practicing in such State.

In view of this condition, it is proposed, in H. R. 8201, to require lawyer applicants, among other things, either to show that they are engaged in the practice of law, or, if that is not the case, to submit reasonable and satisfactory evidence of character and fitness. It is felt that, in this way, the problem of the so-called migratory lawyer will be dealt with effectively.

4. So far, I have only dealt with the conditions out of which have grown proposals to license both lawyers and nonlawyers. But H. R. 8201 also deals with the right of an officer or employee, or a former officer or employee, of the Federal Government to practice before Federal agencies. As all of you know, there is today a multiplicity of conflicting and diverse statutory provisions upon this subject.[1] It is frequently difficult to decide, even after investigation, whether, in a given instance, it is permissible for a lawyer or nonlawyer to appear before a Federal agency when such person is or has been connected with the Government. Out of this condition has grown the proposal, contained in H. R. 8201, for a simple rule upon this subject.

III

Although H. R. 8201 is the latest bill in which it is proposed to deal with the conditions just described, in a comprehensive fashion, the regulation of practice before Federal administrative agencies is not a new matter. Bills upon the subject have been introduced in practically every Congress during the last 15 years. Some 20 bills in all have been introduced.

In 1938, the Bar Association of the District of Columbia issued a report dealing with "Admissions to and control over practice before Federal administrative agencies." In 1941, the final report of the Attorney General's committee on administrative procedure took note of the fact that lawyers, although duly licensed and subject to discipline by the courts of both the Federal Government and the several States, have been unnecessarily required to obtain many special licenses from administrative agencies to do what the courts have already authorized them to do.

When the Administrative Procedure Act was before the House of Representatives in 1946, it was earnestly argued by some persons that it should contain something on the subject; but it was too large and important a subject for fragmentary treatment as a mere part of the Administrative Procedure Act. Accordingly, those responsible for the Administrative Procedure Act specifically eliminated therefrom any provision dealing with the present subject matter in a definitive way, it being the express intention on the part of the congressional proponents of the Administrative Procedure Act to deal with the subject of practice before Federal administrative agencies in a subsequent and separate bill.

Consequently, in the Eightieth Congress, H. R. 2657 and H. R. 7100 were introduced. Elaborate and extensive hearings were conducted on H. R. 2657 before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives in July of 1947 and in January and February of 1948. At these hearings all interested persons were given an opportunity to express their views on any and all of the problems relative to practice before Federal administrative agencies.

Although no legislation was passed upon the subject during the Eightieth Congress, the aforementioned hearings furnished the basis for proposed legislation during the present Eighty-first Congress. Accordingly, during the first session of the present Congress, on April 29, 1949, I introduced H. R. 4446, which was designed to deal with all of the conditions which I outlined above, as well as related matters. This bill was favorably reported, with certain amendments, by the House Committee on the Judiciary, on June 24, 1949, accompanied by report No. 905. This report, as an official administrative law document of lasting interest and importance to the bar, was published in full in the July 15, 1949, issue of the Administrative Law Bulletin, issued by the Section of Administrative Law of the American Bar Association.

H. R. 4446 was briefly discussed in the House on July 6, 1949, but was passed over without any decisive action. It again came before the House on March 15, 1950, at which time considerable debate occurred. However, upon this occasion also no decisive action was taken on H. R. 4443, since it appeared that Members of the House were under a misconception of the purpose and effect of the proposal.

The chief point of concern, expressed by several Members, was whether some form of monopoly was being fostered for the benefit of lawyers, particularly for the lawyers of the District of Columbia. Some Members also expressed concern over the creation of the credentials committee, feeling that it was given too much power by H. R. 4443 and that it would be another needless Federal agency. Still other Members felt that no authority should be given to the credentials committee or to the agencies to determine the morals of the persons sent to Washington to represent companies or other persons having business with the Government. Considerable discussion ensued as to what was meant by the moral fitness of practitioners.

At the hearings in 1947 and 1948, one of the principal opponents of legislation upon this subject was the American Institute of Accountants, an organization comprising some 10,000 certified public accountants in this country. However, I was able to inform the House, during the debate on H. R. 4443 on March 15, 1950, that a committee of the American Bar Association and a committee of the American Institute of Accountants had reconciled their differences. I was also able to state that the American Institute of Accountants no longer opposes the measure, but feels that it is in the public interest to enact it as quickly as possible.

Notwithstanding all of this, no decisive action was taken on H. R. 4443, and, in view of the indicated concern of the Members of the House of Representatives I revised H. R. 4443 by the elimination of the provision which provided for a single credentials committee to license both lawyers and nonlawyers. I also revised the section of H. R. 4443 dealing with the licensing of nonlawyers so as to permit the several Federal agencies to continue, as they are now doing, to license nonlawyers to appear before them.

My revised bill was introduced as H. R. 8201 on April 25, 1950, and was favorably reported, without amendment, by the House Committee on the Judiciary on June 7, 1950, accompanied by report No. 2488. Although H. R. 8201 was brought up at least twice on the call of the calendar in July, it was objected to and passed over without debate. On August 17, 1950, the House Rules Committee reported out House Resolution 816 (H. Rept. 2954), granting a rule to permit H. R. 8201 to be placed on the House Calendar. It was my hope that the House would see fit to pass H. R. 8201 as it now stands. However, in view of widespread continued opposition to any legislation dealing with the regulation of nonlawyers, I regret to report to you that it is useless to expect any legislation to pass upon this subject during the remaining months of this session of Congress.

IV

Proponents of this legislation must look to the future.

It is clear that, if we are to secure the passage of legislation respecting practice before Federal administrative agencies, much educational work must be done. It is apparent to me that at least some of the opposition to a law upon this subject stems from a misunderstanding of what is proposed. I think that the groundwork for effective action in the next Congress can be laid if, starting now, the lawyers in every community will apprise the public of the problems involved and of the solutions proposed. To date, the organized bar of the country has given this legislation its unqualified endorsement and approval. But I wish to say, as emphatically as I know how, that those of us in the Congress who are sponsoring this legislation must continue to have the active assistance of the organized bar through every stage of the legislative process. Only in this way can we hope to pass this remedial legislation.

When you return to your communities, I would like for you to carry with you a clear understanding of certain basic principles and to make these known wherever it will do the most good. Permit me to recapitulate.

First, I ask you to bear in mind that, after a good many years of experimentation, there has now developed what might be termed a national program with respect to administrative law and procedure in this country. The Administrative Procedure Act, passed in 1946, carried into effect one phase of the program. Pending proposals to establish an administrative court and to prescribe uniform rules of administrative procedure deal with another part of the program. We are not here to discuss that phase of the program. In due time, I am sure that the American Bar Association and the Members of Congress will make known their views upon these subjects.

The proposed legislation presently under discussion, that dealing with practice before administrative agencies, represents another phase of the program respecting administrative law and procedure which is actively engaging the attention of the bar and of the country in general.

As to this last phase of the program, I ask you, as lawyers, to remember what is needed.

There is need for a centralized credentials committee where a regularly licensed lawyer may go and obtain a license or permit which will enable him to practice before all Federal agencies.

There is also a need for the licensing of nonlawyers and for the prescription of appropriate ethical standards to govern nonlawyers.

There is need for some provision to provide for disciplinary proceedings respecting persons practicing before administrative agencies.

Finally, there is a need to bring some order out of the chaotic state of the law respecting the right of former officers and employees of the Government to practice before Federal agencies.

The foregoing are some of the things which should be covered by the proposed legislation. Between now and the next session of the Congress we shall have time to perfect our draft of a bill to carry out these and related objectives.

I would like to close by pointing out some of the things which would not be affected by the proposed legislation.

While the bill will, of course, prohibit a person from practicing before any agency without credentials, this only means that a person must hold credentials to participate in regulatory proceedings for compensation and, therefore, does not extend to advisory functions, commercial-type transactions with agencies (such as some of the work of the customhouse brokers), or mere applications or requests for information. Also, the proposed legislation does not relate to proceedings in customs courts or public authorities composed of representatives of parties. It would also not include proceedings before the Tax Court of the United States.

Under the definition of practice, which it is proposed to incorporate in the legislation, attorneys or others who appear before administrative agencies as an incident to some other activity would not be included. Neither would a person be subject to the act who appears on his own behalf. Also exempted would be religious, fraternal, benevolent, philanthropic, charitable, labor, veterans', and other organizations of a nonprofit nature in their legitimate fields of endeavor.

V

I hope that I have made some contribution to your understanding of the problems which have confronted those of us inside and outside of the Congress who have fought so long to secure the passage of a law upon the subject under consideration. We believe in what we are doing. I hope, also, that you believe in the cause and that you will use every resource at your command to help us to secure the passage of a law which will constitute another milestone on the road to a more perfect administrative justice.

A Tribute to Willis Eide, a True Sportsman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, my home city of Crookston, Minn., has recently lost one of its most widely known and respected sportsmen and citizens. A tragic automobile accident has taken the life of Willis Eide, a true friend of the city's youth, not only in Crookston and its immediate vicinity but everywhere.

In my brief remarks today I wish to pay tribute to this fine young sports enthusiast whose loss is so sorely felt not only in my Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota, but in adjoining areas as well.

Although not an active participant in sports, Willis Eide actively promoted them--especially baseball and basketball. He was the city's most loyal rooter for local teams.

For many weeks this summer he had worked on his most outstanding sports promotion job. Assisted by Roy Lindell, another of Crookston's most loyal sports fans, and sponsored by the Crookston Elks Lodge, 342, Eide planned and built 26 basketball backboards to be used by local youths.

On the night of August 31, approximately 350 persons gathered to dedicate the backboards that bore the notation—"Willis Eide Memorial." Youngsters, city officials, Elks brothers and many parents attended.

Two youngsters in basketball suits led a parade from the Elks club to the scene of the dedication.

One of the most appropriate tributes on the program was made in the remarks of Earl Hoffman, Grand Forks, N. Dak., high-school athletics official. "In the halls of fame reserved for the Babe Ruths, the George Gipps, the Ty Cobbs, the Lou Gehrigs," said Hoffman, "there should be reserved an especial niche for the Willis Eides, the men whose inspiration in the finest principles of American sportsmanship bring out the best in participants and officials and inspire the younger generations to even greater athletic achievement."

From Washington, D. C., I wired:

The basketball backboards dedicated today are a fitting tribute to this friend of the city's youth. Crookston will long remember the kindness and sportsmanship of Willis Eide.

I commend the Crookston Elks lodge for their impressive memorial program and join them in expressing sympathy to Willis Eide's parents, Mr. and Mrs. P. J. Eide; his brothers, Everett and John; and his sister, Jeul.

Council of Futility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I am including an editorial that appeared in the Washington News on Monday, September 18, 1950:

The Council of Foreign Ministers—the so-called Big Three, composed of Secretary of State Acheson and Foreign Ministers Bevin of Britain and Schuman of France—met for 3 days last week without reaching agreement on any of the major problems vital to western security.

They meet again today in a final session, with little prospect that anything will be accomplished.

All decisions on important issues have been laid aside for further consideration at a future meeting. This has been the pattern followed by the Council since its creation at Potsdam in 1945, when it included Russia and was known as the Big Four.

The Big Four was inoperative because Russia would not work in harmony with the west. Since the Soviets quit attending Council meetings, the British and French Ministers' hands have been tied by domestic political considerations.

At the meetings last week, Messrs. Bevin and Schuman would not agree to rearm the west Germans now, as Mr. Acheson proposed, even while admitting that German troops would be needed if western Europe is attacked.

Both also balked at expanding their own rearmament programs.

Secretary Acheson urged them to agree on measures which would make them strong enough to fight by 1952, if possible, and by 1953 at the latest. The British and French said they couldn't rearm on the scale proposed before 1955 at the earliest. The thought that Russia might not be willing to wait that long was not their immediate concern. Both the British and French Ministers are thinking of their next home elections, just as the party in power here is doing.

But the French and British statesmen appear to forget that Americans also vote. Unwilling to risk the displeasure of their own constituencies by urging larger expenditures for armament, Messrs. Bevin and Schuman confidently expect continuing American financial assistance in what little their respective countries are doing. More than that, both countries want more American money than they have been getting.

The Economic Cooperation Administration has just cut its aid program to Greece on the grounds that the Athens government has not shown sufficient progress in its own recovery efforts. Britain and France may need a dose of the same medicine to speed their rearmament.

When the Ministers failed to agree on anything at their meeting in London last May, Secretary Acheson made the mistake of promising that some new form of assistance would be forthcoming at the end of the Marshall plan. On the eve of the current meeting, President Truman tossed away more of our bargaining power by promising more American troops for Europe. Certain conditions were attached to the pledge, to be sure. But Europeans have come to believe that all such conditions will be waived if they find them too onerous—as they always do.

Our generosity is defeating our own purposes. It is high time to insist on something to show for our money. We get nowhere by helping people who refuse to help themselves.

Psychiatric Casualties at High Rate in Korean War

REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT B. SCUDDER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, a situation has come to my attention which warrants the sober consideration of each Member of this House and, indeed, of the entire populace of this Nation. It is the number of psychiatric casualties suffered by our Armed Forces engaged in the Korean war.

The shocking conditions among our troops in the Far East were described by Dr. Karl M. Bowman, of the University of California, one of the Nation's foremost psychiatrists, upon his return to the United States. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an article from the San Francisco Chronicle of September 8, 1950, describing an interview with Dr. Bowman.

Those of you who read the article will note the words of reassurance Dr. Bowman gives—that the chances for cure in psychiatric cases are good, at least 3 to 1.

Such cures can be achieved, however, only if sufficient neuropsychiatric hospital facilities for veterans are made available in the United States. The duty of Congress is to assure that these men are given the best treatment possible. We must see that the Nation-wide neuropsychiatric hospital program is carried on without delay.

As the only California Member serving on the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am particularly interested in seeing the early construction of two such hospitals already authorized for my State—one in San Francisco, the other in the Los Angeles area.

Following is the article from the Chronicle describing the interview with Dr. Bowman:

PSYCHIATRIC CASUALTIES—UC EXPERT REPORTS FAIRLY HIGH RATE IN KOREAN WAR

A top psychiatrist just back from the Far East yesterday reported the Korean war is a tough one—on the minds as well as the bodies of our fighting men.

The psychiatrist, Dr. Karl Murdock Bowman, of the University of California, warned that the special conditions of the Korean fighting might result in a fairly high rate of mental breakdown among the first troops in action.

He did not define fairly high rate.

But he added the reassuring word: The changes of a cure in psychiatric cases are good—at least 3 to 1.

TOUGHER THAN ANZIO

Dr. Bowman said psychiatric casualties from Korean battle fronts even included quite a number of tough combat veterans who fought through the last war without a breakdown. "Every one of these insisted that what they'd hit in Korea was tougher than anything they'd ever seen on the Normandy or Anzio or Pacific beaches," he explained.

Dr Bowman is medical superintendent of the university's Langley Porter Clinic here. He toured military hospitals in Japan and Okinawa as a consultant to the Army's Surgeon General.

"The men I saw," he related, "had been fighting a retreating war against overwhelming numbers, under horrible climatic conditions.

"They had a hard time knowing who were friends and who were foes, and they knew the enemy was constantly infiltrating. They had not expected the North Koreans to be so well trained and equipped.

"One would expect a fairly high rate of psychiatric casualties under such conditions in those first troops thrown over there."

TYPICAL CASE

One of the typical mental cases he cited from the early Korean fighting was that of a sergeant, 26, a Luzon combat veteran, who had never even been nervous before.

The sergeant lasted only 7 days at the Korean front. He told Dr. Bowman later: "It was all mixed up. Every day we'd hold, and then get out as best we could. They'd keep coming in behind us, and we couldn't get out, but we got out."

He broke under sustained, heavy, close-range artillery fire. "He was suffering from typical battle dreams when I saw him," Dr. Bowman said, "but was responding to rest and treatment. He is probably back at the front by now."

Truman's China Policy Caused Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include my conclusions as to why Truman's China policy caused the Korean war:

The Truman-Acheson policy in China is responsible for the tragic war in Korea. This policy encouraged the Chinese Communists and when the Nationalist Government fled to Formosa, the vital interests of the United States in the Pacific became precarious.

Here are the facts relating to the situation that has involved us in a war 7,000 miles from home and is taking the lives of thousands of our sons and billions of dollars:

First. President Truman sent General Marshall to China with orders to force the Chinese Communists into the Nationalist Cabinet. This was the same appeasement policy advocated by the Democratic administration in Poland and Czechoslovakia. Both these governments were finally taken over by the Communists.

Second. General Marshall did not succeed in his effort but he took other steps that led to the fall of the regular Chinese government by denying economic and military aid.

Third. Under such threats and pressure truces were brought about between the fighting forces of the Communists and the regular government of China. Each time the government was weakened. At one point the Nationalists agreed to and did reduce its Army from 151 divisions to 57 with the specific understanding that the Communists would reduce their army too. But the Reds made no reduction in their forces.

Fourth. Gateways to Manchuria and Mongolia were granted to the Chinese Communists under pressure from Marshall upon the pretext that it would promote mediation. This was a fatal move and led directly to the downfall of Chiang Kai-shek—our ally.

Fifth. The indefensible Truman-Acheson policy in China started the Korean war and thousands of American boys will pay with their lives for this blunder. Billions of dollars will be required to prepare and fight a war that must be won.

Sixth. Secretary Acheson, the real instigator of the China policy, still remains to direct our foreign policy, aided by Lattimore, Jessup, Service, and many other pro-Russian appeasers. This is an insult to our people.

The Liberals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, as an old-fashioned conservative, with faith in our form of government, our way of doing things, I have sometimes wondered whether those in Congress who boast of being liberals, of ridiculing those of us who do not wish to swallow without inspection their economic nostrums, will ever realize that it may be that congressional committees and executive agencies are sticking their official noses into things about which they know little, and that some of their liberalism may be harmful.

My doubt that liberal remedies and programs will solve all our troubles is increased by the following article from the Reader's Digest of October:

DETOUR—TO UTOPIA

(By Benjamin F. Fairless)

Someday I hope to get back to Pittsburgh long enough to find out what's happened to the steel business. But the past few months I have been specializing in Washington investigations of big business, and Washington has certainly been specializing in me. From the time the United States Steel Corp. was organized 50 years ago it has been subjected to almost constant investigation by various agencies of the Government, and for the past 10 years I myself have been on the business end of most of these investigations. I have been through so many congressional inquisitions that no self-respecting skeleton would hide in my closet on a bet.

I am not an alarmist, yet I am gravely disturbed by what I have seen. In my opinion, our American economic system is in deadly peril today—from self-styled friends in Washington who would literally hack it to death on the pretext of saving its immortal soul. If these misguided planners and politically ambitious officeholders have their way, three of our most precious liberties—freedom of opportunity, freedom of initiative, and freedom of enterprise—will vanish from this earth.

These self-appointed saviors of our national welfare seem always to miss the point: That our American system of free competitive enterprise is the only one left in the world that is not controlled by power-hungry politicians; and that once the dead hand of politics gets its convulsive grip on American business and industry free competition will be strangled and our economic system will be no different from those which are crumbling in Europe.

I am convinced that the American people will never knowingly travel that road to economic disaster. They have built the most magnificent industrial machine this world has ever seen and they are certainly not going to wreck it that way as long as the road is clearly marked by signposts which honestly reveal its destination. But in Washington today there are theorists and bureaucrats who are trying to take down the honest guideposts and put up another reading: "Detour—to utopia."

The most dangerous deception which has been practiced upon us is the fallacy that our whole economy can be divided into two parts labeled big and little business. Because some statistician has drawn an imaginary line between companies employing more or less than 500 persons, we argue about big business and little business as though they were two hostile armies warring against each other.

How silly that concept is if we stop to analyze it. There are some 4,000,000 individual business units in this country, big and little, and they all form one great interdependent industrial machine. Never has the complete interdependence of big and little business been so clearly demonstrated as during World War II, when this great industrial machine shattered all records. It took a big company to deliver a finished B-29, but it took hundreds of companies of every conceivable size to make all the parts and materials that went into it. Which did the most important part of the job? You might as well ask which soldier won the war. When the shooting was over we found that, although 75 percent of the prime contracts had gone—of necessity—to the 100 largest manufacturing companies in the land, it was little business that scored the greatest increase in sales, in profits and in assets.

The second fraud that the jugglers would perpetrate upon us is the signpost they call monopoly. Properly employed, monopoly is a useful word, meaning the exact opposite of competition. But our jugglers use the word as an epithet which they hurl with abandon at any large and successful enterprise they may hope to move in on.

Some of our Washington critics insist that there is no competition in the steel industry. Apparently they never heard of Bethlehem—or a couple of hundred other competitors of ours who are doing very nicely, thank you. Sometimes I wish these critics could join our sales force for a few weeks and try to sell a little steel. I think they would find out what competition really is.

With logic, they declare that it is the right of any man to try to establish himself in any business he wants—even the steel business. And that is true. But then they insist that he can't make steel because "the monopoly" won't let him. And that is utterly, ridiculously false.

It isn't "monopoly power" that keeps any small-business man from making steel today. It is a matter of money. A blast furnace alone will cost him about $12,000,000, and when he gets his coke ovens, open hearths, mills, power and fuel lines and auxiliary equipment, he might start turning out hot-rolled bars for an investment of $50,000,000 or so. If he wants to make light plates and cold-reduced sheets, his plant will cost him something over $200,000,000. Any businessman who has that kind of money is not "small."

But just because a small-business man may not be able to go into the business of making steel, that does not mean he cannot go into the steel business. He can set himself up in the business of fabricating steel for a relatively small capital investment, turning out one or more of thousands of useful, profitable products.

Thirty-three years ago, it is true there were nearly twice as many establishments making steel as there are now. But today there are 12,000 more establishments fabricating it. For every steel-making company that has disappeared, 60 new metal-fabricating plants have been successfully established. And for every wage earner who had a job in the industry 33 years ago, three are employed today. Is that bad?

Let's look at another trick word the jugglers have been palming off on us—"giantism." Nobody loves a giant. From early childhood we have thought of giants as monstrous, wicked, bloodthirsty creatures. So naturally a giant corporation must be evil. But what are the facts?

According to the Government's latest count there are nearly 7,500 big companies in America today. A century ago there were none. But for every company that has grown big in this country during the past 100 years, 440 healthy new enterprises have been born. That didn't just happen. Had it not been for the fact that there are giants, most of these small establishments could never have existed at all and could not today survive.

The size of any company depends upon the product which it intends to manufacture—upon the amount of money it takes to buy the plants, machines, and tools necessary to manufacture that product efficiently and competitively. From that point on the growth of the company depends on its customers. If they like the product and want to buy more of it, the company will have to expand in order to meet their demands.

So when our Washington theorists attempt to place an arbitrary limit on size they are saying in effect that certain products shall not be manufactured at all—except, perhaps, by the Government. And when they try to put a limit on growth they are denying to the American people the right to buy as much as they want of a particular company's product.

Finally, there is one more treacherous signpost which seriously menaces us all. The jugglers call it concentration. It is based on the fallacy that there is something evil and dangerous about the fact that a limited number of companies do 40 or 60 or 80 percent of the business in their particular industry.

Well, of course they do—and they always will as long as free and honest competition exists in our American economy. For concentration is the result of competition. Any time you see an industry where everybody has come out even, you can be reasonably sure that the boys got together in the backroom and indulged in a little high-handed conspiracy, known as the fix.

Our inquisitors in Washington insist that concentration is especially marked in the steel industry. I think the facts will amaze you.

The Census Bureau recently completed a count of more than 400 American industries, and reported on the degree of concentration in each. The report on steelworks and rolling mills shows that this industry stands one hundred and seventy-fourth on the list. So if they are going to break up every industry which is as highly concentrated as the steel industry, nearly half of the units in our American industrial machine will be torn apart.

What are some of these industries where the concentration of power in the hands of the few is so great as to menace our national welfare? You'd never guess. There is the pretzel industry for one. And the candlemakers. Then there are straw hats and streetcars, breakfast foods and chewing tobacco, wallpaper and cigar boxes, lead pencils and pianos, window shades and garters.

I wonder if it isn't time to have an entirely new congressional investigation—one that will hale before it all the Government agencies and congressional investigating committees which seem to be trying to destroy the finest and the only successful economic system in the world today, and find out just what public interest they are serving.

In short, I wonder if it isn't time to get back on our highway to progress and growth and production, before we get mired and lost forever on a detour to utopia.

The Panama Canal Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOM B. FUGATE
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. FUGATE. Mr. Speaker, in early 1949 I was designated by the late Representative Schuyler Otis Bland, of Virginia, to be a member of a special subcommittee under House Resolution 44, Eighty-first Congress, to investigate the financial operations of the Panama Canal. Since then I have visited the Isthmus and studied many angles of this complicated subject.

The distinguished chairman of this subcommittee, Hon. CLARK W. THOMPSON, of Texas, in an extension of his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 25, 1949, made a notable contribution toward securing the proper consideration of the problem in the form of a bibliography on "The Isthmian Canal Policy of the United States." In subsequent issues of the RECORD, many informative papers have been published, notably by the late Representative Bland, concerning the general Isthmian Canal background, and by Representative THOMAS E. MARTIN relative to the national defense angles.

Another timely contribution is an editorial in the September 1950 issue of the National Bulletin of the Military Order of the World Wars with which I am in hearty accord. Especially do I commend its suggestion for the creation of an independent Interoceanic Canals Commission, charged with the duty of studying the entire subject of Isthmian waterways, including the matter of increased capacity and operational efficiency of the Panama Canal. The text follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL QUESTION

Time is rapidly approaching when a decision must be reached as to the future of the Canal and its capacity. This major issue is now before the President and the Congress.

The new organizational and toll aspects of this problem are covered in a communication from the President to the Speaker of the House of Representatives on January 31, 1950 (H. Doc. No. 460, 81st Cong.). With these questions settled, the way will be cleared for consideration of the more basic question of the type of the future canal.

The plan of the existing Canal was conceived in the heated controversy regarding two diametrically opposed ideas; a high-level lake type of canal, and a canal at sea level. Both types require locks and other major structures.

The decision for the present Canal was brought about in 1906 mainly through the efforts of the late John F. Stevens, the great railroad engineer who, as chief engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, developed the basic canal plan and organized the transportation systems and construction forces to build it. Though his primary reasoning was based on engineering and economics, he clearly foresaw the navigational advantages of a canal formed by lakes as compared to one at sea level with its greater length of restricted channel.

The present Canal discussions now occurring in Congress are the result of report by the Governor of the Panama Canal under authority of Public Law 280, Seventy-ninth Congress, directing an investigation of the means of increasing the capacity and security of the Canal to meet the future needs of the interoceanic commerce and of national defense.

As was pointed out in a notable address by former Representative Willis W. Bradley—published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 21, 1948—under the title, "What of the Panama Canal?" the enactment of this law, approved December 28, 1945, was secured by the proponents of the sea-level type of canal after the advent of the atomic bomb.

The law served to resurrect the 1906 controversy with a rehashing of most of the old arguments under title of relative security instead of relative vulnerability. Either type is vulnerable to atomic bombs.

Though there are many aspects of the sea-level proposal, the one challenged most vigorously by independent authorities of outstanding ability and experience, is the initially estimated cost of the sea-level project—$2,483,000,000. This, in the opinion of those independent engineers, has been grossly underestimated. Another is the challenge of the leading atomic-warfare authorities that any canal, regardless of type, would be critically vulnerable beyond any reasonable expectation of prompt restoration.

An oversight of the sea-level investigators was their failure to consider the treaty question. As proposed, the sea-level canal has different alinement from the existing canal. An entirely new treaty would have to be negotiated with Panama. What such a covenant would cost in the form of a vast indemnity and greatly increased annuity, no one can state.

The very practical proposal which makes clear what the late John F. Stevens described as the "confusion of ideas" concerning the Canal, is the terminal-lake plan developed in 1942 and 1943 by Capt. Miles P. Du Val, United States Navy, while he was captain of the port at Balboa, in charge of marine operations at the Pacific end of the Canal.

This plan is an urgently needed operational improvement of the existing lake-type waterway. Its main features are: (1) The removal of the Pedro Miguel locks, thereby eliminating the time of locking and the many accidents that occur there on entering and leaving; (2) the construction of all Pacific locks near Miraflores; (3) the formation of a summit-level lake at the Pacific end of the Canal to match the Gatun Lake anchorage now on the Atlantic side. This would give a reservoir for transit traffic on the Pacific side, and remove the bottleneck at the Pedro Miguel locks.

The cost of this plan would, in the opinion of independent engineers, be less than $750,000,000—only a fraction of the cost of the other. Its additional operational security is obvious. It should be noted also that the terminal-lake plan was not presented as a new idea. It dates back to W. L. Sibert, William Gerig, John F. Stevens, and even to Godin de Lepinay in 1879.

In much of the propaganda for the sea-level movement there has been more heat than light. As indicated by Hon. T. E. MARTIN in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 13, 1950, certain powerful interests in the country—manufacturers of earth-moving machinery, dredging, contracting, and certain civil engineers associated with them, both civilian and military—have engaged in a strong drive to secure authorization for a sea-level canal at Panama. Such interests are not proper ones to make the decision in an issue so vital to our national security, our economy, and our merchant marine, which would have to pay transit tolls that measurably reflect the costs of construction.

The best way to handle the vital issue is by means of a broadly based and completely independent Interoceanic Canals Commission.

A Boy Died Last Night

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, today our Nation faces a crisis which requires total mobilization of our military and economic forces. The Congress has appropriated more than $60,000,000,000, and it is likely there will be a deficit of one-fourth that amount. Legislation is being approved to increase taxes on corporations and individuals by about $5,000,000,000—but that is not adequate at a time when Federal expenses and national income are at peacetime peaks. When the manpower of our Nation is being drafted, all Americans should be called upon to support preparedness, and all profiteering should be outlawed. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, an editorial on this subject written by John B. Cook, editor of the Burley (Idaho) Bulletin, and published in that newspaper on September 12, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BOY DIED LAST NIGHT

A boy died last night. He died in the mud on a rain-swept Korean ridge, in the terrifying blackness. When he died he was alone and afraid. He fell forward on his face in a pool of rainwater and with his last breath he moaned: "Help me, Ma, help me." And there was no one to hear him except his God.

Who was this boy? Who knows? He might have been your neighbor's boy, the one who used to irritate you almost to distraction with his mufflerless "hot rod." Or he might have been the kid you used to watch on the football field. Or he might have been the tall awkward youngster who, a short year ago, used to call to take your lovely daughter to the movies on Saturday night. Who he was doesn't matter so much now. What matters now is that he is lying out in the stinking Korean mud and the pool of rainwater is stained with his young blood.

What did the boy look like? Why, like a million or so other young Americans. He was blond and lanky and quick with a grin and a wisecrack. He was 20 years old and his cheeks had only recently felt a razor. He had big hands and big feet and in his weeks of training he had had the usual trouble keeping in step during close-order drill. And he had good eyes, ice blue and quick. He was a good man on a night patrol and during 2 months in Korea he had learned what he had to learn.

He had learned plenty about night fighting and patrol work. But who can avoid the stealthy ambush in the rain-dark? And who can stay the blast of a machine pistol at close range?

And so a boy died last night. His five companions on patrol, two wounded, could not bring him in. They'll send the GRO boys out this morning. They'll bring him in provided they can get to him, and within 2 weeks or so his next of kin will receive a telegram: "* * * regret to inform you that your son * * *." And then we'll know who the boy was.

A boy died last night. And last week the President of the United States, in a radio message to the Nation, urged citizens to refrain from hoarding and scare buying and war profiteering. And in an east coast city the housewives formed an organization to fight against unwarranted price rises in food and clothing.

And in an Idaho city a pound of coffee which had been selling for the already high price of 78 cents a pound, suddenly jumped to 91 cents.

And in Chicago a used-car dealer tacked on a blanket raise of $25 per car on all his cars.

And in North Dakota an implement dealer went about quietly telling farmers that, for a bonus of $300, he could get them a brand new combine, one which would last out the war in Korea.

And in a Western State a young man who had already taken his physical examination for service in the Army had a long talk with his father's friend, who just incidentally happens to be a United States Senator, and just coincidentally the young man was granted a deferment.

And in New York State a tire dealer who had been quietly buying up every tire he could lay hands on, made some discreet calls on many of his customers: "Look, George, I can get you two sets of 6.50 by 16's right now. They'll cost you a little more than they would have last week but you know how it is." And George, who needs two sets of tires like he needs another head, bought them.

And a woman in Georgia looked through her lingerie chest and found to her amazement that she has 41 pairs of nylons, still in the cellophane wrappers.

And on Labor Day the Nation closed its shops and factories and labor leaders made pretty speeches about how our brave boys on the firing line could be sure labor would make every sacrifice necessary to see that the tools of war were at hand. And in Washington the president of the AFL demanded that wages be allowed to rise a little before a Government freeze is put on.

And on a muddy Korean ridge a blond American boy died last night.

Let's Do Right by the Boys

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, attached hereto is an excerpt from the Clipsheet of September 11, 1950, on the question of beer for our fighting men:

LET'S DO RIGHT BY THE BOYS

We are spending a lot of fighting money and we are going to spend more, all because of our stupid failure, years ago, to recognize the essential character of communism. Now we are calling many thousands of young men into the armed services and even talking about universal military training for youth. One of the great blessings of getting away from Europe, was leaving behind just this sort of thing, and now here it is camping on our doorstep in this "brave new world."

This brings up the whole question of selling alcoholic beverages on military reservations, which is strictly illegal, and it also brings up the question of selling beverages to men in the Armed Forces when they are off the military reservations. To see uniformed men in the dismal beer taverns, being ogled by underfed and bedeviled prostitutes, is not a pleasant sight. Are we doing everything we can to give these young people in service, the recreational facilities of which they stand in such great need? We ask the question, and we'll answer it: We are not.

It is with great reluctance that we advocate the spending of any money the spending of which can by any possibility, be avoided, but we are firmly convinced that the Congress ought to appropriate whatever funds are needed, to provide the most inviting recreational facilities possible on military reservations, wherever practicable. These facilities ought to provide books, comfortable chairs and lounges, and above all, a soda fountain, and not just a little dinky one, either. It ought to dispense hamburgers and frankfurters and all the attractive drinks of a typical American soda fountain, not just bottled pop, and it ought to dispense them at cost. In war areas, we ought to do the best we can under the circumstances. We ought not to dispense beer of any alcoholic content whatsoever, here or abroad, for one reason—because the law strictly forbids it; and for another reason, because the dispensing of beer to the armed services during the last war made large numbers of alcoholics who are now quite a problem to the Government as well as to the people who love them. But we ought to get them soft drinks, fruit juices—everything refreshing which can be transported.

And so here goes: $100,000,000 for sodas for the boys, and more, if needed.

Veterans of the Eighth War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a timely and interesting editorial entitled "Veterans of the Eighth War," published in the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser of September 8, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS OF THE EIGHTH WAR

Getting a photographic send-off on the front page of the Alabama Journal yesterday was a group of Montgomery draftees which included a man out of our building, H. E. Brown, a stereotyper, and Jack Chambless, an insurance man.

They are 2 of the 170,000 draftees that will become soldiers by the end of November. They will be 2 among the combined Armed Force of 3,000,000 that is the first goal.

By the time the westering sun went down yesterday and left a dismal autumn rain to its own devices these Montgomery men had assumed status as veterans of the Republic's eighth war. The list of which is:

1776–83: American Revolution.
1812–15: War of 1812.
1846–48: Mexican War.
1861–65: Civil War.
1898–99: Spanish-American War.
1917–18: World War I.
1941–45: World War II.
1950: Korean war.

It happened that we saw a good deal of Citizen-Soldier Chambless over the long Labor Day week end, and we got to reflecting on his status as opposed to that of the Americans who were veterans of the first seven wars.

Young Chambless is to his contemporaries a "character"—that is, jaunty, a wit, smart, and full of animal spirits. For some time now he has been waiting for his call-up day and being addressed as "soldier" and "colonel." He had, of course, been discriminating against sleep when it conflicted with winding up his property appraising and pleasuring himself. He played in a tennis tournament, wore a loud T-shirt, and counted the ticks of his expiring time as a civilian.

But he was no more self-conscious about his departure than were some of his younger friends who were going off to school. He was surrounded by friends who had been drafted in the two World Wars and by others who would be called very soon. His going had become a commonplace experience.

When the draftees of 1941 and 1942 were going in, the Army and its experiences were legendary and unknown save through the musty reminiscenses of an uncle who had gone in 1917. But all draftees today know the Army intimately through the testimony of hundreds who so recently had been in it. Chambless will hit camp as well versed in the art of evading latrine duty detail as any veteran. It will not be a "new" experience to today's draftees as it was to those long-spaced Wars I and II. Their Army sophistication, their sense of the Army climate, is largely formed before they enter upon the experience.

As Chambless was having his last days of Pompeii, stoically resigned to the grinding boredom of Army life, we got to thinking about all the national fuss-budgeting over whether the American soldier knows "what he's fighting for" as well as the Gooks. A lot of that discussion has been stuff and nonsense. Suffice it to say here, Chambless and his draftee group have a far clearer idea of why they're wearing a uniform than Washington's men. The idea of seeking independence from England was far from a prewar goal.

It will never be said of the present Army, as Washington disgustedly said of his, that they were so lacking in patriotism that they did not deserve victory.

The war of which Chambless' drafting is an incident is not likely to result in an American defeat such as that in the War of 1812.

Nor is it tarnished with the aggressive, imperialistic taint of the Mexican and Spanish-American Wars.

The present Army is being marshalled as no other American Army has ever been marshalled—to act under the banner of the United Nations, an agency to abort war.

It may be that the United Nations will fail as its predecessors have failed. But certain it is that for 2,000 years and more mankind, sporadically but with significant presistence, has sought to form a peace agency that would outmode war. At least, it may be said that the UN represents the farthest advance yet in man's very brief civilized history. It is shallow cynicism to suppose that since nations have always made war, they always will.

The Genocide Convention Should be Ratified

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, there is probably more misunderstanding about the Genocide Convention, now being considered by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, than any other treaty submitted to the Senate in recent years. The objections to ratification of the convention by the United States are generally based on highly technical, legal, and constitutional grounds. In an effort to meet these objections, as chairman of the subcommittee on international organizations of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I have had the staff of the Committee prepare a memorandum on the question. I feel that this memorandum amply meets the objections which have been raised against ratification of the Genocide Convention by the United States. The memorandum follows:

I. CONSTITUTIONAL ASPECTS OF THE CONVENTION

"The Constitution was intended to meet the varying crises in human affairs and was adopted for all time" (Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland).

The general position of the Department of State with regard to the Genocide Convention was set forth in the Department's letter to the President which accompanied the President's letter transmitting the convention to the Senate on June 16, 1949. (Executive O, 81st Cong., 1st sess.) The Department's letter recommended that the Senate give its advice and consent to ratification of the convention, without reservation but with one proposed statement of understanding as to the meaning of the phrase "responsibility of a State" in article IX of the convention.

The Department's letter reviewed the history of the formulation of this convention and in particular included certain important statements made by the United States representative in connection with several provisions of the instrument. The letter did not deal with the constitutional aspects of the convention, although it was based upon the implicit assumption that the convention represented a proper exercise of the Federal treaty power and contained nothing therein in violation of the United States Constitution.

A. GENERAL CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO NEGOTIATE AND BECOME PARTY TO THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

The Genocide Convention involves a matter within the present constitutional jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and does not result in any enlargement of that jurisdiction, because article I, section 8, clause 10 of the United States Constitution expressly authorizes the Congress—

"To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations."

Congress could therefore even in the absence of the Genocide Convention define genocide as an offense against the law of nations and provide for its punishment by statute.

1. History of article I, section 8, clause 10, United States Constitution

The provision of the Constitution which authorizes the Congress to define and punish offenses against the law of nations is not as well known as some of the other provisions granting powers to the Federal Government, because it has seldom been used and there are few precedents under it. It is, however, one of the notable instances where criminal jurisdiction has been expressly conferred upon the Federal Government.

The Federalist throws little light on this clause. In No. XLII, Madison observed:

"The power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations, belongs with equal propriety to the general government, and is still a greater improvement on the Articles of Confederation. These articles contain no provision for the case of offenses against the law of nations; and consequently leave it in the power of any indiscreet member to embroil the confederacy with foreign nations."

The framers of the Constitution were, of course, familiar with Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England; and in volume IV of that work, Blackstone stated:

"The principal offences against the law of nations animadverted on such by the municipal laws of England, are of three kinds: (1) Violation of safe-conducts; (2) infringement of the rights of ambassadors; and (3) piracy" (fifteenth ed., London, 1809, p. 66).

In Respublican v. De Longchamps (1 Dall, 120 (1784)) a Pennsylvania court fined and imprisoned an individual for assaulting the Secretary of the French Legation, solely on the basis that such conduct violated the law of nations. The first American statute penalizing assaults against ambassadors was enacted in 1790.

In an early case in the United States Supreme Court, United States v. Smith (5 Wheat. 153 (1820)), which involved piracy, Mr. Justice Story remarked (ibid., p. 159):

"Offenses, too, against the law of nations, cannot, with any accuracy, be said to be completely ascertained and defined in any public code recognized by the common consent of nations. In respect, therefore, as well to felonies on the high seas as to felonies against the law of nations, there is a peculiar fitness to giving the power to define as well as to punish; and there is not the slightest reason to doubt that this consideration had very great weight in producing the phraseology (art. I, sec. 8, clause 10) in question."

In 1887, the Supreme Court had occasion to consider article I, section 8, clause 10 of the Constitution, in a case in which the Court sustained the constitutionality of a Federal statute to prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, and securities of foreign governments. In that case, United States v. Arjona (120 U. S. 479), Mr. Chief Justice Waite made the following pertinent observations (ibid., p. 483):

"Congress has the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States (art. I, sec. 8, clause 18); and the Government of the United States has been vested exclusively with the power of representing the Nation in all its intercourse with foreign countries. It alone can 'regulate commerce with foreign nations' (art. I, sec. 8, clause 3); make treaties and appoint ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls (art. II, sec. 2, clause 2). A State is expressly prohibited from entering into any 'treaty, alliance, or confederation' (art. I, sec. 10, clause 1). Thus all official intercourse between a State and foreign nations is prevented, and exclusive authority for that purpose given to the United States. The National Government is in this way made responsible to foreign nations for all violations by the United States of their international obligations, and because of this, Congress is expressly authorized 'to define and punish * * * offenses against the law of nations' (art. I, sec. 8, clause 10).

Finally, the Supreme Court, in the recent case of Ex parte Quirin (317 U. S. 1 (1942)), sustained the validity of trial of enemy agents by a military commission. Mr. Chief Justice Stone made the following pertinent statement, at page 28:

"By the Articles of War, and especially article 15, Congress has explicitly provided, so far as it may constitutionally do so, that military tribunals shall have jurisdiction to try offenders of offenses against the law of war in appropriate cases. Congress, in addition to making rules for the government of our Armed Forces, has thus exercised its authority to define and punish offenses against the law of nations, by sanctioning, within constitutional limitations, the jurisdiction of military commissions to try persons for offenses which, according to the rules and precepts of the law of nations, and more particularly the law of war, are cognizable by such tribunals."

It may be concluded from these authorities therefore that the Federal power to define and punish offenses against the law of nations is a general power to be exercised by the Federal Government as required by changing times and conditions.

It has been suggested in some quarters that, because the power is set forth in the Constitution as an express grant of legislative authority to the Congress, Federal action in this sphere must take the form of legislation and not the form of a treaty. On this point, Senator Kellogg (later Secretary of State) once remarked that such a theory, "as Hamilton says, would practically destroy the treaty-making power of the United States." Mr. Kellogg continued his statement as follows:

"The argument is as old as the history of treaties in this country. It was presented with great ability by the opponents of the Jay treaty and overcome by the able statesmen of that day, foremost among whom was Alexander Hamilton.

"From that day to the present time the question has been frequently raised in connection with treaties for the payment of money, regulating commerce, fixing import duties, regulating rights of trade with foreign countries, fixing boundaries, and various other subjects, the objection being that as the power to legislate in relation to these matters was in the entire Congress, any treaty made by the President and the Senate was therefore void. But these objections have proved unavailing and a large number of treaties have been made and ratified by the Senate where legislation was necessary to carry them into operation." (Senate debate on the Treaty of Versailles, quoted in V Hackworth, Digest of International Law, p 12.)

As a recent illustration, the Supreme Court reviewed a naturalization treaty concluded in 1869 between the United States and Sweden, in the case of Perkins v. Elg (307 U. S. 325 (1939)), and ruled, Mr. Chief Justice Hughes speaking at page 329:

"As at birth, she became a citizen of the United States, that citizenship must be deemed to continue unless she has been deprived of it through the operation of a treaty or congressional enactment or by her voluntary action in conformity with applicable legal principles."

It seems clear, therefore, that the treaty power is concurrent with the legislative power of the Congress. The true significance of a specific constitutional grant of legislative power to the Congress is that it establishes that such a subject is properly one within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government for action either by Federal statute or treaty.

2. International law with respect to crimes

In determining the meaning of article I, section 8, clause 10 of the Constitution, it is necessary to consider the international law on the subject of crime. As Mr. Justice Story remarked in 1820, international law on this subject was then far from defined, and, in this respect, is still quite undeveloped.

One leading authority on international law has defined international crimes as "crimes like piracy on the high seas or slave trade, which either every state can punish on seizure of the criminals, or whatever nationality they may be, or which every state has by the law of nations a duty to prevent." (I, Oppenheim, International Law, p. 246 (3d ed., Roxburgh, 1920).)

The best known example of a crime under the law of nations is piracy, which is recognized as a crime on the basis of customary international law. Many authorities consider, moreover, that as a result of various international conventions on the subject, slavery and the slave trade are crimes under international law. These conventions were inspired initially by the Congress of Vienna, which condemned the slave trade. The United States became a party to several conventions on the subject: the General Act of the Anti-Slavery Conference of Brussels, 1890 (II, Malloy's Treaties, 1964); the Convention of St. Germain of September 10, 1919 (IV, U. S. Treaties (Trenwith) 4849); and the Convention to Suppress the Slave Trade and Slavery of September 25, 1926 (IV, U. S. Treaties (Trenwith) 5022). The provisions of the last-mentioned convention are of some interest in this connection. The convention is designed not only to suppress the slave trade, but "to bring about, progressively and as soon as possible, the complete abolition of slavery in all its forms," within the territories under the "sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection, suzerainty or tutelage" of the contracting states (art. 2). The contracting states further agreed to take all necessary measures to prevent compulsory or forced labor from developing into conditions analogous to slavery (art. 5). Moreover, article 6 provided that those of the contracting states "whose laws do not at present make adequate" provision for the punishment of infractions of laws and regulations enacted with a view to giving effect to the purposes of the present convention undertake to adopt the necessary measures in order that severe penalties may be imposed in respect of such infractions.

A number of conventions have also been adopted on other subjects such as the white slave trade, traffic in narcotic drugs, counterfeiting, injury to submarine cables, and illegal traffic in arms; and the various types of conduct at which these respective conventions are aimed are also sometimes categorized as crimes under international law.

By its own terms, the Genocide Convention states that genocide is a crime under international law, whether committed in time of peace or in time of war (art. I). The contracting parties undertake to prevent and to punish genocide by article I and, more specifically, undertake by article V to enact the necessary legislation to give effect to the provisions of the present convention and, in particular, to provide effective penalties for persons guilty of genocide.

Thus genocide becomes a crime under international law, and consequently a matter falling within the Federal power to define and punish offenses against the law of nations.

3. Genocide is in fact a matter of international concern

It has been suggested that genocide is not a proper subject for an international convention because it invades the internal jurisdiction of states vis-à-vis their nationals. It is true that international law is normally concerned only with relations between states and does not interest itself with the relations between the people and the government of a state.

Yet, history shows that there have been various occasions upon which the internal conditions existing within a given state have become so atrocious and shocking to the human conscience that they have in fact become a matter of international concern.

For example, in 1827, England, France, and Russia intervened with armed forces in the Greek revolution against Turkey to end the atrocities taking place in that situation. Similarly, Russia declared war upon Turkey in 1877 "to alleviate the position of the Christians in the Balkan Peninsula" (proclamation of the Czar, 12/24 April 1877). In the ensuing treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, moreover, Turkey was required to undertake to ameliorate the treatment of Armenians who remained under Turkish jurisdiction and to report periodically thereon to the other contracting states.

The United States has had a long history of humanitarian diplomacy. President John Quincy Adams publicly expressed our sympathies with the Greek patriots in his annual messages of 1825 and 1827. President Van Buren intervened with the Turkish Government on behalf of persecuted Jews in 1840; and, again in 1872, this Government strongly remonstrated with the Turkish Government as to persecution of Jews.

One of the principal causes for United States intervention in Cuba in 1898, which brought on the Spanish-American War, was, in the language of the Fifty-fifth Congress, that—

"The abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than 3 years in the island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization * * * can no longer be endured" (preamble, joint resolution, Apr. 20, 1898; 30 Stat. 738-739).

Or, in the words of President McKinley in his special message of April 11, 1898, requesting congressional authorization for intervention in Cuba:

"In the cause of humanity and to put an end to the barbarities, bloodshed, starvation, and horrible miseries now existing there, and which the parties to the conflict are either unable or unwilling to stop or mitigate. It is no answer to say this is all in another country, belonging to another nation, and is therefore none of our business. It is specially our duty, for it is right at our door." (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1898, p. 750.)

Again, both President Harrison, in 1891, and President Theodore Roosevelt, in 1903, publicly denounced the mistreatment of Jews in Russia by the Czarist government. And, in 1915 and 1916, Secretary of State Lansing instructed the United States Ambassador to Turkey to protest against the horrible mistreatment of the Armenians by the Turkish Government.

These examples from history show that when atrocities are perpetrated upon helpless, innocent people other governments cannot sit idly by and ignore the situation. Such conditions existing within a state not only result in internal unrest but have repercussions elsewhere, not only in consequence of the almost inevitable emigration of people under such conditions but in consequence of the fact that such conditions result in internal strife and revolution and have in fact led to war between nations.

It is in the light of this history that the Genocide Convention must be considered. The historical events just prior to and during World War II outraged decent people everywhere and gave impetus to the international movement which caused the General Assembly twice to declare unanimously that genocide is a crime under international law, and that its punishment is a matter of international concern (Resolutions adopted December 11, 1946, and December 9, 1948.)

This view has been shared by an eminent group of American lawyers, as expressed in the International Law of the Future, published by the American Bar Association Journal on March 25, 1944. This project, prepared, in the words of the board of editors of the American Bar Association, by "200 of the best-informed minds that we have in the United States and Canada," proposed the adoption of the following principle of international law:

"PRINCIPLE 2

"Each state has a legal duty to see that conditions prevailing within its own territory do not menace international peace and order, and to this end it must treat its own population in a way which will not violate the dictates of humanity and justice or shock the conscience of mankind."

The following excerpts from the comment on this proposed principle, published in this same project at page 35, are also of interest:

"A state cannot be free to permit conditions to prevail within its own territory which menace international peace and order, and cannot be free to treat any part of its population in such a way as to produce that menace. Living as a good neighbor in a community of states, it may be called upon to place its own house in order. 'The right of self-determination,' as the President of the United States of America has declared, 'does not carry with it the right of any government to commit wholesale murder or the right to make slaves of its own people.'

* * * * *

"The enumeration of this principle seems particularly important at the present time when shocking efforts are being made in more than one part of the world to exterminate whole groups of human beings. It is important, also, because new situations have arisen which will require attention to be given to the future welfare of certain dependent peoples, and the world must be assured that such atrocities as the decimation of the Herreros in southwest Africa 40 years ago are not to be repeated."

4. Scope of the treaty power of the Federal Government

The above discussion is intended to state in detail the view that article I, section 8, clause 10 of the Constitution confers express authority upon the Federal Government to enter into the Genocide Convention. In view of this clear-cut constitutional authority, it seems unnecessary to consider in detail the question of the scope of the treaty power. It is well known that the Constitution does not attempt to define the scope of this power. While the Supreme Court has never declared a treaty invalid, the Court has not attempted, in its various decisions relating to the treaty power, to fix any hard and fast limits to that power (DeGeofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S. 258 (1890)); Missouri v. Holland (252 U. S. 416 (1920)); Asakura v. Seattle (265 U. S. 332 (1924)); Neilsen v. Johnson (279 U. S. 47 (1929)); Santavincenzo v. Egan (284 U. S. 30 (1931))). Probably as clear a pronouncement as the Court made on the subject may be found in the case of DeGeofroy v. Riggs, cited above, where Mr. Justice Field states, at page 267:

"The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of portion of the territory of the latter without its consent."

In this connection, attention is called to several other instances of the use of the treaty power in matters that under our domestic law have criminal aspects; e. g., the traffic in drugs and the traffic in arms. In the field of narcotic drugs, as in the case of the slave trade and slavery, it was found necessary, in order to establish effective international control, to go beyond regulation of the international traffic itself and to get directly at the root of the evil, existing in internal conditions in various states. To this end, there was negotiated the Geneva Convention for Limiting the Manufacture and Regulating the Distribution of Narcotic Drugs in 1939, to which the United States and a large number of other states are parties (IV U. S. Treaties (Trenwith) 5351). As the title of this convention indicates, it is designed not only to regulate the international traffic in narcotic drugs but also the internal manufacture of such drugs. Thus, in this country, not only are exports and imports of narcotic drugs strictly regulated but the manufacture of drugs within each State is stringently limited. This is accomplished through Federal license of manufacturers and through a careful periodic inspection of the plants, inventories, and records by narcotic agents. (Traffic in Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs for the Year Ended December 31, 1943, Report by the Government of the United States of America, p. 31 et seq. Issued pursuant to the 1931 convention.)

There is also an interesting history with respect to the use of the treaty power to control the traffic in and manufacture of arms. The United States has become a party to the Geneva convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition and in implements of war of 1925 (IV U. S. Treaties (Trenwith) 4903). It was also proposed that a convention be formulated for the regulation of private manufacture of arms, but doubt was expressed as to the competency of the Federal Government to enter into such a treaty. In 1932, however, Secretary of State Stimson instructed the American delegation at the Disarmament Conference in Geneva in 1932 that—this Government could, on the basis of a treaty, exercise control of the manufacture of munitions (V, Hackworth, Digest of International Law p. 21). Subsequently, Secretary of State Hull reaffirmed the position taken by Secretary Stimson and stated in a letter to Congressman Tinkham, dated January 24, 1935:

"The treaty-making power of this Government clearly includes the power to enter into an international convention, under which this Government would be obligated to establish such a measure of supervision and control of the manufacture of arms and implements of war within its jurisdiction as was then under discussion" (ibid., p. 22).

In connection with this subject, the Senate's special committee investigating the munitions industry issued a report (Senate Committee Print No. 1, 73d Cong., 2d sess.), which stated at page 52:

"There never was any adequate legal basis for the position taken by representatives of the United States to the effect that the Federal Government could not by treaty deal with the private manufacture of arms and munitions; on many occasions the United States has by treaty dealt with problems which would ordinarily fall within the exclusive legislative competence of the States."

It is significant that the subjects of traffic and manufacture of drugs and also that of arms have been regarded as proper for the Federal treaty power. It seems equally clear that genocide, which has twice been declared to be a crime under international law by all of the members of the United Nations, is also a proper subject for the Federal treaty power, particularly because it comes within the specific Federal power to define and punish offenses against the law of nations

B. PARTICULAR CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS ARISING IN CONNECTION WITH THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

1. The convention is not self-executing in character

It will be necessary for the Congress to exact implementing legislation before the courts of this country will give effect to the Genocide Convention.

Attention is called to the language of article I of the convention whereby the contracting states undertake to prevent and to punish genocide. More particularly, article V provides:

"The contracting parties undertake to enact, in accordance with their respective constitutions, the necessary legislation to give effect to the provisions of the present convention and, in particular, to provide effective penalties for persons guilty of genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in article III."

Thus, while the convention defines the conduct which is to be punished, it does not attempt to prescribe penalties and procedures but leaves this up to each contracting state.

It seems clear, therefore, that this convention comes within the rule enunciated by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in Foster v. Neilson (27 U. S. 253, 314 (1819)):

"Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the Court."

The Genocide Convention, when ratified, would obligate the United States to punish the crime of genocide; and the Congress must execute this contract, by enacting appropriate legislation, before the courts can give effect to the convention.

In this connection it should be noted that penal conventions in general are not regarded as self-executing in character. Thus, in The Over the Top (5 F. (2d) 838 (D. Conn., 1925)), the court said (p. 845):

"It is not the function of treaties to enact the fiscal or criminal law of a nation. For this purpose, no treaty is self-executing. Congress may be under a duty to enact that which has been agreed upon by treaty, but duty and its performance are two separate and distinct things. Nor is there any doubt that the treaty-making power has its limitations. What these are has never been defined, perhaps never need be defined. Certain it is that no part of the criminal law of this country has ever been enacted by treaty.

"Illustrations of congressional effectuation of treaties are plentiful. All treaties requiring payments of money have been followed by acts of Congress appropriating the amount. The treaties were the supreme law of the land, but they were ineffective to draw a dollar from the Treasury. The Russian-American Treaty of 1824 (8 Stat. 302) against selling liquors to the Alaskan natives was followed by the necessary penal legislation by the Congress. The treaty with various powers made in 1847 defining piracy and declaring its punishment received similar reinforcing enactments. The same was true of the treaty of 1862 with Great Britain (12 Stat. 1225), suppressing the slave trade; of the treaty of 1884 (24 Stat. 989), with various powers imposing fines and penalties for the protection of submarine cables; and of the treaty of 1912 (37 Stat. 1542), for protection of seals in the North Pacific Ocean."

(The above case was cited with approval in Cook v. United States (288 U. S. 102, 109 (1933)).

2. The convention does not violate the guaranties of the first and fourteenth amendments

Some concern has been felt that article III, paragraph (c) of the convention might conflict with the right of free speech as guaranteed by the first and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution. This provision makes punishable direct and public incitement to commit genocide.

It is important to recall that, under the common law, solicitation or incitement to commit a crime in itself constituted an offense; and the constitutional guaranties of free speech have not been held to protect this kind of conduct. In one most pertinent case, Frohwerk v. United States (249 U. S. 204 (1919)), Mr. Justice Holmes stated, at page 206:

"The first amendment, while prohibiting legislation against free speech as such, cannot have been, and obviously was not, intended to give immunity for every possible use of language. * * * We venture to believe that neither Hamilton nor Madison, nor any other competent person then or later, ever supposed that to make criminal the counseling of murder within the jurisdiction of Congress would be an unconstitutional interference with free speech.

The Supreme Court has evolved the principles governing the constitutional right of free speech in a line of decisions including the well-known cases of Schenck v. United States (249 U. S. 47 (1919)) and Bridges v. California (314 U. S. 252 (1941)). The Court's most recent pronouncement on the subject was made in the case of Terminiello v. Chicago (17 U. S. Law Week 4395; case decided May 16, 1949). In that case, the Court reversed a conviction for breach of peace under a Chicago ordinance, on the ground that the ordinance, as construed by the Illinois courts, unduly restricted free speech and consequently violated the fourteenth amendment. In this decision, the Court stated:

"Freedom of speech, though not absolute, * * * is nevertheless protected against censorship or punishment, unless shown likely to produce a clear and present danger of a serious substantive evil that arises far above public inconvenience, annoyance, or unrest."

In view of these various precedents, it seems clear that, in enforcing this convention, the courts will continue to act as guardians of the constitutional right of free speech.

3. Sufficiency of definitions "in whole or in part" (art. II)

The legislative history on this point in the United Nations shows that the words "in whole or in part" were inserted in article II of the convention at the instance of the representative of Norway, who felt that it should not be necessary to kill all members of a group in order to commit genocide (Official Records, General Assembly, 3d sess., pt. I, Legal Committee, 89–98).

The Department of State's letter, transmitting the convention to the Senate (Ex. O, 81st Cong., 1st sess., p. 4), set forth in full the text of the declaration of understanding made on this point by the United States representative in the United Nations on October 13, 1948. That statement made clear the United States position that it continued to proceed on the principle that genocide is a denial of the right of existence of entire human groups and that one of the elements of the international crime of genocide would be the intent to destroy one of the groups enumerated in article II.

4. Sufficiency of definitions: "mental harm" (art. II, par. b)

The legislative history shows that the phrase "mental harm" was inserted in the convention at the instance of the Chinese representative on the ground that the Japanese had intended to commit and had actually committed genocide by debauching the Chinese population with narcotics (Official Records, General Assembly, 3d sess., pt. I, Sixth Committee, pp. 175–179).

This phrase seems too vague for purposes of penal legislation; and in the implementing legislation it should be made more precise. Language such as "causing serious bodily harm to, or permanent injury to mental faculties of" or "causing serious bodily harm or mental incapacity" has been suggested, in order to correct this.

5. Sufficiency of definitions: "complicity in genocide" (art. III, par. 3)

The word "complicity" is not a familiar term in American law, although it apparently is in the legal systems of some of the countries which participated in the formulation of the genocide convention.

The United States representative at the Ad Hoc Committee on Genocide stated that he understood this term "to refer to accessoryship before and after the fact and to aiding and abetting in the commission of crimes enumerated in this article" (UN Doc. E/794, p. 21). Again, it seems that the simplest way to describe this obligation in terms of our jurisprudence is to use more precise language in the implementing legislation, possibly along the lines suggested by the United States representative.

6. Extradition

If the convention is ratified, implementing legislation will be necessary to give effect to the extradition provisions of article VII.

It is well known that extradition conventions usually apply to nationals of the United States as well as to the nationals of the country concerned. The crimes for which extradition may be granted are listed in the respective extradition conventions, and they are not limited to crimes denominated Federal offenses under our laws. Nor are they limited to an agreement on the part of the United States to surrender persons within the exclusive Federal jurisdiction. Thus, a person wanted for the crime of murder under the law, say of Great Britain, and who may have sought refuge in the State of Illinois, may be extradited to the British provided that the acts alleged would constitute murder under the law of Illinois, and, of course, provided that all other provisions of the extradition convention and procedures are complied with. The constitutional basis of extradition treaties was explained by Chief Justice Taney in the early case of Holmes v. Jennison et al. (14 Pet. 540, 569 (1840)), wherein he stated:

"And without attempting to define the exact limits of this treaty-making power, or to enumerate the subjects intended to be included in it; it may be safely be assumed that the recognition and enforcement of the principles of public law, being one of the ordinary subjects of treaties, were necessarily included in the power conferred on the general government. And, as the rights and duties of nations towards one another, in relation to fugitives from justice, are a part of the law of nations, and have always been treated as such by the writers upon public law; it follows, that the treaty-making power must have authority to decide how far the right of a foreign nation in this respect will be recognized and enforced, when it demands the surrender of any one charged with offenses against it."

7. International tribunal

It seems clear from the language of article VI of the convention that trials for genocide committed in the United States can take place only in American courts, and that no such trial could take place in an international tribunal until the United States had accepted the jurisdiction of such a tribunal. This obviously would require the advice and consent of the United States Senate.

Under article IX, of course, disputes as to the interpretation, application or fulfillment of the convention would go to the International Court of Justice. This Court, of course, has no criminal jurisdiction at present and could not be used as an international penal tribunal, unless the parties to the statute of the Court agreed to confer such jurisdiction upon the Court.

From the foregoing statement it may be concluded that the Genocide Convention is a proper exercise of the treaty power, based as it is upon the Federal power to define and punish offenses against the law of nations. The convention defines a new Federal offense, but it does not enlarge the present constitutional jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The convention will have to be implemented by legislation before it can be enforced in the courts, and that legislation should make more precise certain language of the convention.

II. Excerpts From Testimony Before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations

Thomas Dodd (member of the American Bar Association special committee on peace and law through United Nations and formerly executive trial counsel at Nuremberg):

"You have been asked what good would this have been against Hitler. I am one of those who believe, after living 18 months over there among the Hitler regime, that had this Genocide Convention been in existence in the early days of the Hitler regime, what happened might not have happened. For one thing, the Nazi state would have stood condemned. Its ministers and ambassadors would not stand in the same position as those of other nations not in violation of a genocidal convention, and great numbers of people inside Germany would have taken heart and might have been more vigorous in their residence to the regime itself.

"You have been asked what can we do about the Russians, who are perhaps and probably doing this same sort of thing behind the iron curtain now. Well, at least we will have the moral influence of the covenant of the convention. Russia in its plan, as I see it, wishes to influence people all over the world. If people all over the world see Russia as a nation which does not subscribe to or adhere to the Genocide Convention she will be severely affected in her efforts to influence people everywhere, and the forces of good thinking and of right conduct in the world will be immeasurably strengthened."

Charles W. Tillott (chairman, section of international and comparative law, American Bar Association):

"The basic reasons for supporting this Genocide Convention, as I see it, are these: The slaughter of huge groups of people, the indiscriminate killing of women, children, and men who fit into some other classification. The killing of them merely for the sake of killing is the most abominable of all crimes. People from all over the world meet on common ground in condemning a crime so heartless and barbaric as genocide. And this international unity of though presents a compelling opportunity for action. The main objective can be effected even though reservations are necessary to maintain an individual legal system.

"Genocide is a crime with international effects and reverberations, because when the members of a group in one country are murdered because of their group membership, violently hostile feelings are aroused in the hearts of all members of that group in other countries. Hostile feelings can easily lead to active hostilities. Hostilities anywhere affect peace everywhere. Religion is international; it knows no national boundaries. Hense the destruction in a country of a religious group must in the nature of the case arouse instantaneously in all other members of that group everywhere deep-seated resentment.

* * * * *

"This Genocide Convention is the first piece of international legislation that has been proposed by the United Nations for the purpose of making real and dynamic the principles contained in the Charter. It is the initial point of departure as between isolationism and internationalism. The action of the United States will show whether or not we really mean what we say when we approve the United Nations Charter or are merely paying lip service to the form and not the substance of the organization.

The extermination of groups of human beings is conduct that all agree is abhorred and despicable. There is no disagreement about that. The sole point at issue here is will we obligate ourselves by a multipartite international agreement to take domestic measures in accordance with our own Constitution to wipe this abominable and beastly crime from the face of the earth. I am sure that I am representative of thousands of American lawyers and their opinion who feel that our Constitution is a great instrument of liberty and freedom and is not an instrument which, as some would have you believe, will shackle and paralyze us in the face of this international effort to outlaw this detestable crime."

Adrian S. Fisher (legal adviser, Department of State):

"I would like to deal only briefly with the question of Federal-State relations and point out that what is before the Senate is this Genocide Convention, nothing else. To my mind, based on the evidence of history and the two resolutions of the General Assembly which have been passed, there is no doubt that Congress could define genocide as a crime against the law of nations. In doing so it would be acting under a specific constitutional provision, article 1, paragraph 8, clause 10 of the Constitution.

"We are criticized because it is claimed that we are relying upon the migratory bird case. I personally do not consider it is unethical to come before the Senate and place your reliance on a case which has stood unchallenged for 30 years. In this particular case I am not doing so, because it does not appear to me to be necessary to rely upon the treaty power alone to support this convention.

"United States v. Arjona (decided in 1887) clearly supports a Federal statute implementing this convention, and therefore it is hard to see how the convention would have any effect in granting Congress a power it would not otherwise have, or drastically change the relations between the States and the Federal Government.

"It also should be pointed out that in United States v. Arjona, which held that Congress could constitutionally define counterfeiting of foreign bank notes as a crime against the law of nations, it was specifically said that nothing prevents the State from acting. I would like to read just a section of that opinion because of the charges made here that we are taking over a large section of State authority. Mr. Chief Justice White, referring to the crime against the law of nations, says, as follows:

" 'This, however, does not prevent a State from providing for punishment of the same thing, for here, as in the case of counterfeiting the coin of the United States, the act may be an offense against the authority of a State as well as that of the United States.'

"That was acceptable law then, it is acceptable law now, and nothing that has been said in the last 2 days can change it.

"I would like to conclude on just one point, sir. This convention, it has been argued, goes too far. It has been argued it does not go far enough, and it has been argued that it will hurt rather than help our foreign policy.

"Now the question of whether or not this convention will hurt rather than help our foreign policy is a question which I as a lawyer, whose qualifications are primarily technical, must of necessity approach with a great deal of humility. But I do think that when we consider that such men as General Marshall, John Foster Dulles, Senator Austin, Secretary of State Dean Acheson, and the President of the United States have all urged the adoption of this convention in its present form as the best way to show that this country is prepared to stand and be counted in terms of the moral position which it has before the world, I hope that this committee, and I know that this committee, will consider the views of these men in making up its own mind as to whether or not this is an important thing from the point of view of the foreign policy of the United States."

Dr. Brendan F. Brown (dean of the Law School, the Catholic University of America):

"The word 'genocide' is new, but the juridical concept which the word signifies forms part of an idea which is ancient. Genocide was declared to be an international law crime in 1946, but a concept broad enough to include genocide was recognized centuries before by some of the great medieval writers, who believed in a scholastic, natural law. They advocated a form of the doctrine of tyrannicide which accorded a right under international law to any righteous ruler, acting for world society, to resort to war, if necessary, against any ruler who was inflicting gross injustice against his subjects, as such, or as members of groups, who were unable to exercise their juridical right of revolution to overthrow the criminally unjust despot. The bona fide representative of world society might exercise this right to use force even to the extent of war. The particular crime which evoked this form of doctrine of tyrannicide was essentially the same as the crime now described as genocide. Genocide may not adequately be comprehended, unless it is based on the concept of the spiritual, mental, biological, and moral solidarity of the human race, and on the ideal of the brotherhood of man, which in ultimate analysis constitutes the substratum of global society."

Frank B. Frederick (general counsel, the American Unitarian Association):

"I represent one great denomination and am empowered to promise for it the support of this treaty. One hundred million people or more, represented by the witnesses who have testified before this committee, will also support the treaty.

"I am aware of the objections of the American Bar Association. I am a member of that association but I do not agree with its committee's conclusions nor with the vote of its delegates to oppose the ratification of the Genocide Treaty.

"I join with those who have said that in carrying out the treaty if there be risks they are calculable and who have said 'Let us take those risks.' I am glad that the American Bar Association has pointed out the risks. It was the duty of some group of lawyers to do so. Equally, it is the duty of all of us now to appraise those risks and see them in a world perspective, match them against the penalties if we refuse the treaty and come to a great decision.

"In my opinion, there is no risk when we consider the treaty primarily in its international aspect. Genocide is carefully defined so that it is distinguished from homicide and it is unthinkable that as a Nation the United States of America will ever be a defendant in a genocide complaint.

"In its national aspect the greatest risk, as I understand it, lies in the possibility that genocide complaints against individuals will be confused with homicide and that in such complaints our citizens will have something less than their present constitutional rights and protections.

"But the treaty provides for its implementation in this country under laws to be made by Congress. It is doubtless true that because it will be dealing with a treaty, Congress in passing implementing law could ignore the Constitution because treaties themselves are on a par with the Constitution.

"I say to this argument and with all respect to the American Bar Association's point of view, 'What of it?'

"Even if it is possible, it is unthinkable that any Congress would ignore constitutional principles and protections affecting our own basic human rights. This problem of Congress legislating to implement a treaty is not a new one. No Congress has yet sold us down the river because of its special lawmaking powers when treaties are involved. I am willing, and I believe the American people are willing, to trust Congress not to defeat the basic constitutional rights of its own citizens while it is in the very act of making similar rights available to the rest of the world.

"We, of the American Unitarian Association, are not afraid of the national or international risks inherent in the adoption of the Genocide Treaty.

"We believe in the power of our churches and other churches to support the treaty effectively and make the treaty a practical working force when it has been ratified.

"Once again, the world looks to our great Nation for leadership. We must stand for human rights in all the world as we have always stood for human rights in our own country."

Dean Rusk (Deputy Under Secretary of State):

"It is an inescapable fact that other nations of the world expect the United States to assert moral leadership in international affairs. The United States has a record of humanitarian diplomacy, beginning with the early days of the Republic when President John Quincy Adams expressed the public sympathies of the American people with the Greeks in their struggle for independence from Turkish rule. The United States Government has remonstrated more than once with other governments regarding their persecution of the Jews; with Rumania in 1902 and with Czarist Russia in 1891 and 1904. In addition, the United States has also intervened diplomatically with other governments for the protection of Christians, not only on behalf of American missionaries but also on behalf of converts. For example, it is interesting to note that in the treaty of October 8, 1903, between China and the United States, the Chinese Government specifically agreed not to persecute teachers of Christian doctrine nor to molest Chinese converts in the peaceable practices of Christianity. This Government has also intervened diplomatically on behalf of native Christians, in the case of the Armenian population of Turkey.

"Finally, it should be recalled that the United States intervened in Cuba in 1898, in the cause of humanity and to put an end, to quote the joint resolution of April 20, 1898, to 'the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than 3 years in the island of Cuba, * * * have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization.'

"It is a familiar role, therefore, for the United States to take the lead in raising moral standards of international society. And, prevailing international conditions make it imperative that the United States continue to play this role. We all know too well that millions of human beings are still subjected to the domination of ruthless totalitarian regimes, and that the specter of genocide still haunts mankind. It should be made clear to such governments that the United States and other civilized countries do not condone such conduct now any more than in the past.

* * * * *

"Also we are engaged in a very fundamental struggle in our foreign relations between the forces that are trying to build up a free world and the forces that are trying to tear it down. We have committed considerable material resources to that struggle. The attempt to build is a difficult attempt. It is not easy to get an economic system in order or to get an international collective security system in order. It is fairly easy to tear it down. On the physical side the odds are strongly against us. The bridge which cost $1,000,000 in Greece was destroyed by a $25 bomb.

"We are in this fight against enormous odds on the physical side because of the nature of the opposition and the opportunities being offered to the opposition for destruction. We therefore must turn to the field in which we have enormous advantages, that is, to the moral, political, and spiritual field, in order to mobilize mankind around these basic measures of freedom and try to offset thereby some of the disadvantages on the physical side.

"Therefore we look upon this Genocide Convention as a major element in the attempt to mobilize the moral and spiritual resources of mankind in the interest of our common objectives as written in the United Nations, and we believe that if we can offer this leadership we will see a continuing consolidation of mankind behind these principles and through that contribute greatly to the interest, the peace, and the well-being of the American people."

Philip B. Perlman (Solicitor General of the United States):

"In our view the United States has complete authority to enter into the Genocide Convention. The treaty power is being invoked, and that the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our Government and the governments of other nations is clear (Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S. 258, 266 (1890)); Asakura v. Seattle (265 U. S. 332, 341 (1924)). The treaty-making power is broad enough to cover all subjects that properly pertain to our foreign relations * * * (Santovincenzo v. Egan (284 U. S. 30, 40 (1931)).

"The contention advanced by some of the critics of the convention that these subjects must be completely or exclusively foreign or international or external overlooks the whole history of treaty making which has,

from the first, dealt with matters having direct impact on subjects intimately of domestic and local concern. See Ware v. Hylton (3 Dall. 199 (1796)), holding the 1783 treaty of peace with Great Britain preserved debts owed British creditors by American citizens, and was superior to a statute of Virginia which purported to effect a discharge; Hopkirk v. Bell (3 Cranch. 454 (1806)), holding that the 1783 treaty of peace with Great Britain prevented the operation of the Virginia statute of limitations on debts owed Britons, contracted before the treaty; Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee (7 Cranch. 603 (U. S. 1813)), holding that a 1794 treaty with Great Britain confirmed title to land in Virginia in a British citizen notwithstanding the law of Virginia; Chirac v. Chirac (2 Wheat. 259 (U. S 1817)), holding that a 1778 treaty with France enabled subjects of France to purchase and hold lands in the United States and overcame the effect of a Maryland escheat law; Hauenstein v. Lynham (100 U. S. 483 (1879)), holding that a treaty with Switzerland removed the disability of a Swiss citizen under Virginia law to inherit real property, the Supreme Court stating specifically: 'We have no doubt that this treaty is within the treaty-making power conferred by the Constitution (100 U. S. 490),' and to the same effect regarding inheritance by a French citizen under a treaty with France, Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S. 258 (1890); Missouri v. Holland (252 U. S. 416 (1920)), holding the 1916 treaty with Great Britain for protection by the United States and Canada of migratory birds which traverse parts of both countries, and congressional implementation of the treaty, to be a proper exercise of the treaty-making power and Federal legislative power thereunder; Asakura v. City of Seattle (265 U. S. 332 (1924)), holding a treaty with Japan, which provided that citizens and subjects of both countries shall enjoy liberty to carry on trade, and so forth, in the territory of each other on equal footing, overcame a city ordinance which limited pawnbroking to United States citizens; Neilson v. Johnson (279 U. S. 47 (1929)), holding an Iowa inheritance tax was subject to a treaty with Denmark, which forbade discriminating taxes on the removal of personal property by citizens of either country from the other; Santovincenzo v. Egan (284 U. S. 30 (1931)), holding a convention with Italy and a treaty with Persia governed the intestacy of an Italian subject in preference to the escheat law of New York, the Supreme Court stating specifically: 'There can be no question as to the power of the Government of the United States to make the treaty with Persia or the Consular Convention with Italy (284 U. S. 40).'

"That genocide is equal with descent and distribution of real and personal property, or nondiscrimination on grounds of citizenship in business opportunities and taxation, or protection of migratory birds, as a subject appropriate for action under the treaty-making power seems to us an inescapable conclusion. The historical background of the Genocide Convention indicates the view of the representatives in international affairs of practically all the governments of the world on the appropriateness and desirability of an international agreement 'to outlaw the world-shocking crime of genocide.' This Government has shared in this view; in fact, has taken a leading part in shaping the convention. If there is any issue here as to whether the exercise of the treaty-making power is the appropriate means through which genocide should be effectively condemned, and we doubt the validity of such an issue, the view of the President as the principal organ of the United States in foreign affairs, and of the State Department as his representative in such matters, is entitled to great weight.

"But more than this, as a Nation, by action of the President and the Senate, the United States has already made clear its policy on the propriety of giving due international regard, by cooperative methods, for the promotion and protection of human rights, of which the fundamental right to life of whole groups of people is certainly one.

"A question was asked Mr. Rusk about the United Nations Charter and its covering such a situation as this, I think Mr. Rusk listed one covering item. We have listed seven separate references to the Charter that indicate that this subject that is dealt with in the Genocide Convention, the subject of human rights and fundamental freedom, was intended to be one of the matters over which the United Nations should function, and that we think is made clear not by the one section but seven different sections that we have listed:

"'ARTICLE 1

"'The purposes of the United Nations are—

* * * * *

"'3. To achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion (59 Stat. 1037).

"'ARTICLE 13

"'1. The General Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of—

* * * * *

"'(b) * * * assisting in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion (59 Stat. 1039).

"'ARTICLE 55

"'With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote—

* * * * *

"'(c) universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedom for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion (59 Stat. 1045-1046).

"'ARTICLE 56

"'All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55 (59 Stat. 1046).

"'ARTICLE 62

"'2. It (the Economic and Social Council) may make recommendations for the purpose of promoting respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all (59 Stat. 1046).

"'ARTICLE 68

"'The Economic and Social Council shall set up commissions in economic and social fields for the promotion of human rights, and such other commission as may be required for the performance of its functions (59 Stat. 1047).

"'ARTICLE 76

"'The basic objectives of the trusteeship system, in accordance with the purposes of the United Nations laid down in Article 1 of the present Charter, shall be—

* * * * *

"'to encourage respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion and to encourage recognition of the interdependence of the peoples of the world (59 Stat. 1409).'"

"These provisions, as a minimum, embody a clear expression of policy, of our intention (as well as that of other nations) to promote respect for human rights by peaceful international cooperation. The treaty method is the best known means of achieving international cooperation. The Genocide Convention is a treaty, and whether or not it be regarded as stemming from obligations undertaken under the United Nations Charter, the reservation of domestic jurisdiction in article 2 (7) of the Charter: 'Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state' and so forth, is of no relevance on the question as to whether genocide and its punishment are appropriate subjects for a new treaty. This is so because, first, the Genocide Convention does not purport to grant any jurisdiction to the United Nations which it does not already possess, and second, the acceptance of the Genocide Convention will be a separate contractual exercise of sovereign power by each state accepting the convention."

Robert P. Patterson (former Secretary of War):

"What is our form of government? It is a government of a federal character, with national and international matters the business of the Federal Government, and with local matters the business of the 48 States and subdivisions of those States. By the Constitution, the treaty-making power and also the power to define and punish offenses against the laws of nations, those powers are specifically given to branches of the Federal Government, clearly in line with the general classification that matters of national importance belong at the seat of the Federal Government while matters of local importance belong with the 48 States.

"We have in our brief cases that expound those principles, cases in the United States Supreme Court, cases in which opinions were written by Justice Holmes, Chief Justice Hughes, and other leading jurists in the Nation.

"This convention is in clear conformity with that dual system of government. It declares, the treaty does, that genocide shall be an international crime which the contracting parties undertake to prevent. It binds the contracting parties simply to enact legislation that will carry into effect the provisions of the convention and inflict penalties on violators within their borders, trials to be in the courts of the Nation and to be in accordance with the respective constitutions of the contracting parties.

"In other words, this convention deals with a matter that by the Constitution of the United States is in the Federal field. It does not deal to any degree with local matters, with what the provisions of a plumbing code should be in a city, or anything of that matter. It deals with an offense worldwide in its effects, an offense declared to be of grave international concern by the unanimous vote of the United Nations General Assembly.

"More specifically, I think the objection may be this, and I take this from the report of the special committee of the American Bar Association committee on peace and law, through the United Nations. In that report you can find the thread of a thought—I say the thread of a thought because I do not think it is stated categorically anywhere, but the thread of a thought—that this convention goes along unheard-of lines, lines of a revolutionary character, in that it imposes individual obligations on persons by treaty or by international law.

"I submit that a careful reading of the convention will afford no support for that charge whatsoever. No individual obligation will be imposed upon any United States citizen or any subject of Britain or citizen of any country until a national law is passed by that country. Then and not until then will there be any duty or obligation of any sort imposed upon the individual citizens. That argument, I submit, misses the whole point of this convention, which is a contract on the part of the signing and ratifying governments that they will pass legislation of their own in accordance with their own constitutions, to make genocide a crime within their own borders."

III. STATEMENT BY HON. ERNEST A. GROSS, REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNITED STATES, AT THE SIGNING OF THE CONVENTION ON GENOCIDE

[United States Delegation to UN General Assembly, Press Release 93, December 11, 1948]

The adoption of the Convention on Genocide by the General Assembly is an important achievement by the United Nations. The convention provides for the repression and punishment of the crime of denying the right of existence of entire human groups. It responds to the unanimous request of members of the United Nations that suitable methods of international cooperation be organized to prevent a recurrence of acts of barbarism which are still fresh in our minds.

I am privileged to sign this convention on behalf of my Government, which has been proud to take an active part in the effort of the United Nations to bring this convention into being.

The Government of the United States considers this an event of great importance in the development of international law and of cooperation among states for the purpose of eliminating practices offensive to all civilized mankind.

Mr. Speaker, I can sum up my reaction to the necessity for prompt ratification of the Genocide Convention with the following quotation from Thomas Paine: "He that would make his own liberty secure must guard even his enemy from oppression; for if he violates this duty he establishes a precedent that will reach to himself."

Defense of Europe by American Manpower

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 19 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Britain, France Want Europe Defended, But at Expense of American Manpower," written by Constantine Brown and published in the Washington Evening Star of September 19, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITAIN, FRANCE WANT EUROPE DEFENDED, BUT AT EXPENSE OF AMERICAN MANPOWER

(By Constantine Brown)

Britain and France, our principal allies in Europe, want to eat their cake and have it, too. They want Europe defended against the Russians, but they do not want to tax their own resources and do not want anybody but the United States to provide the bulk of the manpower.

Secretary of State Acheson made positive suggestions for the integration of a German military force into the over-all defense of Europe. Before the Western Big Three foreign ministers met in New York there were indirect approaches by the military for the inclusion of Spain in the over-all program to resist eastern aggression. But the French and British Governments remained adamant against it.

The members of the North Atlantic Alliance admit frankly that they cannot, for domestic political and other reasons, provide manpower for the ground force to oppose the vast Russian and satellite armies.

NEED 60 DIVISIONS

The original optimistic estimate that 25 ground divisions would suffice to stop an eastern onslaught were drastically revised after the outbreak of the Korean war.

The top-ranking officers of the Atlantic Alliance calculate that we shall need at least 60 divisions to do the job.

The growing threat from Russia has worried the people of continental Europe. Soon after hostilities started in Korea there was a clamor for increased American military forces in Germany. The French requested at least five additional divisions. They were right. The recent allied war games in Germany under the supervision of Gen. Mark Clark showed that present allied strength there is totally inadequate to cope with an attack from the east.

Factual reports from military specialists led our Government to recommend that the western Germans be rearmed as a part of the over-all defense plan. It was estimated in Washington that a German army of 60,000 men as a starter would greatly bolster our chances of victory.

The idea of rearming Germans under an allied—in all likelihood, American—commander was ill-received by the French and British. Although the supplies for the new German army would be controlled by the United States, French Foreign Minister Schuman refused to accept our plan. He insisted that rearming the Germans would be disastrous for the present government of Premier Rene Pleven.

FRENCH ARE AFRAID

The French, who cannot add substantially to their present manpower under arms, while anxious to prevent another invasion of their territory, refuse to accept the help of their former enemies, even after we offer them the most sweeping assurances that there will be no repetition of the 1914 and 1939 aggressions. They say they cannot afford to put many more men under arms. They are afraid of the political consequences for the present shaky government if they agree to permit Germany to be rearmed. Yet they want their country adequately defended. This is tantamount to asking us to assume the bulk of the burden of the defense of Europe.

The British are only lukewarm to our proposal. Foreign Secretary Bevin, who stated publicly last week that Britain is opposed to arming the west Germans, is reported to have softened somewhat. But not enough to influence his French colleague.

Both Mr. Bevin and Mr. Schuman are determined to prevent the supplying of modern war materials to the Spanish Army, which is 400,000 strong. While psychologically there may be some grounds for the French fear of the Germans—since the two countries have been at bitter odds since 1870—Spain has never been actively hostile to her western neighbors.

In World War I King Alfonso maintained strict but friendly neutrality toward the allied powers. In World War II, General Franco's assurances to Paris permitted the French high command to withdraw its divisions from the Pyrenees and send them to the German front.

Opposition to the French and British to inclusion of Spain in western defense is based only on the fact that the Socialist parties in those countries do not like the present dictatorial regime in Madrid. Yet both Governments are most anxious to see Communist China, where Mao Tse-tung rules as ruthlessly as Stalin, seated in the United Nations and fully recognized as a member of the peace-loving nations.

Spain can contribute far more to the defense of western Europe than either Yugoslavia or China.

Judge's Remarks on Motion for Rehearing, Frenchman-Cambridge Contract

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, this action was filed in 1948 and was not heard until February 23, 1950. It was pending and there were briefs filed. The Bureau of Reclamation was represented at the date of hearing, but for some reason or other did not attempt to participate and help the court. They knew that in the ordinary processes of our democratic form of government according to the laws of Nebraska and according to the reclamation law that the reclamation works would be subject to the laws of Nebraska. They knew that the matter would be submitted in court. They knew that, but they did not come in with any brief of any kind. They were the ones that had the big investment here. They, the Reclamation Bureau, had a big investment, and we knew and appreciated it. It was of vital interest to them that the court be properly advised and helped in rendering a decision, which would not only be of value and benefit to them and the district and to the people of this area, but also for the purpose of protecting their investment and the investment of the taxpayers. Not only that, they knew that it was of vital concern to the public, and as public servants, which they profess to be, it was their duty to be in court and assist the court, not only at the first hearing, but to assist the court by briefs. They were aware of briefs being filed by the objectors and by the district, and it was their opportunity to come into court and advise the court what their contention is, and what the court ought to do for the benefit of everyone affected, but for some reason or other, which the court does not understand, the Bureau personnel saw it the way they did, and I will use the word "expedient," not to come into court and assist the court. Why? Can we say that the Bureau personnel had no appreciation of our democratic processes, and no appreciation of the functions of the court to the extent that they could ignore the proceeding that was pending in Nebraska. A vital proceeding, not only to them, not only to the district, not only to the people and the taxpayers, but would perhaps create a precedent in the entire United States. After the court had rendered its decision, and the decision and the journal entry were submitted several days before it was filed so that everyone could have an opportunity to "shoot" at it and give the court further assistance in this vital matter, there was nothing said. There was nothing said. The Bureau should know, and should have known that they were looking after the interests of the Bureau and representing the welfare of the people, which they claim they are, they should have known that if the court made any decision which was contrary to their version of the law, they would have the opportunity to ask the court for a motion for retrial within 10 days. They knew that, or should have known that. During that period there was no motion for new trial filed according to the practices of Nebraska, which they should be familiar with. They could have filed an appeal directly into the Supreme Court within 30 days. Here was a question of vital interest. A legal question whether the court should be governed by the academic rule as to the interpretation of contracts, or whether the court should be guided by section 46-1, 151, which expressly authorized the court to declare certain parts of the contract invalid. It was the golden opportunity to have the interpretation of this statute before the court, but for some reason or other the personnel of the Bureau did not file any appeal in the Supreme Court. This court would have been happy to see this case go to the Supreme Court and get a determination of the questions involved, but for some reason or other the Bureau found it, if I may use the word "expedient," not to file an appeal. Then, after all this time expired we notice in the papers—after the time had expired—then we find in the papers that the Bureau is going to rescind any further work. We also find in the papers that there is certain pressure placed upon the attorney of this district that unless this ruling is set aside, or to similar effect, that the Bureau is not going to proceed further with then contracts.

Now, gentlemen, I will say advisedly to these men representing the Bureau today that that did not only amaze me, it shocked me as I am sure it shocked every American person. There was every opportunity to follow the procedure, the regular procedures provided by our Constitution and democratic processes, of having this matter presented in an orderly and direct manner and go straight to the Supreme Court. But for some reason or other when the time has expired then put pressure, and I was amazed to listen to this statement of the argument that unless this contract was confirmed in total, the Bureau cannot do business with the district.
